He was silent. He only looked at her despairingly, and saw the hot blood rise to her very brow, and mantle all the beautiful pale face in one fiery glow of shame, till her hands went up to cover it

"He will tell my husband," she said slowly. "I know that was what you meant. Well, let him do his worst. I don't fear him."

"But I do, for your sake," cried Ivor hoarsely. "It means ruin to you—it means more than all my troubles put together to me, for—oh, Beryl, I brought it on you, and I can't help you now."

"Yes, you can," she said, dropping her hands, and facing him with a new, bright courage in her eyes; "you can help me by being brave and true, and fighting against your own misfortunes—not by trying to punish me; you can help me by defying that thing."

Two brave and true, and fighting against you; you can help me by defying that scoundrel to his face, not placing yourself at his mercy by purchasing his silence. Let him do his worst to me, even as he has done it to her man's. I don't fear him any longer."

"My brave darling!" burst from Ivor's lips involuntarily. "Hush!" she said, raising her finger warningly; "don't say that! It makes me a weak woman when I want to be a strong one."

"Hush!" she said, raising her finger to her lips. "that—don't make me a weak woman when I want to be a strong one. I will take the weapon out of Count Savona's hands; I will go to my husband and tell him myself how weak I have been. Let him condemn me as he please; at least, no one else shall."

"You—you will do this?" he faltered.

"You—you will do this!" he cried.
 "As Heaven sees and judges us now, I will."
 "Then," cried Ivor with a strange gleam of triumph in his eyes,
 "you give me freedom again; you enable me to fight this cur with his own weapons. Let him do his worst, as you say—we can defy his own weapons."

She looked at him tearfully, bravely, with all her soul in her

"Do you know," she said solemnly, "my life seems to have been one long repentance of that first misjudgment of you. I want to forgive me that, before we part."

A Family Feud.

(A STORY IN FIVE WEEKLY PARTS.)

CHAPTER X.

"There is nothing to forgive you. There never could be for me," he said with earnestness as deep as, and infinitely more sorrowful than, her own. He was weak, and ill, and shaken, and it was hard to win back the old self-command. "You are the noblest woman that was ever created, I think. I can never forget you. I can never be sorry for loving you. I only wish it lay in my power to shield you from this sorrow instead of adding to it."

"You won't add to it if you will do what I ask," she said. "Don't give yourself up to despair. How do you know even that this man has not been deceiving your mother. She seems only to have accepted his words, and you accept hers. I don't believe the story—I can't. Were I in your place I would leave no stone unturned to prove this man's account of it."

"You forget," he said very sadly, "that when I leave here I go out to banishment, to poverty. How can I find means to investigate the story? Most of the persons connected with it are dead and buried. The documents I found prove the marriage, the death, my own birth—all the dates are duly certified. Then there is my mother's own confession, the letter she wrote the night of her death. I fear the story is true enough. My only satisfaction is that I can defy this villain now, and bid him dog my steps no longer. He is a sufferer, too, by the discovery, for it seems to have been a comfortable source of income to him for many a year past. But don't let us talk of him any longer," he added with a shiver. "I—I want to know what you are going to do."

"I have written to ask my husband's permission to return to India," she said, growing very white as she met those brave and tender eyes. "But I shall not wait for it; I will leave by the first steamer."

"And—and if he takes a different view of this to what you suppose?" asked Ivor hesitatingly.

"That I must risk," she answered sadly. "Why should you be the only one to suffer?"

"Ah, my dear," he answered, greatly moved, "it is so different for a woman, and I have always honoured you so. Heaven knows I do still; and to think that my own folly has called all this trouble into life. It cuts me to the heart."

"You must not say that; you must not think of it," she answered, steadying her voice by a great effort. "I—I thought I should never see you again, but since I have done so, I must tell you also that I see plainly enough you are not to blame in this matter. Why was I so blind—so foolish? I seem to have been claiming so much from you all these years. What other man would have been to my children what you were? And, after all, I can only repay your kindness by added sorrow."

"I told you before that sorrow from your hands loses half its sting," he answered. "You need not reproach yourself. I—I can't help saying I am glad I have seen you again, little as I ever thought to do so. I think I shall bear my banishment better for remembrance of a parting word. I wish it were not wrong to ask for some news of you," he added wistfully. "But I shall be a wanderer, and can give you no address. Perhaps it is as well, only what shall I do if harm comes to you—if your husband refuses to believe—"

"He will not—he cannot!" cried Beryl almost fiercely. "He knows me better than to doubt my word."

"How pale and cold you look," he said gently; "I have been selfish to detain you here so long. Let me see you home now to the rectory. It is the last time, you know."

She took his arm without a word; she was trembling greatly. In silence they trod the shadowy path, and closed the gate, where Jack and Cyril had been used to swing. In silence, too, they reached the rectory grounds, and there paused as if by common consent, and stood for a moment with clasped hands, looking into each changed and saddened face. Then with a murmured "Heaven be with you!" the trembling hands unlinked themselves, and between these two sundered lives rolled back the dark swift waves of trouble and despair.

With hurried steps Beryl Marsden entered the dark and silent house. A lamp was burning in the parlour. Before the fire the old rector sat dozing in his chair.

"You are late, my dear," he said, "and how white and cold you look. See, there is a letter for you from your friends at Vaux."

Beryl took up the letter mechanically. She saw it was marked "Immediate," but her hands trembled so that she could scarcely open it. When she did an enclosure fell out. It was a telegram from India which Mrs. Dunbar had forwarded from the Abbey.

For one sick, dizzy moment her heart seemed to stand still. Then she tore open the paper, and read these words:

"Don't dare to come out. Go to your lover, traitress!"

"Beryl, my child! Beryl! what is it?"

But ere he could catch the swaying form she fell at his feet like a log, with the paper crushed in her hand.

(To be continued.—Commenced in No. 141.)

CAPTAIN MIDDLEFORD, beyond any doubt, had been foully murdered. But by whom? The medical examination showed that the unfortunate officer had been literally stabbed to the heart, and the hypothesis favoured by both the Hunstone and the Sellworth surgeons was that the treacherous blow had been dealt from the rear. It was surmised that stealthy steps had crossed the library from the northern window, that, hearing a rustle, the captain had turned and half risen from his seat, that, in that very instant, his cruel foe had smitten him, and that, without so much as a single penetrating cry, the baronet's guest had fallen in a huddled, ghastly heap upon the floor. The few facts of seeming importance which came to light in the first hours of confused investigation bore out this theory. It was proved that both the library-windows had been unfastened, and there were marks upon the frame of the northern one which spoke of a hurried and lawless exit. Moreover, a rent, unnoticed before, was disclosed to elaborate scrutiny in the flowing side-curtain. No domestic had heard—or would confess to the circumstance—any unusual sounds. The captain had come in at sunset, had partaken of some refreshments, and had afterwards slipped quietly away to meet his doom.

To Sir Raymond Bradwell the shock was terrible. It would have affected him greatly to have been told by a stranger that his friend and fellow-schemer had passed the mysterious borders of what men call "the seen and the unseen." But for himself to find the captain, whom he had left a few hours before full of life and high spirits, in the chill grasp of death—and of death in so barbarous a guise! It was an overwhelming experience, and for the time it thoroughly unnerved him. The Hunstone doctor was compelled to turn his attention to the living, and to prescribe for the baronet such remedies as he judged might best soothe his patient's almost hysterical agitation.

Where was Harry? This was a question which somehow came to be asked very quickly, and for answer the young man was soon mingling with the excited group. He looked to the full as horror-stricken and bewildered as anyone else, except, perhaps, his father. But he appeared to have no light to throw upon the mystery, and there were those who thought that in this crisis he kept deliberately in the background and was strangely chary of either suggestions or enquiries.

Ominously was this reserve interpreted, the next morning, by those who remembered it; for the rumour ran like wild-fire about the village that Harry Bradwell had been arrested and charged with the murder of his father's friend.

It was even so. Scrap by scrap evidence had accumulated, which to the cleverly-trained intelligences of Sergeant Munn and his subordinates, pointed only too clearly in one direction. They both declared to their cronies in the hamlet that at first they had been loth to believe in the possibility of such a scandal; but this assertion was made in a tone which testified that, whatever the extent of their original reluctance, it had been very successfully overcome.

And the case indeed appeared dark. The fact that Harry had surreptitiously contracted an engagement with a relative of his outcast uncle, and so incurred the risk of a grave disagreement with Sir Raymond, had openly transpired, as also the circumstance that Captain Middleford had become aware of this, and that Harry had reason to fear an inconvenient disclosure at the captain's hands. Here seemed to be a motive for the deed of blood.

Then a plain and trustworthy labouring man, named Ambrose Ellis, came reluctantly forward with a story which tended to show that the crime was premeditated. He first unbosomed himself to a neighbour, who insisted that it was his duty to at once inform the police, and dragged Ambrose straightway into the presence of Sergeant Munn.

"Ellis, here, knows summat about t' cap'en yonder, and Mr. Bradwell," said Ambrose's companion, by way of introduction, and with his breast swelling high with the importance of his mission.

"Indeed," said the officer, "let him tell me quickly, then; I haven't much time to spare."

Ellis feebly objected. "I don't wish Mr. Bradwell any harm; nary a bit," he said. "I didn't want to come up here."

This roused the official curiosity. Out came a big, red-bound memorandum-book.

"At your convenience, Mr. Ellis, please?" A peculiar emphasis was laid upon the last word of the sentence. It broke down the weak barrier of resistance.

"Well, if I must I must; 'tis only what, as luck would have it, I chanced to overhear in t' park avenue one day."

"Date, please."

"Ah, that I can't justly remember; I've nought to fix it by."

"A pity; but proceed."

"I was walking across t' green, sir, and t' two gentlemen were atween t' trees."

"Captain Middleford and Mr. Henry Bradwell?"

"Yes, sir. I don't fancy either of 'em noticed me. They weren't looking my way, an' they were very busy indeed, talking. Their voices were pretty loud, an' I could tell afore I got anyways close as all wasn't as it should be atween house-mates. They were quarrelling, that's what they were at."

"Ah! Go on, Ellis."

"The cap'en seemed far the best-tempered o' the two, but even he twitched at his walking-cane pretty viciously, I thought, at times; an' as for Master Harry, he were in a terrible tantrum, an' no mistake."

"What was the question in dispute?"

"That I can't rightly say, sir. I don't mean to make no foolish guesses."

"Very wise of you, Ellis. Continue with what you do know. You heard something?"

"It was just at t' end o' the talk, sir. They'd both stopped, and Master Harry raised his voice a bit. 'If you do succeed, you shall suffer for it; aye, if it is my own hands that wreak the vengeance,' he said. Master Harry shook his fist so"—the narrator suited the action to the word—"as Cap'en Middleford turned away, and he said something else—about war, I think. That is all I know."

"Thanks; this is very valuable information indeed."

It was an approximate certainty that Harry had been in the house at the moment of the outrage—in fact, he did not deny it. All these things put together and illumined by the vivid imaginations of the police-officers, were held to justify an arrest.

The excitement and consternation in the village and amongst the young man's acquaintances was intense. But gradually the feeling widened and deepened that, however sad might be the truth, the authorities were upon the right scent, and had in custody the genuine culprit.

Harry himself suffered the blow with singular fortitude. Indeed, his apparent calmness and stolidity went a long way towards convincing several of those brought into immediate contact with him of his guilt. They could not comprehend how a prisoner with so grave a charge suspended over him should be quiet and collected, unless he had already forecasted the possibility of being in this trying predicament. Tears, and frantic outcries, and indignant protestations of innocence they could have understood, and would have tried their hardest to have believed in. But this haughty—as they considered—self-possession had its own elements of dark suspicion.

"I know no more of the affair than, at present, does Sergeant Munn or any one of you," was Harry's only reply to the earliest whisper of accusation, and to that declaration he had added very little either of explanation or of defence.

Hunstone at last had its mystery, and awoke to quite a phenomenal agitation and notoriety. How men and women walked long distances merely to stand in front of the shadowed mansion and with curious eyes seek out the fateful window; how tongues wagged; and how the ale at the village inns flowed in prodigious quantities to drive the stiff mill of bucolic imaginations; how theory after theory was broached, and examined, and cast aside as useless; how romance was woven into the texture of the ugly story; and how gossips quarrelled over the pattern of their task—all these things the reader will understand.

At one point both the police and the amateur investigators (whose name was legion) were baffled. No weapon could be discovered with which it was at all likely that the fatal wound had been inflicted. Search was made everywhere, within the manor-house and without; but to no purpose. This was distinctly a missing link; but the seekers were not yet in despair. There were many corners in the manor precincts where a blade of steel might escape observation for many days—to be found at last by some accidental wayfarer. It was known that Harry had at one time possessed a rapier.

CHAPTER XI.

If Harry Bradwell bore this sudden and unlooked-for trial with amazing calmness, the same could hardly be said of his father. To Sir Raymond it was a catastrophe on the heels of a catastrophe. Shock was succeeding shock, wave following wave, with such cruel and stern persistency, that the baronet for the first time in his life realised how intrinsically helpless he was when caught in the grip of adverse fates. Of what use were title, wealth, a long lineage, a hitherto untarnished name, when brought face to face with such gigantic disaster and peril? There are summer gales in which pride—reasonable or unreasonable—may act as ballast, and carry the vessel bravely onward. But this was a hurricane—fierce, resistless overwhelming. It threatened the foundering of both Sir Raymond's physical and mental powers. It would probably have accomplished this end if he had not in the depths of his anguish and despair have tossed his pride and dignity, once for all, overboard.

It was the night of Harry's arrest, and the baronet was pacing his chamber with no thought of rest. Sleep, indeed, at the present conjunction of affairs, was an impossibility. He was racked with anxious cares and terrible forebodings. He had listened to revelations which had staggered him, taking away his breath and filling his breast with many conflicting emotions. He had heard of his son's engagement to Agnes Fenton, the niece of the woman whose presence within the sacred Bradwell circle had occasioned so bitter and lasting a feud. This disclosure had awakened all the anger and bewilderment which Harry had expected. He had been informed of his son's familiarity with the discarded brother, and of the repeated visits which Harry had paid to Croyle Farm. These things had annoyed him past expression. But, dwarfing all else, overshadowing all petty resentments and inherited animosities, was the glaring, miserable reality that his son was a prisoner, accused of having done to death a man whom by every law of hospitality it was his—Harry's—duty to protect. The pain of parental disappointment and terror mingled in Sir Raymond's heart with the acute sense of degradation and shame.

And whither to turn for comfort, for any single ray of light upon this black horizon, he knew not. It had been plain to him that all—servants, neighbours, policemen—believed his boy guilty. No one of them had had the heart to tell him so in so many words. They had shirked any approach to a direct question. Even Sergeant Munn had stuttered and stammered something about its "all coming right, no doubt, in a day or two," when he went to break the news of the arrest as best he could to the stupefied father. But it was easy to read the current conviction in the furtive glance, the grave, subdued voice, the pitying expression of each man's and woman's countenance.

The baronet walked up and down that room for hours, and then threw himself into a chair and sat for hours more with bowed head and clenched, nerveless hands.

At last he reached a decision, and for him, considering what his past had been, a strange one.

"I will go and see—that girl," he murmured hoarsely. "She may know something that may prove of use. She will not believe him the—the thing they say, if she loves Harry."

That this would, well-nigh of necessity, involve also an encounter with his alienated brother, was an idea which occurred to Sir Raymond more than once, and to which he attached small weight. He had at present neither the desire nor the intention to be reconciled with Francis, but if he chanced to meet the self-willed farmer—or worse still, his wife—he would at least be civil to him, or her, and try for the moment to forget the offence. A great grief is a leveller of many human barriers, and has power to bridge over many formidable gulfs.

Sir Raymond carried this resolve into effect at a very early hour on the next morning.

The trim, little servant who opened the door of the comfortable Croyle homestead could scarcely believe her eyesight as she recognised the visitor. The story of the Bradwell feud was common property in the district, and it was reported that the baronet would any day go a mile out of his way to avoid the contamination of his brother's chance company. What, then, should Sir Raymond do at Croyle Farm?

This part of the mystery was quickly solved.

"Is Miss Fenton within?" the baronet asked.

"Yes, sir; come in. Shall I call her?"

"If you will be so good."

Sir Raymond was accordingly shown into an old-fashioned "best parlour," to await Agnes's arrival. Of Francis, or of Mrs. Bradwell, to his relief he as yet saw nothing.

Agnes made very little delay. She too was acutely suffering, and had spent almost as weary a vigil as Harry's parent. She was fully conscious of the thick cloud of suspicion that had gathered over her lover, and was highly incensed against public opinion and the callous blundering of those in authority. With an impulsive young girl's contempt for evidence, and for pedantic theories of cause and effect, motive and crime, she held the faintest suspicion of Harry's guilt as a proof of the entertainers' incompetence and folly. She knew that her betrothed was the soul of honour and uprightness; other people ought to be equally aware of the same glorious truth. That other people had possibly not quite the same opportunities for judging, nor the same bias in the young man's favour, were considerations which Agnes did not stay to take into account. She argued more from the base of intuitive sentiment than of reason. For this cause it is probable that she would have failed to convince many jurymen. But to Sir Raymond her healthy indignation and her confidence in the future constituted exactly the tonic which he required. It was the wisest step he could have taken, this to which his despair had driven him in his own pride's despite.

She received her visitor with what, under happier conditions, would have been a bewitching air of unaffected surprise.

"Sir Raymond Bradwell, I believe?" she said.

"Yes; I have ventured to call to ask a question or two about—about my unfortunate son Harry," he answered, with a gasp like that of a hesitant swimmer taking an unaccustomed plunge.

Agnes forgot herself and all her personal fears in an instant.

"He is innocent! I am certain he is innocent!" she cried.

"What idiots these country police must be to fix their attention upon the wrong man!"

The warm, impetuous words struck a sympathetic chord in the listener's inmost heart. At that moment he could have abased himself in the dust before Agnes, in token of his gratitude. How he had hungered for this assurance from lips on whose honesty he could rely! That Agnes believed her assertion was evident from the proud ring in her voice, the flash in her eyes, the quiver of her delicate nostril, the petulant stamp of her foot. Had she any evidence to adduce?

"Of course Harry is innocent," the baronet answered huskily. "No one who knows him should for an instant doubt that. But the proof is needed—the proof, Miss Fenton! Can you assist in this matter?"

The girl's passion had spent itself, and she recollected pitifully how valueless was her testimony in the eyes of an uncharitable and censorious world. If only she could have sworn that Harry had been in her own company that evening! But of such an alibi there was not the remotest hope.

"I am afraid not. Harry had not been to the farm for a couple of days. I think he was a little afraid of—of—Captain Middleford, and for me to confess that would surely be misinterpreted," she said.

Sir Raymond's dread smote him again. It seemed that he would have his journey for nothing.

"And your uncle has no light to throw on this dark subject?" he asked in a more icy tone.

"None whatever! He would have told me else. I will call him."

"No, no! Not this morning, thank you;" and in the gesture of the restraining hand something of the old haughtiness returned. The breach of long years was not healed yet.

Agnes obeyed by coming again into the centre of the room. She became questioner in her turn.

"You have seen Harry; how does he bear it—this wretched trouble?" she asked.

"As a man should. He is a true Bradwell," Sir Raymond replied.

Agnes clasped her hands as a fresh wave of emotion swept over her soul.

"I must go to him; I am sure he must wish it. He may think, else, that I am like the others—that I doubt him, which is impossible!" she murmured.

"Come to the Manor and go with me this afternoon," the baronet said abruptly. The offer was impulsive and without calculation, the fruit of the girl's passionate outburst. Yet it had its sagacious side. For the villagers to see Sir Raymond Bradwell and Agnes Fenton together would go far to dispose of one part of the theory of the prosecution.

Agnes willingly consented.

CHAPTER XII.

It has been already hinted that Sussex Row, East, was a very unfashionable and unpretending thoroughfare. It had, however, all the characteristics of the ordinary busy and commerce-devoted London street. Amongst these was a careless contempt for the fate of the unit. Not more indifferent were the dwellers in old Rome to the sorrows and perplexities of the outcast burrowers into her catacombs, than was the average sojourner in Sussex Row to the good or bad fortune of his neighbours. If one man closed his shop another opened it, and it mattered little to Smith whether the name of Brown, or Jones, or haply Robinson, were emblazoned over the opposite door. A stranger might settle here and no one recognise the fact, until his attempts to undersell his rivals brought down maledictions upon his head; and an old inhabitant might disappear and not be missed, until someone recollected that by this date a certain bill should have been honoured.

A very prominent and long-established denizen of the district did so vanish, and his vacant niche in the daily life was thus ignored.

On the very evening of Captain Middleford's visit to the usurer's home, Mr. Samuel Huke deserted his business without the least apparent preparation for such a step, and certainly without vouchsafing to anybody word of either warning or explanation.

Mr. Huke's household was but a small one. He had no wife, and the girl who bore his name and passed for his daughter—only he himself knew with how much right—was the only living being in all London upon whose affection he had the slightest claim. There were those in West End mansions who feared him, those in narrow City lanes who had occasion at intervals to use him, as either tool or staff—woe betide them if the latter!—those (two lads) in his own shop who hated him for the irksome toil he forced upon them, and the biting words with which he sometimes corrected their failings and mistakes. But love he won from none save Miriam.

Miriam's regard was unfeigned, and merely reciprocated the tenderness of the money-lender's own heart towards the lonely girl. Scarcely did reciprocate it, for upon Miriam the usurer had lavished all the wealth of an affection as pure and strong as it seemed incongruous with his ordinary habits and aims. As in the desert the wayfarer is now and then surprised and delighted by the unexpected discovery of some sweet, bubbling spring, so in the waste of Samuel Huke's life a hidden fountain of unselfish love existed. In what strange soil of romantic remorse this took its rise it is impossible to say. There are depths in the human soul into which no plummet can be dropped.

As the long hours of the early autumn night ebbed away, and the absent one did not return; as the next morning, afternoon, evening, passed in like manner, and still without sign, Miriam grew increasingly frightened and uneasy. She had heard enough of the altercation between Captain Middleford and her father to know that for once, at least, the advantage—that power which can override arguments—had not been on the usurer's side. She had understood that after the visitor's departure her father had been the victim of a wild outburst of vindictive passion. The shop-boys had told her of the oaths he had used; of the mysterious threats he had indulged in; of the manner in which he had walked about the shop and tossed bundles of goods hither and thither, as though in action only were there any relief for his overwrought feelings.

There might be exaggeration in the boys' narratives, but that they had some foundation in actual fact Miriam was compelled to believe. And then, too, she recollected, with fresh pangs of a nameless dread, the depression under which her father had laboured for weeks, if not for months, before Captain Middleford's call. To this depression she possessed no clue, but it had at intervals troubled her very seriously, and now she read in it the premonition of an impending crisis. Her father had been nervous, gloomy, and ill at ease, betraying his disquietude to the keen eyes of the maiden in a hundred unsuspected and involuntary ways. That the terrible, unknown something which had surely happened now was the climax of this secret trouble, she could scarcely doubt. A great terror was stealing over Miriam's soul.

How was it possible to arrive at the truth? Many wild and impracticable plans suggested themselves to the girl's harassed mind, and were one by one examined and thrown aside as useless. It was fortunate for her that in the course of this long day she had the shop to superintend and the enquiries of many callers to meet. In this way there was a subdivision of her care, and though it lost nothing of its intensity in that process, it was less overwhelming and less physically crushing.

A second night passed, and from the master of the house there arrived no token. Miriam had no longer the faintest hope that the mystery would be satisfactorily explained. She was certain that, if alive and well and in possession of his freedom, her father would have communicated with her before this. Whatever the urgency and the absorbing character of his business, he would have found space and opportunity to set at rest fears which he must have known would quickly leap into existence in the face of so inexplicable an absence, and with every hour would gain in force and bitterness. Had he even have told her that he was going, without saying whither, it would have been different. But she had received no intimation of any kind.

A hundred times since Samuel Huke had disappeared the girl had gone to the door or the window of the beetle-browed little shop, and had strained her weary eyes to catch, if it were possible, a glimpse of the returning wanderer. With a madly-beating heart she had watched the advent and irregular journey down the street of postman after postman, telegraph-messenger after telegraph-messenger, and always hitherto in vain. No scrap of news had come.

A tobacconist's and stationer's shop was immediately opposite No. 15, and here the contents bills of the Telegraph, Chronicle, and Standard were prominently displayed. This morning one special line of large black type fascinated the girl's gaze. It was, "Terrible Murder in Brakeshire." Brakeshire! That was a county of which she had frequently heard her father speak during these last months. She went closer and read the sub-line: "A Retired Army Captain Stabbed to Death." Completely magnetised by the horror of the theme, and by a subtle creeping dread which was chilling the warm young blood in her veins, Miriam next bought a paper and with trembling fingers unfolded it. There, arrayed in all the crimson hues of the penny-a-liner's eloquence, and supplemented with as much romantic gossip as assiduous gleaning could collect, was the story of Captain Middleford's mysterious assassination. The reporter seemed to have little doubt as to the culprit, for, while guarding himself by the conventional phrases about "every man being held innocent until proved guilty," he contrived to convey clearly to his reader's mind the theory that the only possible miscreant involved in this case was Harry Bradwell. Of course, Agnes Fenton did not escape. Her name was dragged into the full glare of publicity, and a very distorted account was offered of her supposed influence on the criminal and his crime.

Miriam Huke recognised the name of the victim at once, and a second strange coincidence forced itself upon her attention. The Miss Fenton, whose lover was accused of this hideous deed, was doubtless the same kind-hearted young lady who had come to Miriam's rescue in a moment of grievous perplexity several months before. The episode of the aggrieved cabman and Miriam's own dilemma had never faded from the grateful maiden's memory. She had longed many a time to be able to repay Miss Fenton's generous and trustful assistance. Was this her chance?

But all the misery and despair of the position gradually swept in like a salt tide of destruction upon Miriam's heart. Her brain reeled as she interpreted these two mysteries each by the other, as she linked the money-lender's abrupt disappearance with the fact of this Brakeshire murder, and instinctively, rather than by any conscious mental effort, drew her awful deduction.

With a sudden determination she braced herself for a task from which hitherto she had shrunk. She went into her father's private room, and with two quick strokes of a hammer forced open his desk. Under any less appalling combination of circumstances she would never have dared this. Samuel Huke was notoriously a reserved man, and of the deeper intricacies of his business she knew next to nothing. Any inquisition on her part would surely have been baffled and resented. But she had excuse now.

Nervously, with hot, clammy hands, she turned over the papers which the lifted lid had revealed. There were many which, even to Miriam's anguish-quicken'd apprehensions, had no meaning. They concerned matters of which she was in total ignorance. Others belonged to the past, and were plainly of no moment. But at last she hit on a veritable clue. It was a small, dogs'-eared diary, with strange, ominous—to Miriam's mind, all but conclusive—entries in it. She perused its revelations with tearless eyes and pain-contracted brow.

"And this Miss Fenton—is suffering too. I will go to her," she murmured. "She shall know—all."

(To be continued.—Commenced in No. 149.)

Beneath the Firs.

Oh, meet me when the twilight breeze
The leaves begins to stir,
And when the ringdove coos to rest
Her nestlings on the fir.
Then softly chime the vesper bells,
The time of rest is nigh;
And filled with dew are all the flowers,
And bright with stars the sky.
Love lives not in the glare of day;
It seeks the twilight shade,
Where of no eyes except their own
Need lovers be afraid.
So, dearest, when the sun sinks low
I'll wait and watch for thee,
Beneath the firs in yonder grove,
Till thou shalt come to me.
Oh, be not shy, my gentle dove,
To bring my fond heart joy;
Although 'tis said men only woo
When maidens fair are coy.
But meet me with a blush and smile,
A tender glance and sigh;
And bid me then from that blest hour
To love thee till I die!

Her Childhood's Love.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

CHAPTER I.

NELLY ERLE ought to have been a boy. The event of her birth had been looked forward to with joy and expectation as though an heir to the throne was about to appear. It was a distressing thing that a girl could not inherit the baronetcy, and that it must go to a distant cousin, who was abhorred by both Sir Lionel Erle and his wife.

But a girl she was and a girl she would remain, in spite of the rage and fury on the part of her father, and the woful lamentations of her mother. Moreover, there seemed little prospect of the defect in her sex ever being remedied by a possible brother, since she had come as a kind of fairies' gift long after her parents had given up all hopes of ever being able to dispossess the hated cousin.

They were obliged to make the best of it, however, and after the first shock began to take some slight interest in this unfortunate baby. Sir Lionel insisted on the old family name being still retained—for what period of English history did not boast of a Lionel Erle? So, although no prefix of "Sir" could ever make the euphonious cognomen complete, she still was christened "Lionel," like her ancestors. But she could not be called by such a manly appellation, although it was her sole one; her nurses tried to say "Miss Lionel," and laughed; her father made an attempt at addressing her as "Lion," but the effect of calling such a fair, gentle girl by such a ferocious name was too ridiculous; so, at last, one and all fell into the habit of adopting the soft-sounding word her mother had discovered in the family name, and she was known as Nelly Erle.

Nelly at seventeen was a very charming girl, delicately formed, with high, arched insteps, and a wealth of wavy, yellow hair—hair the colour of ripe corn with the sun on it, and eyes of deep grey, with long, dark lashes. If she had disappointed her parents with regard to sex, they certainly could not complain that she had not inherited the family beauty; she was more lovely than any of those pictures of beautiful women which hung on the old, panelled walls.

In this portrait-gallery was a face that from her earliest years, when she trundled her hoop there on wet days, had held a strange fascination for Nelly. It was that of a youth about twenty; his features were not regularly handsome like the rest of his race, they might almost have been called plain, but he had wonderful, dreamy blue eyes that looked at you with such a pure, angelic gaze that you felt yourself in the presence of one above his kind—a saint, a poet.

Nelly could never look at this face without a feeling of wishing to be something better and wiser than only a pretty and rich girl, who had everything she wished for, and had never known what trouble meant.

There was no history written of this Sir Lionel Erle, only his name and age were inscribed on his picture, and the date, nearly three centuries ago. Had he died young, or lived and achieved great deeds in battle, or as a statesman? There were so many Sir Lionels in that long line that it became a hopeless puzzle to the girl when she tried solving the question by referring to the scantily recorded archives of the house of Erle; but the beautiful eyes still went on gazing at her year after year, and more and more fascinated her.

"If ever I marry anyone," she resolved, "he will have to be like that."

Now that she was seventeen, and the only child, she had been presented at Court, and made her début to the world in general, and great was the admiration her beauty excited, and many were the aspirants for her hand.

But Nelly shook her dainty head at them all. "She did not wish to marry for years to come," she said. "She was a child still, and would remain one as long as possible." In her secret heart she compared all her admirers with the picture that she loved, and felt that not one of them came near her ideal.

But her father, being a matter-of-fact person, getting old now, and not likely, in the natural course of things, to live many years longer, was anxious to have his daughter settled in life and married to some one of whom he himself approved. She would inherit all his money and estates, although she could not hold the title, and he knew that her romantic disposition might render her an easy prey to fortune-hunters.

"Nelly," he said seriously, one day, "it is my wish that you should accept Lord Rookborough."

"I am not in love with Lord Rookborough," she answered lightly.

"Oh, nonsense, Nelly; you talk romantically. Love is only for poets."

"Then I will only marry a poet."

"Now, my dear, I am really in earnest, so don't joke about it. It is my particular wish that you accept this offer. Lord Rookborough is young and handsome, and bears a good character."

"But I don't love him," again pleaded Nelly.

"Pooh, pooh, child! you will love him quite well enough. Why should you not love him, pray?"

Sir Lionel little knew what an unreasonable question he was asking. Why should any woman prefer one man to another, or vice versa? It seems against all reason and common-sense sometimes, but it has been and will be the case as long as the world lasts.

"I do not know, papa," was all Nelly could say.

"Then you must let those who are older, and therefore wiser, than yourself, settle such a matter for you. I have no wish to be severe with you, Nelly, or to force you into any marriage against your will; but since you are quite unable to judge for yourself in the present instance what is really for your happiness, I must make use of my parental authority and insist upon your obedience. I shall accept Lord Rookborough's offer for you."

The girl opened wide her grey eyes in astonishment and alarm. She had never seen her father in earnest like this before. He generally gave in to her in everything, quite spoiling his only child.

"But, papa," she said beseechingly, "I cannot, cannot marry him!"

"Don't be foolish, Nelly; don't be foolish. I have made up my mind. There, go!"

CHAPTER II.

THE girl who had lived for seventeen years, and never yet known trouble, was to experience now that which all are born to, and receive as they go through life in one form or another.

The old baronet having once resolved on this marriage for his daughter, and having strengthened his resolve by dwelling upon his authority as a parent, became immovable on the subject. Moreover, he soon prevailed upon Lady Erle to see the supreme advantages to be derived from such an arrangement, and how greatly their daughter would benefit.

"All nonsense about love," he would say to his wife; "the girl reads poetry, and fills her mind with trash."

So poor Nelly was quite deserted, having no one to side with her against this marriage which she detested, and which was daily coming nearer and nearer, for Lord Rookborough readily received Sir Lionel's acceptance of him for his daughter without insisting upon having the girl's consent from her own lips.

"She is young and very shy," said the father, in excuse for this answer by proxy; and the young lord, admiring, perhaps, the heiress's possessions equally with her pretty face, was quite satisfied that it should be settled in any way. He had departed to his Yorkshire moor to shoot grouse for a month, and would not return until the wedding morning, which was settled to take place after the month was over.

Time never lags when something disagreeable is in prospect, and the four weeks were going all too rapidly by.

There were but six days left now before the terrible morning that was to bind her young life to a man she felt she could never love, and Nelly was miserable. She had got into a habit of taking lonely wanderings about the park, and in these early September evenings, when her doom was drawing so near, she would try to drown thought and tire herself out by long and fast walking.

One evening she was leaning against an old tree far away on the confines of the property, too tired for the moment not to take a short rest, when along the little, seldom-used path that faced her came a young man, walking with a light, swinging step towards her. He perceived the girl resting against the tree, and stopped, raising his hat.

"I am half afraid I am trespassing."

Nelly looked at him, and her face suddenly blanched.

"You are my picture," she said. "How did you come here?"

"It was because I am too curious," he said, and his voice was sweet and musical. "I wanted just once to see the Erles' ancient home. I am Lionel Erle!"

Nelly was more amazed than ever. The abhorred cousin who would inherit the title had never been mentioned to her, and she herself, in her young carelessness, had never considered the necessity for such a being.

"It is I that am Lionel Erle," she said.

"Then you are my cousin; I am so glad to see you."

"It is all like a dream," said Nelly.

"Why?" asked Lionel.

She looked up into the pure blue eyes of the picture's likeness with their dreamy sweetness, and then grew a little confused, and blushed, and said nothing.

"I have heard of you, of course," he said, "but I dare say you have never heard of me. Your father and mine have not met for many years."

"No; I did not know I had any cousins," said Nelly, regaining her voice. "I did not even think that the picture could possibly be alive, and now it is too late."

"What is too late?" he asked, mystified.

"Never mind," she said, recovering herself with an effort. "I was thinking out loud."

"I heard the news at the inn in the village that my cousin was going to be married in a few days."

Nelly shuddered visibly.

"Don't talk about that. Tell me about your poetry."

"How ever did you guess I wrote poetry?" asked Lionel, blushing.

"I always was sure of it," she answered, growing vague again at the thought of the picture.

"Then, you wonderful cousin, I must confess that sometimes I do write down things that come into my head; they come, and I can't help writing them. I never show them to any one. But I have not much time for poetry."

"What do you do, then?"

"It is very dry work; I am a clerk in a bank at Truro, where we live. This is my yearly holiday, when I always take a walking-tour somewhere, and this time I came into your country, as I had never seen this part before."

"You must come and see papa, and the house," said Nelly.

"I think I would rather not," replied Lionel, smiling.

"Why?"

"Perhaps I am a little proud. I should not like it. And I must start from here early to-morrow."

A feeling of utter hopelessness came over Nelly.

"Then I shall not see you again!" she said mournfully.

Lionel held out his hand.

"Good-bye," he said, clasping her little hand, while he looked down at her with the eyes that had haunted her girlhood.

And so these two met and parted.

CHAPTER III.

THE wedding festivities were such as befitted Sir Lionel Erle's only child and the lord of Rookborough. The social lie of such a marriage, where the bride felt no love, and the bridegroom a more sincere regard for his wife's possessions than for herself, went to swell the measure of other social lies, and no one was horrified by it, save our poor little heroine, and she wished she had never been born.

It had been no use resisting her fate. Since the night when she met the picture of her dreams in actual human form, although hating the chain that was to bind her more than ever, she felt that she must submit to it. Her cousin was but a poor clerk, and even if he should ever return the romantic affection which she felt for him, and which was a part of her life, what possible prospect was there that they could ever be more than the strangers to each other that they had been all the years before. She loved the picture, and had discovered that the picture lived; that was all. It made no difference to the carrying out of her father's will.

So the "happy pair" went off amid the usual shower of rice and alippers to spend their dismal honeymoon, and learn day by day the bitterness of being tied to one another.

Years went slowly by to Nelly, Lady Rookborough. There were no children to cheer her dreary home, and her husband was with her but seldom. He had become devoted to horse-racing and such like sports, and passed his time among those whose tastes suited his own, rather than with the gentle, refined woman, the very look of whose pure eyes was a reproach to him.

It was the tenth anniversary of their marriage, when news reached her that her husband was dead. He had been killed by the accidental discharge of a gun at Hurlingham.

How could she pretend grief at such an announcement? Her one feeling was that she had at last regained her freedom, and right glad was she to deliver up the burden of Rookborough Hall to the next heir, and go once more to live with her widowed mother in the old home of her ancestors.

Settled down there again as in her girlhood, free to roam as she would through the familiar rooms and long picture-gallery, Nelly almost forgot the sad years of her marriage, and the thoughts and dreams of her youth came back to her. She felt again the happy, romantic girl of sixteen, as she gazed up at the pictured face that from her childhood she had loved and worshipped.

One day, as she was meditating on that human likeness of this portrait and her once strange meeting with him, a thought suddenly flashed into her mind, and she hurried off to Lady Erle's room.

"Mother, my cousin is Sir Lionel Erle now. Why does he not live here? It should be his now."

"Your poor father settled it, upon you, Nelly," answered her mother. "It was not entailed, fortunately."

Nelly opened her eyes wonderingly. Her nature was romantic rather than practical; she understood little about the laws of property, and since her father's death, two years ago, had never once given a thought about what the heir ought to inherit. Her cousin was always more of a beautiful dream to her than a reality, the human form of her pictured hero rather than her father's successor to the title. But now that the fact of his having inherited the title became clear to her, that the ancient estate should go with it she felt to be only right and justice.

"It is not right that I should have all, and he nothing but the bare title," she said to her mother. "He is Sir Lionel Erle, remember, and should have the inheritance of his ancestors."

"You are as fanciful and romantic as when you were a girl, Nelly. It is fortunate that your father has caused the whole property to be strictly entailed on you and your heirs alone. The will was made at the time of your marriage."

"Then since I have no children, my cousin is my next heir. You and I will go and live in the Dower House, mother, and I shall have Erle Court given over to him at once."

She spoke with so much determination, that Lady Erle had no argument left to bring forward. Nelly wrote to her cousin by that night's post. The answer that came back was in this wise:

"Do not think that I do not appreciate your wonderful goodness, but I cannot accept your offer. As I told you the night we met long ago, I am proud. I make enough money by my books now to supply my wants, which are simple. So I am not poor."

After this decided refusal, Nelly grew very preoccupied and unhappy.

"If I were a man and he a woman it would be easy to settle it," she would say to herself. "I would ask her to marry me; but a woman must be dumb, or the world is horrified."

"Mother, ask my cousin to come here and visit us; he will do that, at all events," she said at last.

So Lady Erle gave the invitation, and he came.

Nelly received him warmly, but as she looked up at his face the blush of her first meeting with him suffused her cheek again; he was older, graver, but the same clear eyes with their dreamy sweetness gazed into hers and reawakened the one passion of her life.

That night she knew she loved him, and therefore she could never let him find it out, unless—Ah, if he could but love her!

But whether he loved her or not, no sign of more than the merest cousinly affection was manifest in Lionel during his short visit to Erle Court. He was charmed with the beautiful home of his ancestors, and his poetic nature revelled in the ancient rooms and all the thoughts they called forth; but Nelly steadily avoided pointing out to him her favourite picture; a strange shyness came over her when she thought of the fascination it had always possessed for her, and how like Lionel was to it. Oh, how like he was!

CHAPTER IV.

NELLY was very ill. For weeks she had been gradually wasting away. There was no manifest disease, and the doctors were baffled, but for all that she seemed to be sinking rapidly out of life.

"I am glad I am going to die," she said to her mother, who sat by her sofa; "it will set things right, and Lionel will have his lawful estate."

Lady Erle's tears fell fast, her conscience was reproving her now for the years of enmity against the innocent heir. Must his rights be only purchased by the death of her only child?

"Mother," said the invalid, after she had been lying quiet with closed eyes, "just before I die, when there is no possible hope of my living, I want you to send for Lionel that I may bid him good-bye. Promise me."

She promised amid her fast-falling tears.

A week afterwards Sir Lionel Erle received a telegram, and in a few hours he was standing by his dying cousin's bed.

Lady Erle left them; she knew that the parting was a sacred one.

Nelly held out her thin white hand.

"Lionel," she said, "now that I am going to die I want to tell you something which I never should have told you if I had lived."

The young man flung himself on his knees beside the bed, laid his head down upon his folded arms, and sobbed like a child.

"Nelly, live! I love you so!"

She touched his bowed head, but she could not speak.

He seized the fragile hand, and covered it with kisses and tears.

"Oh, my darling, live! For my sake live! I have so loved you all these years!"

Nelly lay like one in a heavenly trance. Had love come instead of death to claim her? Presently she said in a faint voice:

"I never imagined that you loved me."

"Pride has been my curse," he groaned; "if you had only been poor, long ago I would have poured out all my heart to you; but you were rich and I poor, and I knew your generous nature would have accepted me to make me rich."

"Not for that, but because I love you, Lionel—because I have always loved you."

He raised his bowed head and looked into her face.

"Nelly, if I had only known!" he cried despairingly.

"I shall live now," she whispered, and her eyes closed in gentle sleep.

The Editor's Note Book.

NOTHING could better illustrate the absurdity of attempting to deal piecemeal with the question of the government of London than the fate of Sir Thomas Chambers's Metropolis Water Bill, which was supported by a strange alliance of the Corporation and the Government, and was defeated by a considerable majority. Unfortunately, though it is perfectly logical to say that the question ought to be dealt with as a whole, it would seem, if we are to wait for that, we shall have to wait a very long time indeed.

THERE seems to be growing up an unpleasant tendency to introduce personal matters into the proceedings of the House of Commons, which is certainly not calculated to increase the respect with which the House is regarded by the country. Thus Mr. Coope's vote on the Bill was challenged by Mr. Firth, on the ground of his being a director of a water company. Fortunately the House declined to accept the principle involved, which, if carried to its logical conclusion, would often prevent half the members of the House from taking any part in its proceedings.

MORE fortunate than the Water Bill, the Bill for the railway under Hyde Park has been read a second time, notwithstanding that it has become obvious that the promises of its promoters are not implicitly to be relied on. For instance, we were first of all assured that there was to be no interference at all with the surface of the park, whereas it now appears that, for a certain time during its construction, the works will be carried on in an open trench. It does not require any very audacious prophet to predict that, very soon after the completion of this railway, a row of blow-holes will be added to the other attractions of Hyde Park.

MR. MUNDELLA, in answer to a deputation, has declared his belief in the London School Board as one of the most perfect institutions of the country, has pooh-poohed the idea that its expenditure is in any way extravagant, and has insisted that the increase in the rate is due to the fact that a larger number of children are being educated. If this were really so, there would perhaps not be much cause of complaint, but, as I have frequently pointed out, not only does the total amount increase, but the expenditure for each child grows in a perfectly inexplicable manner. If Mr. Mundella could furnish the solution to this problem he would be doing good service.

QUESTIONED subsequently in the House of Commons as to the statement made by Dr. Alexander, of Bradford, that he had seen within the last three weeks three cases of brain disease brought on by overwork in school, the Right Honourable gentleman said he did not know anything about that, but that, according to the Registrar General's returns, there had been no increase in the prevalence of brain disease in Bradford during the last fifteen years. Mr. Mundella is, undoubtedly, an able and zealous official, but such an answer as this is a deal too much after the manner of the Tite Barnacles all the same.

SIR SPENCER WELLS has written a very interesting letter to the Times on the subject of cremation in Italy, and it has been decided by Sir James Stephen that it is as lawful to burn bodies as to bury them, provided that the process is carried out in a proper and becoming manner. Probably the result of this will be a slight increase in the number of cases of cremation; but the day is far distant when this mode of disposing of dead bodies will be general. No doubt it is the cheapest, most effectual, and, above all, the healthiest; but in matters of this kind there is a sentiment, founded on centuries of custom, which is almost too strong to be broken down by reason.

It may be admitted that an executioner is a necessary officer of the State, and it is quite certain that if he is to exist at all, care should be taken that his terrible work shall be done not only effectually, but decently and even reverently. Effectual, the present hangman may be; decent, his conduct certainly is not. There seems considerable confusion as to who is actually responsible for his appointment, but no reader of the newspapers can fail to agree with me that whoever has the power of restoring Mr. Binns to private life should exercise it without delay.

THE late directors of the London Financial Association have been relieved by Vice-Chancellor Bacon from the responsibilities which it was sought to impose upon them in consequence of their connection with the Alexandra Park Company. As it is, the impulsive resolution to rebuild the Palace, which was come to before the ruins of the first building were cool, must have been long ago heartily regretted by everybody concerned.

IN the City of London Court last week a gentleman sued a theatrical agent to recover the price of a box at Drury Lane Theatre, which the defendant had let to two different parties. There being no defence, Mr. Commissioner Kerr gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff, and so far the case presented no feature of special public interest.

AFTER the case was decided, however, the solicitor for the plaintiff made an application that the defendant should be ordered to pay the costs of solicitor and one witness. The learned judge, however, declined to allow the solicitor's costs, remarking, with a relevancy which is not apparent on the surface, that, if he were to admit such a principle, he might as well order the defendant to pay the National Debt or the School Board rate.

MR. COMMISSIONER KERR's knowledge of law is no doubt greater than his sense of humour, and it may be assumed that his judgment was technically correct, but if it be law it is certainly neither equity nor justice. It is almost impossible for persons ignorant of the technicalities of the Courts to carry through any case without the assistance of a solicitor, and the refusal of the reasonable costs of such an officer amounts to something very like the refusal of justice altogether. It is not likely that people will go to law to redress small wrongs, if they know that their necessary costs will swallow up at least the amount of the sum in dispute. Thus does the law fall into disrepute, and thus is encouragement given to all sorts of chicanery and imposition.

A STRONG agitation has been set on foot for the restoration of Baker Pasha to the rank in the British Army which he unhappily forfeited some years ago. It is understood that the military authorities are in favour of the step, and indeed Colonel Baker's punishment has been terribly severe. The Queen, however, is said to be inexorable, and there seems little chance of any indulgence being shown.

A LETTER was written to the papers the other day giving a circumstantial account of the shooting of an otter in the Thames above Maidenhead. The incident is in itself of no particular importance, but the letter is worthy of note as illustrating the slipshod manner in which information is nowadays given to the public. It was stated that a dog-otter had been shot under the Cliefden Woods by Mr. Lambert of Cookham, whereas it turned out that the animal was of the other sex, and that Mr. Lambert had no connection whatever with it, except that of having bought its skin. "Cliefden," also, ought to be Cliveden—at least the Duke of Westminster spells it so, and he may be supposed to know as much about his own house as anybody else.

It will be good news for the many lovers of the Upper Thames that Mr. Story-Maskelyne has obtained a Select Committee, to enquire into the operation of the Acts for the Preservation of the Thames and the steps which are necessary to secure the enjoyment of the river as a place of recreation.

It is indeed high time that somebody should interfere. The Thames Conservators, on whom I believe the duties pointed out in Mr. Story-Maskelyne's resolution are at present vested, are a body practically without funds, and consequently of limited usefulness. Meanwhile the land and water grabbers flourish exceedingly, annexing here a backwater, there an eyot, and there again even a bit of the towing-path, and setting up preposterous and imaginary fishing rights in all directions, knowing full well that it is very long odds that no private individual will go to the trouble and expense of vindicating the public rights.

It must never be forgotten, at the same time, that there is another side to the shield, and that riparian owners have a great deal to complain of. On the whole, indeed, Sir Gilbert Clayton East did not unfairly summarise their grievances in the letter to the Times. The behaviour of far too many of the pleasure-seekers on the upper reaches of the river is, in all respects, disgraceful, and the committee will do well, whilst safeguarding the rights of the public, not to forget the rights of private individuals and the imperative requirements of public decency.

THE very long down-hill lane along which English professional rowing has for so many years had to travel, seems to be as far off a turning as ever. It is not much more than twenty years ago that the idea of a Britisher being beaten in a sculling race by a foreigner would have been almost derided, and now we find that a Canadian sculler, who is notoriously inferior to Hanlan, can give our best man a start of ten seconds over the Thames Championship Course.

To account for the result it is not necessary to assume that Englishmen have deteriorated in physique. There is not so much encouragement for professional athletes as there was in days of yore, and men do not consequently go into the business as seriously as was once the case. The reasons why the supporters of professional oarsmen have dropped away are, in the main, the same which have disgusted amateurs with most professional sports. Honesty is the best policy in these matters after all.

BY the time these lines are before my readers, the celebrated Mr. Weston will, in all probability, have accomplished his task of walking five thousand miles, at the rate of fifty miles a day, without the assistance of alcoholic stimulants, and the Blue Ribbon people will no doubt be jubilant. I cannot, however, see that the feat proves very much. Weston is a man of remarkable endurance, as he has often proved even when he was in the habit of taking a "modest quencher," and it is quite probable that he might have accomplished his recent journey quite as well under one set of conditions as the other. Temperance, it may be admitted, is absolutely essential to the accomplishment of any athletic feat, but it is by no means proved that total abstinence is equally necessary.

A VERY hard worker in many fields of literature, and one of the most amiable and kind-hearted of men, was Mr. William Blanchard Jerrold. The eldest son of the late Mr. Douglas Jerrold, he succeeded his father as editor of Lloyd's Weekly News, and held the post for twenty-six years. Few English journalists ever had a more intimate acquaintance with French character and Parisian life than Mr. Jerrold, who will, perhaps, be best known in the future by the work in which he collaborated with M. Gustave Doré. Personally I have to deplore the loss of one of the earliest of my friends.

C. D.

The Rival Painters.

EARLY on a fine summer morning, an old man was walking on the road between Brussels and Namur. He expected a friend to arrive by the diligence, and set out some time before it was due, to meet it on the road. Having a good deal of time to spare, he amused himself by watching any object of interest that caught his eye; and at length stopped to inspect the operations of a painter, who, mounted on a ladder placed against the front wall of a wayside inn, was busily employed in depicting a sign suitable to its name, "The Rising Sun."

"Here," said the traveller to himself, "is an honest dauber, who knows as much of perspective as a cart-horse, and who, I'll warrant, fancies himself a Rubens. How he brushes in that ultramarine sky!"

The critic then commenced walking backwards and forwards before the inn, thinking that he might as well loiter there for the diligence as walk on farther. The painter, meantime, continued to lay on fresh coats of the brightest blue, which appeared greatly to aggravate the old gentleman. At length, when the sign-painter took another brush full of blue paint to plaster on, the spectator could endure it no longer, and exclaimed severely:

"Too much blue!"

The honest painter looked down from his perch, and said, in that tone of forced calmness which an angry man sometimes assumes:

"Monsieur does not perceive that I am painting a sky?"

"Oh yes, I see very well you are trying to paint a sky, but I tell you again there is too much blue!"

"Did you ever see skies painted without blue, Master Amateur?"

"I am not an amateur. I merely tell you, in passing—I make the casual remark—that there is too much blue; but do as you like. Put more blue, if you don't think you have trowelled on enough already."

"But I tell you that I want to represent a clear blue sky at sunrise."

"And I tell you that no man in his senses would make a sky at sunrise blue."

"By St. Gudula, this is too much!" exclaimed the painter, coming down his ladder, and at no pains to conceal his anger. "I should like to see how you would paint skies without blue!"

"I don't pretend to much skill in sky-painting, but if I were to make a trial I wouldn't put in too much blue."

"And what would it look like if you didn't?"

"Like nature, I hope, and not like yours, which might be taken for a bed of gentianella, or a sample of English cloth, or anything you please—except a sky. I beg to assure you for the tenth time, there is too much blue!"

"I tell you what, old gentleman," cried the insulted artist, crossing his mahl-stick over his shoulder, and looking very fierce: "I dare say you are a very worthy fellow when you are at home, but you should not be let out alone."

"Why not?"

"Why not? Because you must be crazy to play the critic after this fashion: Too much blue, indeed! What I, the pupil of Ruysdael, the third cousin of Gerard Douw's great-grandson, not know how to colour a sky! Know that my reputation has been long established. I have a Red Horse at Malines, a Green Bear at Namur, and a Charlemagne at Aix-la-Chapelle, before which every passenger stops fixed in admiration!"

"Nonsense!" exclaimed the critic as he snatched the palette from the painter's hand. "You deserve to have your own portrait painted to serve for the sign of the Flemish Aas!"

In his indignation he mounted the ladder with the activity of a boy, and began with the palm of his hand to efface the chef d'œuvre of Gerard Douw's great-grandson's third cousin.

"Stop! you old charlatan!" shouted the latter; "you are ruining my sign! Why, it's worth thirty-five francs. And then my reputation—lost, gone for ever!"

He shook the ladder violently to make his persecutor descend. But the latter, undisturbed either by that or by the presence of a crowd of villagers attracted by the dispute, continued mercilessly to blot out the glowing landscape. Then, using merely the point of his finger and the handle of a brush, he sketched, in masterly outline, three Flemish boors, with beer-glasses in their hands, drinking to the rising sun, which appeared above the horizon, dispersing the gloom of a greyish morning sky. One of the faces presented a strong and laughable caricature of the supplanted sign-painter. The spectators at first were greatly disposed to take part with their country man against the intrusive stranger. What right had he to interfere? There was no end to the impudence of these foreigners.

As, however, they watched and grumbled, the grumbling gradually ceased and was turned into a murmur of approbation when the design became apparent. The owner of the inn was the first to call "Bravo!" and even Gerard Douw's cousin nine times removed, felt his fury calming down into admiration.

"Oh," he exclaimed, "you belong to the craft, honest man, and there's no use in denying it. Yes, yes," he continued, laughing, as he turned to his neighbours, "this is a French sign-painter, who wishes to have a jest with me. Well, I must frankly say he knows what he is about."

The old Frenchman was about to descend from the ladder, when a gentleman riding a beautiful English horse made his way through the crowd.

"The painting is mine!" he exclaimed in French, but with a foreign accent. "I will give a hundred guineas for it."

"Another madman!" exclaimed the native genius. "Hang me! but all these foreigners are mad!"

"What do you mean, monsieur?" said the innkeeper, greatly interested.

"What I say. I will give one hundred guineas for that painting," answered the young Englishman, getting off his horse.

"That picture is not to be sold," said the sign-painter, with an air of as much pride as if it had been his own work.

"No," quoth mine host, "for it is already sold, and even partly paid for in advance. However, if monsieur wishes to come to an arrangement about it, it is with me that he must treat."

"Not at all, not at all," rejoined the Flemish painter of signs; "it belongs to me. My fellow artist here gave me a little help out of friendship; but the picture is my lawful property, and I am at liberty to sell it to anyone I choose."

"What roguery!" exclaimed the innkeeper. "My Rising Sun is my property; fastened on the wall of my house. How can it belong to any one else? It's painted on my board, and no one but myself has the smallest right to it."

"I'll summon you before the magistrate," cried he who had not painted the sign.

"I'll prosecute you for breach of covenant," retorted the innkeeper, who had half paid for it.

"One moment!" interposed another energetic voice—that of the interloper. "It seems to me that I ought to have some little vote in this matter."

"Quite right, brother," answered the painter. "Instead of disputing on the public road, let us go into Master Martzen's house, and arrange the matter amicably over a bottle of beer."

To this all parties agreed, but in nothing else; for within doors the dispute was carried on with deafening noise, and remarkable energy. The Flemings contended for the possession of the painting, and the Englishman repeated his offer to cover it with gold.

"But suppose that I did choose to have it sold?" said its real author.

"Oh, my dear monsieur!" said the innkeeper, "I am certain you would not wish to deprive an honest, poor man, who can scarcely make both ends meet, of this windfall. Why, it would just enable me to lay in a good stock of wine and beer."

"Don't believe him, brother," cried the painter; "he is an old miser. I am the father of a family; and, being a painter yourself, you ought to help a brother artist, and give me the preference. Besides, I am ready to share the money with you."

"He!" replied Master Martzen. "Why, he's an old spendthrift who has no money left to give his daughter as a marriage portion because he spends all he gets on himself."

"No such thing. My Susette is betrothed to an honest French cabinet-maker, who, poor as she is, will marry her in September."

"A daughter to portion!" exclaimed the strange artist; "that quite alters the case. I am content that the picture should be sold for a marriage portion. I leave it to our English friend's generosity to fix the sum."

"I have already offered," replied the young Englishman, "one hundred guineas for the sketch just as it is; but I will gladly give twice that amount if the painter will consent to sign two words at its corner."

"What words?" exclaimed all at once.

The Englishman replied, "Pierre David."

The whole party were quiet enough now, for they were stricken dumb with astonishment. The sign-painter held his breath, glared with his eyes, and, frantically clasping his hands together, fell down on his knees before the great French painter.

"Forgive me!" he exclaimed, "forgive me for my audacious ignorance."

David laughed heartily, and, taking his hand, shook it with fraternal cordiality.

By this time the news of the discovery had spread; the tavern was crowded with persons anxious to drink the health of this celebrated visitor; and the good old man, standing in the middle of the room, pledged them heartily. In the midst of the merry-making, the sign-painter's daughter, the pretty Susette, threw her arms round her benefactor's neck, and her intended husband raised quite a cloud of sawdust out of his jacket from the violence with which he shook the great Frenchman's hand.

At that moment the friends whom he was expecting arrived. They were M. Lessec, a theatrical manager, and the renowned Talma.

Spring Cleaning.

PART II. DRESSES.

DOMESTIC servants who demand and receive high wages are certain to require liberal supplies of pots, pans, brushes, cloths, cleaning stuffs, etc., and mistresses, not daring to deny the wants of so pretentious an officer, generally purchase without a murmur. The cheap domestic, on the contrary, is expected to work wonders little short of miraculous, with the most limited supplies of essentials. To commence a spring cleaning of dresses, curtains, furniture-covers, table-covers, etc., without the proper requisites is worse than folly, it is downright waste. The success of some processes depends altogether on rapidity, and any makeshift tends to destruction of colours, or the ruin of textures and patterns.

FEILD'S oil soap is one of the most valuable kinds, as it has no unpleasant smell, and does not congeal after being dissolved. Mottled soap is economical, but must be used for warm processes only, as it stiffens when the water cools. Ultra-economists think that in soft-soap there is great saving, but this is a delusion. Being made from fish-oil it is not fit for delicate fabrics, especially for articles of clothing, on account of the smell which remains. Camphine is a variety of spirits of turpentine, and is obtained from the Pinus Australis of the Southern States of America. It is sold in sealed tin boxes or cans, containing one quart, two quarts, or one gallon each, and can be obtained at almost any oil-shop or drysalter's. When it is too dirty for further use, it is taken back to the shop at which it was purchased, and exchanged for clean; one pint of clean camphine being given for each quart of that which is dirty. Benzine is of great value where there are grease-spots upon woollen materials, but if the soil has in it no grease, the benzine fails to do any good, owing to the oil which is in itself, and the same remark applies to naphtha. To remove the oil, place a quantity of benzine in a bottle and drop into it a little oxalic acid; this will carry with it to the bottom of the glass all the oil remaining in the benzine, leaving the greater part perfectly pure. After standing for an hour or two, carefully pour off the clear fluid on the top into another bottle, and it will be ready for use. Common sour, which is sometimes required, is merely clean water with sufficient oil of vitriol to make it taste sharp. The vitriol is to be bought at a drysalter's, not at a chemist's. The best starch for cotton dresses, etc., is Colman's. Furniture-covers are calendered with starch and beeswax; but there is no economy in attempting this process at home, as the articles must eventually be sent to the dyer's to be pressed and finished.

SEVERAL large tubs, or earthenware pans, are essential, as, if the articles were wet, and kept waiting until a pan had been emptied and refilled, nothing but failure would be the result. A good supply of dry, coarse, cotton or linen cloths, some coarse flannels, several pieces of coarse sponge, two or three hard scrubbing or scouring brushes, two or three silk scouring-brushes, of different degrees of hardness, one or two clean sheets, and abundance of clean water, hot and cold. A cleaning-board is five or six feet long, and about three feet wide, must be free from splits or knots, and planed smooth. One side of this board is covered with green or drab baize or flannel, stretched very tight and smooth, and fastened to the edges by tinned tacks. A second board for finishing silks is requisite, but need not be so broad, as silk is rarely wider than twenty-seven inches. Cover the board loosely, and then stuff it with wool until it is raised in the centre and sloped off at each side. The professional cleaner has a great advantage in the possession of a stretching-frame, in which silks and cloth are tacked to dry, and under which a pan of charcoal can be run backwards and forwards to dry the silk. In old-fashioned houses there may still be hunted up old quilting frames, which answer admirably for this purpose, and in very new-fashioned ones, large embroidery-frames are to be found. Chair-covers, and embroidery of all kinds, should be strained to dry in these work frames.

WHEN the dyer is receiving instructions from his customer who consigns some articles to his care, he asks the question whether English or French cleaning is desired. To the uninitiated the difference seems to be chiefly one of money, the latter costing about thirty per cent. more than the former. The price of the camphine which is used for French cleaning adds to the expense, but much more care is required and greater skill in finishing. English cleaning may be either thorough cleaning, or dry cleaning, the difference being merely in the way of carrying out the work. Thorough cleaning is what our grandmothers called scouring, plunging the article into a tub of soap-and-water, washing it well, and rinsing in clean water. This is possible with breadths of cashmere, serge, tweeds, children's woollen clothes not too elaborately made, nor trimmed with perishable ornaments. Shop windows present to us, very frequently, made-up dresses to which a card is affixed, "Cleaned without being taken to pieces." These have been treated with dry cleaning, as it is called, but the successful result is in many cases matter of opinion. Cheap white satin dresses, light-coloured brocades, cream nun's-veiling, and écru lace, are exhibited usually with considerable pride. If the materials have originally been first-class, dry cleaning is successful, but if cheap and fourth rate, are proportionately nasty. The art of successful dry cleaning is to do it rapidly, rubbing as dry as cloths can make the article, and allowing no wringing or crumpling. French cleaning is done with camphine, and is applied to costly and dainty materials.

To clean silk or satin dresses it is well to take out the sleeves, and separate the skirt from the bodice or waistband. Have two earthenware vessels which will hold about two gallons each, and put half a gallon of camphine into each. Soak the bodice in the first pan, and when wetted, lay it on the cleaning-board (as described) wrong side up. With one of the scouring-brushes clean the lining first, then turn and clean the outside as fast as possible. Plunge it again into the first pan. Take it up and allow some liquor to run off. Plunge it in the second, and drain for a few minutes over the latter. Turn the plain side of the cleaning-board, spread a clean sheet out on it, take the bodice, which has well dripped, and lay it down smoothly, allowing no crumpling; rub well with clean India-cotton cloth until quite dry. Treat the sleeves, then the skirt, as far as possible in the same way. Hang up in a hot room for twelve hours to take off the smell of the camphine.

SILK dresses are more effectively cleaned when the breadths are separated. In such a case the cost of camphine may be saved by substituting soap, but several pans of cold water must be ready at hand, as not more than five minutes should be spent over each breadth from first to last, or it will have an unmistakably washed, instead of a cleaned appearance. Never brush silks or satins across the width, as doing so causes them to fray out, and spoils them for re-making.

DISSOLVE two pounds of soap in two gallons of boiling water, use when cold. Have four pans of cold water, with four pails of water in each. Into one of these put a small quantity of the dissolved soap, making a weak liquor. Into another, dissolve a quarter of a pound of tartaric acid for spiriting. The other two pans are for rinsing. Spread a width wrong side upwards upon a scouring-board, being careful that the latter is quite clean. Pour over it sufficient of the dissolved soap to wet it thoroughly, and well brush it, lengthwise, with a soft brush; then turn and treat the right side in the same way. Pass the silk through the thin soap liquor; then in one, and then in the other of two rinsing-pans. Handle it well in the spiriting-pan and take it up to drain. Have the board and clean sheet as in the camphine method, and dry with clean cloths. After all the breadths are done, not more than five minutes being spent over each, they must be finished in a frame, or on the stuffed board, one by one.

MOST silks require a little stiffening, which is the last process. For black silks and satins, a size made of old black kid gloves is excellent, and as these are the most useless of all a lady's possessions when no longer fit to wear, it is comforting to be able to turn them to account. The gloves are to be cut up into small pieces, put into a vessel of cold water, a stone jar or porcelain-lined saucepan, and very slowly simmered for an hour or two, or until the quantity of water is reduced to one half; strain through fine muslin, and use warm, but not hot. Another size, that usually applied by dyers, is made of parchment shavings or cuttings, washed, cleaned, and simmered slowly like the gloves, one pound of parchment to four quarts of water, boiled to two quarts, and strained. One teaspoonful of this to a quart of water is enough for silk finishing. Take the board with the stuffed covering, lay on it one of the cleaned breadths, flat, no wrinkles. Sponge it carefully and evenly with the size and water. Pin down the two ends of the silk on the board, then the two sides. Two people are required for this process, as the silk must be well stretched. Pins about an inch apart. Rub once more with the damp sponge, and dry before a brisk fire.

TEXTILES which are a mixture of silk and wool may be strained on the board, but no size is needed. Cotton materials to be ironed on the wrong side; a box-iron, being the cleanest, is recommended. Satin sometimes requires to be ironed on the wrong side after being taken off the frame, to give it brightness.

NUN'S-VEILING is a nice material when new, especially in cream colour, and in pale blue or pink. If cleaned in the ordinary manner, the bridesmaid's pretty dress, or little Cinderella's party-going frock, is not to be recognised. Even the best dry cleaning is but half successful. But if nun's-veiling must be cleaned, there is more hope in rice-water than in soap, or even in camphine. Boil one pound of the best rice in one gallon of water for three hours, and when done pour off into a basin a sufficient quantity to starch the dress. When the remainder is partially cold, well wash the dress with it, without using any soap, and rinse in cold water, one pan full after another. Wring the dress well, and starch it with the rice-water put by for the purpose, and dry quickly before the fire. When sufficiently dry, iron with a cool iron, as the starch in the material is likely to scorch; if any parts are too dry to iron, use a damp cloth to touch the places. The whole washing process of nun's cloth must be done quickly, and the articles must not, even for an hour, be left damp, or they will spoil. Of all the dress materials at present worn, this is the most difficult to clean properly and restore to a decent condition.

Business Morality.

SUPPOSE three sailors cast away on an uninhabited island and obliged to maintain themselves there by their own labour for a series of years. Suppose two of them separate to farm different pieces of land at some distance from each other along the coast; each estate furnishing a distinct kind of produce, and each more or less in need of the material raised by the other. Suppose that the third man, in order to save the time of all three, undertakes simply to superintend the transference of commodities from one farm to the other, on condition of receiving some sufficiently remunerative share of every parcel of goods conveyed, or of some other parcel received in exchange for it. If this carrier or messenger always brings to each estate from the other what is chiefly wanted, at the right time, the operations of the two farmers will go on prosperously, and the largest possible result in produce or wealth will be attained by the little community. But suppose no intercourse between the landowners is possible, except through the travelling agent; and that, after a time, this agent, watching the course of each man's agriculture, keeps back the articles with which he has been entrusted until there comes a period of extreme necessity for them, on one side or other, and then exacts in exchange for them all that the distressed farmer can spare of other kinds of produce; it is easy to see that by ingeniously watching his opportunities, he might possess himself regularly of the greater part of the superfluous produce of the two estates, and at last, in some year of severest trial or scarcity, purchase both for himself, and maintain the former proprietors thenceforward as his labourers or servants. This would be a case of commercial wealth acquired on the exactest principles of modern political economy.—Ruskin.

A Chat About Sparrows.

FREDERICK THE GREAT, King of Prussia, had a very decided fondness for cherries. He is not the only conqueror who has shown a predilection for the good things of this world, but for a long time it seemed as if the fates had in council determined that the supply of his favourite fruit from his own gardens should be but limited; and with this object in view, the weird sisters sent into the royal demesnes an innumerable multitude of sparrows, each of whom had as decided a liking for the luscious fruit as the conqueror of Rosbach himself. If the sparrows had been economical in the gratification of their desires all might have been well, but the shameless rogues would only just bite the tit-bit out of each individual cherry, so that the remainder was entirely wasted. Vainly did his majesty swear at the sparrows in right royal style, as his majesty knew how to do on occasion; but the delinquents merely answered coolly with "Cheek! cheek!" and pecked out the luscious sunny side of the very cherries which royalty had marked for its own. There was no help for it, therefore, and an imperious mandate was issued that the sparrows must die. Accordingly the feathered thieves were forthwith shot down with as little compunction as if they had been deserters or runagates from the army in the field. After a few of these murderous fusillades had been held, the sparrows seem to have learned that discretion is the better part of valour, and they therefore merely peeped in over the walls of the royal gardens to cry "Cheek! cheek!" and then disappeared. But even great conquerors must submit to the decrees of fate; and old Fritz was no exception to the rule. The king's cherries were to suffer; and suffer they accordingly did; for though the king saved the fag end of the crop that one year by the slaughter of the sparrows, yet, next year—though it was said to be a good cherry season—he gathered no cherries at all; for the grasshopper, the caterpillar, the canker-worm, and the palmer worm, were all there before him to devour his crops while yet in the bud—and the sparrows peeped slyly over the wall, crying exultingly, "Cheek! cheek!" Poor old Fritz, the mighty conqueror, was himself conquered. He could not shoot the caterpillars and their allies, but had quietly to submit to their depredations, and—"this was the unkindest cut of all"—to listen to the jeering "Cheek! cheek!" of the sparrows, as they sneeringly looked over his walls. And so it continued for two or three years; the king had no cherries at all, except what he chose to pay for with hard money. It was for some time in vain that he endeavoured to coax back the pert sparrows; they would do nothing but cry, "Cheek! cheek!" in reply to all his blandishments: and it was only after several seasons of persevering flattery on his part that they once more trusted themselves in the royal gardens, and condescended to eat up the vermin from his majesty's cherry-trees. In fine, old Fritz was obliged to own that cherries were made for pert cock-sparrows as well as for great kings.

Alas! how many thousands of cultivators have been obliged to own the same great truth. How little do we care to own our obligations to the small birds of this world, whether they are merely cheeky little sparrows, or whether they are small fry in human form!

In this country, and in Europe generally, wherever we turn, wherever there is a house, or a corn-field, or a fruit-garden, there are we certain to find a sparrow. "A sparrow!" cries the farmer. "If it were only one we would not say one word; but it's hundreds that we complain about. There is the sparrow everywhere. He is a sly, impudent thief, he is a robber, a murderer, a sinner above all sinners. If we sow seeds he eats them up long before they have time to germinate; if we keep poultry he is ready on the wall to assist them at feeding-time. In fact, we could very well do without him altogether."

And then again, our little children chime in with their pretty little song, so persistently taught them by their nurses:

"Who killed Cock Robin?"
"I," said the Sparrow,
"With my bow and arrow!
And I killed Cock Robin!"

If the sparrow will confess this much, we, his apologists, must say in reply, he is at least truthful; so although he owns to being a murderer, there may be some hope for him yet. "No, no," says popular opinion; "he is a dull-brown fellow, scarcely respectable as to his personal appearance; he has a disagreeable, unmusical voice; he is impudent almost to vulgarity in his bearing; the very pose of his head shows him to be of low origin; his whole existence proves him to be a Communist, a Red Republican, an utter reprobate. He is the very fox of small birds; he cheats them out of their nests if they are only swallows, but if they are birds of greater degree, such as wood-pigeons, or rooks, or storks, he becomes a Land Leaguer, and manages to live rent-free somewhere or other under the shadow of the big uniformly nest. In fact, he reaps everywhere, especially where he has not sown. Yes, he follows the sower to the field, and when the reaper commences he is ready to follow him too, whilst he has not the slightest objection to adjourn with the thresher to the barn. Nay, his impertinence is astounding; for he will eat with the horse out of his crib, he will join the pigeon in the dovecot, where, not content with what he can pick up, he will actually peck open the crop of the young fledgling to get at the undigested seeds within. No, no! We dare not show him mercy."

Though he is greedy and likes tit-bits, his name, Sparrow—German Sperling, Old High German Sperch, Sperk—is literally the sparer, the seeker, the collector. Although he takes the ripest, sweetest morsel of our cherries, and of our fruit generally, and robs our corn-fields mercilessly, yet we must not forget that he is more particularly fond of caterpillars, insects, larvae, and spiders, so much so, that a pair of sparrows and their brood will devour on an average three thousand of these pests a week at least. What, we ask, is two or three pennyworth of fruit a week in comparison with the depredations of the insect world—say of an army of three thousand caterpillars? No wonder that rough old Fritz was glad to renew his treaty of friendship with such valuable allies.

The sparrow, in truth, is a great friend of man, especially of the man who cultivates corn. He came into this country, and into Northern Europe generally, with the Romans, for as they extended the cultivation of cereals the sparrow followed in their wake. In cold countries, where there is a scarcity of insect-life, the sparrow is unknown until the introduction of corn culture. Thus, he only appeared in Siberia in 1753, and he has not yet made his entry into Kamtschatka.

He does not care to cross any breadth of sea. He is found in Java somewhat plentifully, for a Dutchman is said about the year 1800 to have introduced six pairs into his garden in Batavia in order to give a European character to the settlement. The sparrows prospered, although the linnets and nightingales who shared in the experiment perished utterly. Not that the sparrow cares much for these outlandish settlements, for he will only acclimatize himself in the European villages, and not one is to be seen in the native portions. This curious fact is explained by the circumstance that the sparrow, being especially fond of tit-bits, such as the refuse of the European kitchens, will only prosper where these tit-bits are to be procured, and utterly ignores the native kitchens with their everlasting rice.

In Java and other Asiatic countries within the tropics, the sparrow's dull colours brighten up amazingly, and he assumes quite a gay reddish hue.

It was only in 1852 that the sparrow was introduced into the great continent of America, when three pairs were set free in a garden at Portland. Soon afterwards, other pairs were introduced into Boston and New York. The reason of this introduction of these pert little marauders, as our farmers consider them, is instructive. In the summer there was scarce a tree or a shrub, in any of the public gardens and parks, which was not an unsightly mass of dry stripped branches, spiders'-webs, and caterpillars, most offensive to everybody. The sparrow was introduced, and with that red republican spirit of his, he soon changed such abuses, and by the year 1866 the insect world was so far subdued that the public parks once more became pleasant to the eye. No wonder then that the American appreciates the sparrow, that he even erects him patent nests in public places, and that he has him fed in the winter. He treats him, in fact, as a public benefactor ought to be treated.

Our own colonies of Australia and New Zealand have for similar reasons, and with a like result, introduced the sparrow among them.

Honour, then, to whom honour is due. The sparrow, though a rollicking, good-for-nothing fellow in his private character, is a useful public servant, and should be appreciated as such.

But are we never to shoot a sparrow? Certainly, but shoot him as if you loved him—that is, with discretion. In other words, be selfish in your shooting, thinking betimes of old Fritz and his cherries, the moral of which history is this—so long as the sparrows consume the caterpillars on your cherries, spare them, even if they steal a little fruit; but when they turn their attention to the corn, reduce their numbers; or, to put the matter more tersely, spare them in the breeding season, when they must feed their young on soft food.

What is here said generally of the sparrow may be taken to apply more or less to all small birds. The schedule of the Wild Birds' Protection Act needs careful revision, and all small birds which feed their young on soft food, such as caterpillars, ought to be included as carefully as those who furnish sport to the country gentleman under the name of game. The question is fast becoming one of national importance, for not a season passes in which we do not hear of acres of crops being destroyed by some insect depredator or other. Man destroys the balance of nature, and is obliged to suffer. It seems almost an anti-climax to say that a few families of sparrows, or other small birds, would restore that balance in many a district of these islands; but whether it is a climax or anti-climax, we are afraid that in very many instances it is a plain truth.

You call them thieves and pillagers; but know
They are the winged wardens of your farms;
Who from the corn-fields drive the insidious foe,
And from your harvests keep a hundred harms.

Lonely Young Men.

"It's the easiest thing in the world to get married," said the American lecturer advocating matrimony for young men, in an up-town hall; "it's as easy as rolling off a log, as the saying is. Ministers tell him that it is his duty; moralists upbraid him because he does not get a wife; philosophers argue that the foundation of the state is the family; friends point out to him the happy lives of many married persons. The young man has no protection against all this opposition, and, if he is a right-minded person, he will not try to oppose such logic. If he is of proper age, is matured in his judgment, can support a wife, and is reasonably industrious, he ought to be married before twenty-five. But there are many less fortunate young men in this city. Some are engaged in shops where only men are employed; others in offices which never have a female visitor. Their homes are in lonely furnished rooms, with meals at restaurants. These poor fellows actually pine for refined female society. One whose loneliness has come to my notice lives in Harlem."

The reporter saw this celibate, and got from him this story: He was living in a furnished room, and boarding at a restaurant. After two years of this life, he began to wish for some refined female society, and accordingly engaged board in a fashionable boarding-house on East Seventeenth Street. He was somewhat surprised by the greed with which his week's board was demanded in advance, and almost snatched out of his hands, but comforted himself with a glimpse of a golden-haired head through a half-opened door.

The young man had stipulated for a fire in his room, but on going up at night found it as cold as a barn. He called for the landlady, and, after repeated trials, succeeded in gaining her attention. In an injured tone, she promised to raise a little fire in the room. In half an hour or so, during which the young man grew warm from inward heat, a frowsy and slatternly servant-girl came in with a bang, threw some kindling wood on the hearth, lit it, put on a little coal, and went away, taking the coal-bucket with her. He started after her to secure the bucket, but too late, and he heard the golden-haired beauty say: "What's the matter with that galoot upstairs?"

"Oh, he wants a fire, bad luck to him."
"Well, he must be a gilly. Carry him up the kitchen stove."
Slowly and sadly the young man in search of refined female society pulled on his overcoat, walked down to the street, hired an express waggon, helped to put his trunk on, and quitted the house just in time to hear the golden-haired young woman remark: "Well, I knew that fellow was a fraud when I first saw him."

He went to his old "furnished room." It had not been let. It was warm and comfortable, and he heard the cheery laugh of the landlady and her delighted remark: "I expected you back, but not quite so soon." That was his last attempt to find refined female society. The young man said there were sixty such isolated fellows in his block.

Household Gardening.

SEED-SOWING is a very important duty in gardens at this period of the year, and the first essential in contributing to success is well-prepared soil. The best of seeds may be wasted if care is not taken to provide a good seed-bed; and this consists in having the ground light and friable, by forking it over frequently when dry, and breaking all the lumps, not those at the top only, but equally the greater number below the surface. The roots of flowers and vegetables, but especially the former, as first formed, are so fine and delicate that they cannot penetrate a hard, stubborn medium, and hence it is that so many seedlings appear just above the surface of the soil but make little further progress. Make the ground light and free from the surface downwards, as deep as the fork can be inserted, adding well-decayed manure, or a little soot, if a fertiliser is required, and the growth of the plants, the weather and slugs permitting, will be satisfactory.

PREPARING HEAVY SOIL.

If the soil be very heavy a liberal application of decayed vegetable matter of any kind, such as leaf-mould, spent hops, old tan, sawdust, cocoanut-fibre refuse, or anything of that nature that is the most readily obtainable, is sure to be beneficial, and so also is sand or fine gritty substances, such as road-sweepings, or sifted coal-ashes. These latter have little or no manurial value, but they serve an important mechanical purpose in rendering strong soils porous, so that the water can escape from them quickly and the heat of the sun find correspondingly ready entrance. If more care than is customary were taken by amateurs in the preparation of ground for the reception of seed, failures would be far less numerous every year, money would be saved, and much discontent averted.

COVERING SEEDS.

For ensuring success, seeds of all kinds must be covered regularly, but never too deeply, and the soil for this purpose, especially for the smaller seeds, cannot possibly be too fine. Burying seeds too deeply is a common error, and the cause of many failures. The smallest flower-seeds, that almost resemble dust, must never be covered more than a sixteenth of an inch deep, and even then the soil must be finely sifted, or few or no seedlings will follow. A good rule, to be followed as nearly as possible in sowing seeds, is to cover them with soil equal in depth to their own diameter. That may be taken as a safe guide, and those who act in accordance with it with the most exactitude, will succeed the best.

DRILLS FOR SEEDS.

Some persons are in the habit of scattering seeds broadcast on the surface of a bed, and scratching them in with the rake, or sprinkling a little soil over them with the hand; others, more careful, prepare drills for their reception, regular in depth, and this suitable for the particular seed that is to be sown. This is by far the better plan, as the seeds are covered of a uniform thickness, and a much less quantity is required than by the old rough and ready method first named.

EXAMPLES OF SOWING.

Suppose a bed of Mignonette, or any other dwarf hardy annual with similarly small seed, is desired, perhaps the majority of persons would scatter the seeds all over the surface of the bed; but we should draw drills straight across it with a piece of stick as thick as the thumb, but not pointed, or if the soil were very light, a strip of wood half an inch wide, and reaching across the bed, would, by simply pressing it into the soil at intervals of six inches, make a series of indentations just within the surface, and certainly not a quarter of an inch deep. In these the seed would be scattered evenly, none being wasted between the drills, and the soil neatly raked over; or what is better, if the ground were strong, a little light compost would be sprinkled over the seed in the drills with the hand. Seed thus treated would be sure to grow, and being covered of a uniform depth, the seedlings would all come up at once and be of uniform height, not irregular and uneven.

SOWING SEED IN PATCHES.

A number of individuals—indeed, probably the majority, instead of having a bed of one particular kind of flower, prefer having patches of several kinds at intervals in the border. In such cases the seed is scattered over a portion of surface about equal in size to a breakfast-plate, and a little soil spread over it. The plan has often answered, no doubt, as we have proved in thousands of instances; but experience has nevertheless satisfied us that it is quicker, better, and more economical to sow even these patches in drills. It is done in this way: When the ground is just moist enough to receive an indentation, the bottom of a six-inch flower-pot is grasped with the hand, and the rim is simply pressed down into the soil. Thus a circular drill or ring is made in a moment, the seed is sprinkled in it, the soil levelled over with the hand, and the work is done. A few popular flowers will be noticed on a future occasion; in the meantime let the ground be well prepared, and we now pass to another subject.

ORNAMENTAL FOLIAGE PLANTS.

Numbers of plants are very handsome, and admirably adapted for room adornment, that do not produce flowers under that mode of culture. Among these are Indiarubber-plants, Palms, Begonias, Grevilleas, Aspidistras, Dracænas, and the ever-welcome Ferns. All such plants require attention now, some needing the leaves washing, others re-potting, while many may be refreshed by a little fresh soil added to the surface of the pots in place of an inch or two of the old that can be removed.

RE-POTTING THE PLANTS.

A Norwood correspondent writes: "Will you please tell me when and how to re-pot my Indiarubber-plant; the lower leaves have dropped off, but those at the top look fair; it is in a pot five inches across the top. Also two Palms, which have been in the same pots since I bought them three years ago. I have only windows to keep them in. Will soil out of a wood suit?"

By inserting and answering this letter we shall give information to many other persons similarly circumstanced, as the plants named are now grown in hundreds of rooms, and, well tended, succeed as well in windows as in greenhouses.

SUITABLE SOIL.

"Soil out of a wood" will, as a rule, suit admirably, as it is usually of a loamy nature mixed with vegetable matter by the decayed foliage of trees. Take the soil from off the surface, not digging it from any great depth below, and let it be moderately moist, not decidedly wet, when obtained for use. Unless it is somewhat of a sandy nature mix a small teacupful of white scouring sand in sufficient soil to fill a pot seven inches in diameter across the top, and an excellent compost will be prepared.

METHOD OF PROCEDURE.

As to "when and how" to re-pot, proceed at once as follows: If the soil now in the pot is dry and crumbles to the touch, give it a thorough watering, and the next day it will be in suitable condition for turning out of the pot. It is never well to re-pot a plant when the soil is very dry or very wet. Assuming it is in the right condition as to moisture, remove the pot in this way: Place the left hand across the top of the pot, allowing the stem of the plant to pass between the fingers, two on each side of it. Now, with the aid of the other hand, gently turn the plant upside down. Take hold of the bottom of the pot with the right hand, then raise it a few inches above a table, and with a sharp downward movement strike the rim of the pot on its edge. This will loosen the soil from the sides, and the pot may be drawn off, the plant resting in the hand, roots uppermost. In this state they can be examined, and scan them attentively, as their appearance will determine the next step to be taken.

CONDITION OF THE ROOTS.

If the roots look fresh, healthy, and active, they must not be much disturbed. The crocks, if any, may be removed from the bottom of the ball, and an inch or two of soil from the top, that is all, and the plant must be placed in a seven-inch pot. But if, as is not improbable, the roots look dry, dark, and dead, like a coil of tobacco bound round the ball, about half of the soil must be removed and the dried roots cut off. In this state the plant will only need a six-inch pot, or even a pot of the same size as it is now in may suffice, it being a great mistake to over-pot a plant with unhealthy roots.

DRAINING THE POTS.—ADDING FRESH SOIL.

The pot to be used must be washed perfectly clean inside, then dried. Place in the bottom a flat oyster-shell, then a layer, an inch thick, of broken shell, particles of old flower-pots or charcoal, and cover with a leaf or two, or something to keep the soil out of the drainage. Now put in a little of the soil, pressing it down pretty firmly. On this place the plant, exactly in the centre of the pot, and the top of the roots should be quite an inch and a half below the rim. Now add the fresh soil round the sides, a little at a time, pressing it down as it is put in, and so proceed until the pot is filled to within half an inch, more rather than less, of the top. When finished, the new soil must be just as firm as the original soil is in the centre. That is important.

WATERING AFTER POTTING.

If the old soil and new are both, as they should be, pleasantly moist, no water will be needed for a day or two; but the leaves must be well washed with a sponge and warm water, and afterwards moistened daily. This will be very refreshing, and counteract the effects of the check given in re-potting.

When water is given to the soil, say on the second day after potting, let it be tepid, and poured through a fine rose in sufficient quantity to fill the space above the soil, and to pass down and moisten every particle in the pot. Then wait until the soil no longer feels pasty when rubbed with the finger, and apply water copiously again; but in the meantime draw a damp sponge over the leaves daily; this will help the plant much in producing new roots, and as soon as these take possession of the new soil, fresh healthy growth will follow, and the leaves assume a richer green hue, that is so desirable.

These remarks apply equally to the Palms, and especially remember that success depends on the exercise of sound judgment in watering. Do not lightly and frequently sprinkle the soil, making it wet on the surface while it may be dry below, but keep it uniformly moist right through the mass; this can only be done by watering thoroughly whenever water is needed, and this is when the soil approaches dryness; for it must never be allowed to get really dry—not drier, indeed, than a new bread-loaf is when it is first cut—before water is given.

Odds and Ends.

A QUARREL once took place between Raphael Félix, the brother of the celebrated Madame Rachel, then a pensionnaire of the Théâtre Français, and the actor Brindeau, when the latter so far forgot his dignity as to give his youthful comrade a sound box on the ear. As a necessary consequence, arrangements for a meeting on the following day were made and seconds chosen. Brindeau, however, thinking on reflection that he might possibly have gone too far, dispatched one of his seconds early next morning to his adversary with a letter of apology. After carefully perusing it, the recipient replied that he would be found in the Bois de Boulogne at the appointed hour, and declined giving any further answer. Both parties were punctual at the rendezvous, and, on the appearance of his antagonist, Raphael, stepping forward, addressed him as follows: "Monsieur, I have received your letter, and am perfectly ready to accept the apology you offer, neither wishing to kill you nor to be killed by you; but you will allow me first to ask a question: Supposing that you were in my place, would you, after a similar affront, consider yourself satisfied with a similar excuse?" "Certainly," replied Brindeau. "You are quite sure?" "Quite." "Delighted to hear it!" coolly retorted Raphael, at the same time administering to his astonished opponent a vigorous cuff with one hand and with the other presenting him with a copy of his own letter.

SOME time back Professor Sedgwick was geologising in a quarry near a high-road, dressed in a rough suit for the purpose, and striking vigorous blows with his hammer upon a rock, when a carriage coming up, stopped at the place, and a gentleman within beckoned to the professor to come up to the door, as he wanted to know the way to the residence of a nobleman in that locality. Professor Sedgwick having very readily answered this and various other questions put to him, the gentleman, pleased with what he deemed the intelligence and civility of the quarryman, offered him a shilling, which was received with thanks. The carriage drove on, taking its occupant to the nobleman's house, where he was an invited guest. Soon after, Professor Sedgwick followed him, for he was staying there at that time himself. At dinner they happened to be seated near each other, and soon fell into conversation. After a while the gentleman, looking earnestly at Professor Sedgwick, observed: "I think I must have had the pleasure of seeing you before, and that not very long ago." "Oh yes," was the reply; "you saw me this morning, and gave me a shilling for answering a whole string of questions—and I was much obliged to you for it."

THE following is Dr. Parr's first and only love-letter to the lady who became his wife. In appealing to the curiosity rather than the heart of the lady, he displayed at the same time his modesty and his knowledge of woman: "Madam,—You are a very charming woman, and I should be happy to obtain you as a wife. If you accept my proposal, I will tell you who was the author of 'Junius.'—Samuel Parr."

CIVIL marriage in South Africa is not a lengthy rite. The Colonies mentions that a happy pair entered the Queen's Town House, smiling and ogling one another, the bridegroom paid a five-pound note, signed a document, took his spouse by the arm, and walked her out of the building, saying: "How do you do, Mrs. —?" The ceremony lasted just two minutes.

Two gentlemen are discussing a third, while the coach jolts painfully over the uneven surfaces of the street: "He's a sad scoundrel, I fear," says one of the gentlemen. "Not such a sad scoundrel," replies the other as the vehicle plunged into a hole in the pavement, "as you—" "Wh—what?" "As you think," says the other triumphantly, recovering his breath.

THERE is a story of an English tourist who entered a restaurant, and by a few scraps of French was able to order dinner. He wished some mushrooms, very delicious and large. Not knowing the name, he demanded a sheet of paper and a pencil, and sketched one. The waiter understood him in a second, disappeared for ten minutes, and returned with a handsome umbrella.

A PRETENTIOUS haberdasher once boasted to Douglas Jerrold that he was descended from Cardinal Wolsey, at which the caustic wit exclaimed: "Cardinal Wolsey! My dear sir, you must mean Linsey Wolsey."

A MAN left a bony steed in the street, and coming back a short time afterwards, discovered that a funny youth had placed a card against the fleshless ribs, bearing the notice: "Oats wanted—enquire within!"

LITERARY bracelets are adopted by studious Transatlantic belles. The bangle consists of twelve tiny gold books linked together, with the name of some favourite author enamelled on the back of each book.

AN old Quaker, in passing near a racecourse on a field day, stopped and asked a spectator: "Why this concourse, my friend?" "It isn't a concourse!" exclaimed the man; "it's a racecourse."

A PERSON being asked what was meant by realities of life, answered: "Real estate, real money, and a real good dinner, none of which can be realised without real hard work."

A YOUNG lady being asked by an acquaintance whether she had any original poetry in her album, replied: "No; but some of my friends have favoured me with original spelling."

THAT was not bad of an opulent old gentleman, recently deceased, of whom it was asked: "How much did he leave?" "Oh, everything! he took nothing with him."

A SENTIMENTAL young man thus feelingly expresses himself: "Even as Nature benevolently guards the roses with thorns, so does she endow women with pins."

"I SAY, my friend, where have you been for a week back?" "I haven't been anywhere," was the reply, "and I haven't got a week back."

ON a woman with red hair who wrote poetry: "Unfortunate woman! How sad is thy lot! Thy ringlets are red, but thy poems are not."

TAXATION is said to bear equally on all classes, from the fact that it hardly presses on the rich and presses hardly on the poor.

"How sad!" exclaimed one blade of a pair of scissors to the other. "How sad! We only meet to sever."

A JOURNEYMAN hatter, a companion of Dr. Franklin, on commencing business for himself, was anxious to get a handsome signboard, with a proper inscription. This he composed himself as follows: "John Thompson, hatter, makes and sells hats for ready money," with the figure of a hat subjoined. But he thought he would submit it to his friends for their amendments. The first he showed it to thought the word "hatter" was tautologous, because followed by the words "makes hats," which showed he was a hatter. It was struck out. The next observed that the word "makes" might as well be omitted, because the customers would not care who made the hats; if good, and to their mind, they would buy, by whomsoever made. He struck that out also. A third said he thought the words "for ready money" were useless, as it was not the custom of the place to sell on credit; everyone who purchased expected to pay. These, too, were parted with, and the inscription then stood: "John Thompson sells hats." "Sells hats!" says his next friend; "why, who expects you to give them away? What, then, is the use of the word?" It was struck out, and "hats" was all that remained attached to the name of John Thompson. Even this inscription, brief as it was, was reduced ultimately to "John Thompson," with the figure of a hat subjoined.

"GOOD-MORNING, children," said a suburban doctor, as he met three or four little children on their way to school; "and how are you this morning?" "We durstn't tell you," replied the oldest, a boy of eight. "Dare not tell me!" exclaimed the doctor. "And why not?" "Cause papa said that last year it cost him over ten pounds to have you come in and ask us how we were."

"Boy," said a gentleman to the ostler of an hotel, on alighting from his phaeton, "extricate that quadruped from the vehicle, stabulate him, donate him an adequate supply of nutritious aliment, and when the aurora of morning shall again illuminate the oriental horizon I will award thee a pecuniary compensation for thine admirable hospitality."

AT a village not many miles from Newcastle, two miners were discussing the question of Home Rule for Ireland. "Noo, Bill," enquired one, "can thoo tell me what Home Rule is?" "Te ma mind, Jacob," was the reply, "it is this: Irishmen to have a guvornment iv thor aan, and England to rule over them; that's what it is."

Two countrymen paused in the serpent-house in the Zoological Gardens, and contemplated the boa constrictor. "I say," said the first countryman, "what's that insect tied himself up in a knot like that for?" "Oh," replied his companion in a superior manner, "I suppose he wanted to remind himself of something when he woke up."

A DEFINITION was given by a high ecclesiastical authority in an appeal case heard at Westminster, which may be of service on some future occasion. "What," asked Lord Coleridge, "is a nobleman's chaplain?" "A nobleman's chaplain," replied Dr. Phillimore, "is a spiritual luxury."

SCENE: In the auditorium of a theatre. Actor, who has appeared in the first piece: "Good-evening! May I take the seat next you?" Lady: "Certainly. But don't you appear any more to-night?" Actor: "No." Lady: "Oh, I am so glad! Pray sit down."

A LITTLE girl in a Sunday-school who had been pulling her doll to pieces during the week, was asked by the teacher: "What was Adam made of?" "Dust," replied the little girl. "And what was Eve made of?" "Sawdust," was the answer.

CURRAN being angry in a debate one day, put his hand on his heart, saying: "I am the trusty guardian of my own honour." "Then," replied Sir Boyle Roche, "I congratulate my honourable friend on the snug sinecure to which he has appointed himself."

GEORGE III., speaking to Archbishop Sutton respecting his large family, made this remark: "I believe your grace has better than a dozen?" "No, sire," replied the archbishop, "only eleven." "Well," replied the king, "isn't that better than a dozen?"

"I HAVE three children, who are the very image of myself," said Jones enthusiastically. "I pity the youngest," returned Brown quietly. "Why?" asked Jones. "Because he is the one who will have to resemble you the longest," said Brown.

A MR. H., a young coxcomb, one day hearing people speak of age and appearance, said: "Jerrold, don't you think I look much younger than I am?" The reply was: "It is not your looks, my boy; it is your conversation."

JOHN SMITH now accounts for the origin of his name. He says that when the world began everybody was named Smith, and whenever a man acted like a rascal he was tossed out and given another name.

"GENERAL," said a major, "I always observe that those persons who have a great deal to say about being ready to shed their last drop of blood, are amazingly particular about the first drop."

"Is your vessel your home?" asked a lady, addressing a man-of-war's man. "It is, ma'am," replied the seaman, "in times of peace, but when we're in close action we're only boarders."

JULIUS came out of college highly educated, and made his mark in the world. "But what of that?" cried Mr. Scruggins. "I never had any education, and I always make my mark."

AN Irish gentleman having a small picture-room, several persons desired to see it at the same time. "Faith, gentleman," said he, "if you all go in, it will not hold you."

"HAVEN'T you finished scaling that fish yet, Sam?" said a fishmonger to his boy. "No, master; it's a very large one." "Why, you have had time to scale a mountain."

"SH-H-H, child. Young people should be silent when other people are talking." "Then when shall young people talk, mamma? Old people are never silent."

"WHAT is the name of your cat?" one lad asked of another. "We used to call him William until he had fits, but now we call him Fitz-William."

A SMART schoolboy says it takes thirteen letters to spell "cow," and proves it thus: "See O double you."

Correspondence.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Enquiries will be attended to as quickly as possible, but, as we have to go to press several days before publication, some delay is inevitable. In no case can questions be answered "next week," as some of our friends demand.

We have received several very unreasonable complaints of delay in attending to letters, which have been addressed to us by Correspondents who have paid no regard to the instructions which are given every week in this Journal.

The Editor is therefore compelled to give notice:

1. That all letters containing postage-stamps for copies of this Journal, or on similar business, must be addressed to the PUBLISHER.
2. That all letters containing enquiries for the Correspondence Column, or on literary business, must be addressed to the EDITOR.
3. That Correspondents are urgently requested to adopt distinctive pseudonyms, and not to use such vague signatures as "A Constant Reader," etc.
4. That Correspondents wishing to write on two or more subjects—say to send in an answer to a Correspondent, and to enclose stamps for a copy of the Journal—must send each communication in a separate envelope, properly addressed as above indicated.
5. That NO ATTENTION can be paid to any Correspondents who do not observe these rules.

ANSWERS.

AUDINE.—The conundrum is not good enough to print. And we do not ourselves know the answer to it.

CEYLON.—Yes; but how did the Pirates of Penzance come by it?

C. W.—"Walton's Argentine" is an excellent silvery fluid, and gives a coating of pure silver equal to electro. Price 1s. 6d. the bottle.

DERBYSHIRE LAD.—Like many other old sayings, that of "The Bishop's had his foot in it," when milk is burned, is variously accounted for. The most probable explanation of the origin of this saying is that given by the author of "Tusser's Redivivus, 1710": "When the Bishop passed by (in former times) every one ran out to partake of his blessing, which he plentifully bestowed as he went along, and those who left their milk upon the fire, might find it burnt to the pan when they came back, and perhaps ban or curse the bishop when any such disaster happened, for which our author would have the mistress bless (Anglice correct) her servant, both for her negligence and unmannerliness," etc.

DIGAMMA.—You have not given the formula correctly. We do not know how the trick is done.

EXACTING CORRESPONDENT.—Abderite is an inhabitant of Abdera, a maritime town in Thrace, and is sometimes a term equivalent to a stupid person, the inhabitants of this city having been anciently proverbial for their stupidity. Abdera was the birthplace of Democritus, called the Laughing Philosopher; hence the term applied to incessant or continual laughter.

GOVERNESS O.—Miss Emily A. E. Shirreff is President of the Froebel Society. You will find her book, "The Kindergarten at Home," published by Joseph Hughes, most useful and helpful.

HARK, HARK.—1. The poem ("More Hullah-Baloo") you want was written by Tom Hood with reference to the new system of popular music introduced by the late Mr. Hullah. The first and last verses of the poem are as follows:

Amongst the great inventions of this age,
Which every other century surpasses,
Is one—just now the rage—
Call'd "Singing for all Classes"—
That is, for all the British millions,
And billions,
And quadrillions,
Not to name Quintillions.
That now, alas! have no more ear than asses,
To learn to warble like the birds in June
In time and tune,
Correct as clocks and musical as glasses!

I say you ought to labour!
You are in a funny case,
You have not sixty years upon your face,
To come and beg your neighbour,
And discompose his music with a noise
Much worse than twenty boys—
Look what a street it is for quiet!
No cart to make a riot;
No coach, no horses, no postillion.
If you will sing, I say it is not just To sing so loud. Says he, "I must!
I'm singing for the million."

HISTORIOUS.—The earliest known examples in art of the bare crown, by way of tonsure, are of the sixth century. Boccaccio, in his "Commentary on the 'Inferno' of Dante," says: "Some maintain that the clergy wear the tonsure in remembrance and reverence of St. Peter, on whom, they say, it was made by certain evil-minded men as a mark of madness; because, not comprehending and not wishing to comprehend his holy doctrine, and seeing him fervently preaching before princes and people, who held that doctrine in detestation, they thought he acted as one out of his senses."

H. S.—We suppose you have tried glycerine. There is a preparation which we can highly recommend for chapped hands, called "Lethean," prepared by E. G. Hughes, Victoria Street, Manchester. "Lethean" is useful also when the skin of the face is affected by cold winds.

IGNORAMUS B.—A 1 is a combination of characters applied to a vessel of the highest class in Lloyd's Register of Shipping. Iron vessels are classed A 1 with a numeral prefixed, as 100 A 1, 90 A 1 (the numeral denoting that they are built respectively according to certain specifications), and they retain their character so long as, on careful survey, they are found in a fit and efficient condition to carry dry and perishable cargoes to and from all parts of the world. Wood and composite vessels are classed A 1 for a term of years; hence such expressions as 12 A 1, etc., subject to survey. A 1 in red denotes vessels that have already been classed A 1 in black, but are now reduced to second class. The letter A denotes the first-class character of the hull for build and seaworthiness; the figure 1 that the vessel is well found in rigging, gear, etc. When fittings and equipment are insufficient, the 1 is omitted.

JOHN N.—Many thanks. Your little contribution to "Odds and Ends" appeared in an early number of this journal.

LAURINA.—1. If the vicar is a married man, it is usual for the ladies of the congregation to call upon his wife. If he is a bachelor, he calls upon the ladies of his flock. 2. It is never too late to mend. Call and explain your mistake candidly.

M. A.—There is the Merchant Seaman's Orphan Asylum, Snarbrook, Essex. Offices, 132, Leadenhall Street. Your nephews are eligible for any general orphan asylum.

M. A. B.—Many thanks. No doubt the joke about the lap-dog is one of the original twenty-one referred to in a paragraph in "Odds and Ends," HOUSEHOLD WORDS, No. 150.

M. E. B.—When the wine or syrup used in making jelly does not give a sufficiently brilliant red, cochineal colouring is used. Orange and sherry jelly will be made a rich amber by using a very little burnt-sugar colouring.

MRS. J. must be patient. We get piles of stories every week, and as we give them all careful attention, some time must necessarily elapse before a decision is come to in any individual case.

MRS. W. D.—We are much obliged for your suggestion, and are sorry that we cannot undertake the work.

NERVOUS.—It is not at all so bad as you imagine. The number of passengers killed from causes beyond their own control, from accidents to trains, was in proportion of about one to forty millions. The proportion is not only much less than in the preceding year, but it is very much less than the average of any of the preceding years for which the figures have been recorded. Up to the end of last year the amount paid by way of compensation for personal injury to passengers was not more than half what it was a few years ago.

PERPLEXED.—We are not aware that any new Partnership Act has been passed since 1880.

S. F.—You can get a copy of the Apocrypha through any bookseller. The Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge publishes it at a shilling.

SOUR TOOTH.—You seem to be aware of an excessive liking for pickles, and yet not to have the courage to moderate your appetite. A small quantity of vinegar by way of condiment is wholesome enough, but too much is certain to be injurious to health. Dr. Atcherley says: "Sulphuric acid (oil of vitriol) is unfortunately permitted by the legislature to be added to vinegar in the proportion of one to one thousand by weight. This mixture is held as necessary to prevent a peculiar fermentation said to take place in vinegar not so fortified. It is, however, doubted whether the addition is really necessary. On the Continent it is not allowed, and is justly stigmatised as injurious to the consumer." Besides sulphuric acid, hydrochloric acid, tartaric acid, and pyroligneous acid are used in adulterating vinegar.

THIRRE.—1. "Beautiful Snow" is to be found in "The Handbook of Recitation," published by John S. Marr and Sons, Glasgow; post free, 4d. It is also to be had at Tweedie's, in the Strand, or Kempster's, St. Bride's Avenue. 2. We like your handwriting very much, and are glad that you are so greatly interested in this journal.

WATCHER.—The verse is one of the poem for the twenty-fourth Sunday after Trinity, "The Christian Year," Rev. J. Keeble:

Why should we faint and fear to live alone,
Since all alone, so Heaven has willed, we die?
Not even the tenderest heart, and next our own,
Knows half the reasons why we smile and sigh.

W. T.—Perhaps St. Peter's Home, Mortimer Road, Kilburn, would suit your invalid. There are many other homes for persons who can afford to pay the sum you name, a list of which you will find in "Dickens's Dictionary of London."

NOTICE.

NOW READY, PRICE SIXPENCE,

PART XXXIV. OF HOUSEHOLD WORDS,

Containing Serial Story, entitled "My Lord Conceit;" "Through No Fault of Hers," a Story in Four Weekly Parts; and numerous Short Stories.

The Editor's Note-Book on Current Topics. Interesting Articles on Cookery, Gardening, The Family Doctor, Fashions, etc.

AND SOMETHING SUITABLE FOR EVERY MEMBER OF THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

NOTICE.

The Fifth Volume of HOUSEHOLD WORDS, containing Nos. 106 to 121, bound in cloth, uniform with Vols. 1, 2, 3, and 4, can now be had, price 4s. 6d. Also Binding Cases (including Title and Index), price 1s. 6d. Title and Index may also be obtained separately, price 1d.

All back Numbers, Parts, Quarterly Divisions and Volumes, also the Extra Numbers, are in print; and may be had by ordering from any Bookseller, Newsagent, or Railway Bookstall, or should any difficulty be found in procuring from an Agent, enclose stamps for the amount, adding price of postage, addressed to the Publisher of HOUSEHOLD WORDS, 24, Great New Street, E.C., when the copies will be sent per return.

The Publishers of HOUSEHOLD WORDS will send Copies direct, post-free, to any address in the United Kingdom or the Continent, upon receipt of P.O.O. made payable at the Fleet Street Office, to Messrs. CHARLES DICKENS & EVANS, at the following rates:

Weekly.			Monthly.
	s.	d.		s.	d.
Three Months .. ..	1	8	Three Months .. ..	2	0
Six Months .. ..	3	3	Six Months .. ..	4	0
Twelve Months .. ..	6	6	Twelve Months .. ..	8	0

New Volumes commence the first week in May and November respectively.

All applications for Advertisements to be addressed to Mr. Joseph Smith, 24, Great New Street, E.C.

FAMILIAR IN THEIR MOUTHS AS HOUSEHOLD WORDS.—Shakespeare.

HOUSEHOLD WORDS,

No. 153.]

SATURDAY, MARCH 29, 1884.

[VOL. VI.]

Winifred's Ghost.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

CHAPTER I.

"EDWARD THE MARTYR, Ethelred the Second, Edmund Ironsides."

The bright afternoon sunshine, peeping into the little school-house, seemed to hint of shady dells, of cool, mossy banks, and trickling watercourses—of many things bearing a much better flavour to the juvenile mental palate than the Heptarchy.

"Canute, Harold Harefoot, Hardicanute."

The summer breeze just rattled the blossom-covered casements, wooing a dozen longing children to leave Saxon and Dane. And at the foot of the rugged Cornish cliffs, the blue sea, forgetting its darker moods, its times of wrath, and death, and despair, was leaping merrily, as though it would say, "Come forth and dance with me."

"William the First."

A vagrant wasp came intruding its lazy flight into that humble temple of Parnassus, and buzzing in dangerous proximity to a shapely little nose, which in the drowsy warmth was sinking nearer and nearer to the plain deal desk, awakened its owner to the fact that one pupil had disregarded the Third Edward, and swept away Harold, as ruthlessly as did the Conqueror.

Even wasps have their uses, and perhaps it was as well that Winifred Vane was aroused; for at the instant all those sleepy voices ceased. Not for the expected gentle reprimand—there was a far more exciting episode than that. A dozen pairs of small ears caught the sound of wheels outside. A dozen pairs of small eyes turned in expectancy to the door. A dozen small faces assumed their most respectful bearing, and a corresponding number of small forms sprang to their feet, to tug forelocks, or drop curtsies, according to sex, as Mrs. Tregarthan swept grandly in.

They could hardly abase themselves enough before this, the great lady of the place. There was something awe-inspiring in the cold haughtiness of her face, in the richness of her dress, in the obsequious servants and the carriage, the very horses of which spurned the ground, not like common people's steeds. The little ones all felt it, save one who stood erect, a juvenile Hampden, inclined to resent this visit as an intrusion. He was accustomed to render his homage each Monday, when Mrs. Tregarthan came, the one district-visitor of that poor Cornish village, in her official capacity to ask a few questions, to pat with daintily-gloved hand the one or two curly heads nearest, and to go forth again, a lady who had performed a duty. But that was Friday. All his young memory could not recall such departure from established rule, and the urchin wondered what she wanted there; also, as an English child's school-house is his castle, he was indignant at the unceremonious proceedings of Mrs. Tregarthan's companion.

This was an elderly little man, plainly, almost coarsely dressed, whose first act was to bring two forms together for a more comfortable seat, his next to produce a pipe, which, like the rough grey coat from the pocket of which he produced it, had seen much service. Having carefully filled and lighted this, he took a refreshing puff or so, and then he said to the astonished scholars, in sharp quick accents:

"Now, children, never mind about Egbert or Ethelred, Ironsides or Coppersides either. It will do you a deal more good to scamper in the sunshine. Work is over. I proclaim a holiday. We are come to teach a lesson to Miss Vane. So clear."

Wondering at this new ruler, they looked at Winifred for confirmation, and seized caps and sun-bonnets, as they received it in a mute glance.

Both Mrs. Tregarthan and the mistress of the humble school had a letter.

The one produced hers from an elaborately-worked hand-bag, her invariable companion—a bag dreaded by the children for its endless store of peculiarly nasty medicinal powders, and by their elders for tracts of anything but a comforting nature. But Winifred's was hidden away from sight, and trembling fingers closed over it as if to derive courage and assurance from the very touch.

"Miss Vane," and her visitor's tone was measured and distinct, "this is Mr. Tregarthan, my dead husband's brother—Gregory Tregarthan's uncle."

At the words, that individual tumbled off his extemporised couch to acknowledge the introduction, with a muttered something, and an awkward bow; then he resumed his pipe, and his fixed contemplation of a blackboard and a dilapidated map of England. And whatever hopes the girl might have entertained, were chilled at once by his harsh voice and almost sullen manner.

"Mr. Tregarthan," and the speaker slightly waved her hand towards him, "Mr. Tregarthan and myself almost trusted not to find you here still. We had dared to hope that your own good sense would have ended this most romantic, absurd, and impossible affair; that you would have been ready to avert poverty and wretchedness from the man you say you love."

"I do not bring him wretchedness," said Winifred.

There was no tremor in the answering voice. A brighter flush on the fair and perfect face—a fearless light in the blue eyes steadfastly regarding the other—no more.

"Were it for Gregory Tregarthan's good—were it his wish—I, who would lay down life itself for him, could—aye, though my poor heart broke with the deed—send him from me. I have told him all—told him I may not wreck his prospects—told him to forget each promise, to release me. And—and—I have his letter here, and he will not. He says—"

"Stay," interrupted the older lady with a scornful smile. "I do not care to hear. I have his letter also. The same rhapsodies, probably, adorn both. But romance cannot smooth away those difficulties, or make my son's contemplated alliance with you, Miss Vane, less degrading."

"Degrading!" and the girl's tone was proud enough, uttering the one word.

Mrs. Tregarthan smiled again, a cruel, mocking smile.

"We are travelling over the same ground as at our last interview, I fear. I used that word, and advisedly. Do you think you are a fitting match for the old line—for a Tregarthan, of Tregarthan Hold?"

"I imagine that a penniless, friendless girl, earning her bread as a school-teacher, may not boast of ancestry," and Winifred faced the other with a proud look contradicting the words; "but my family is old as the Tregarthans. For Queen and country, at the head of his regiment, my father died a soldier's death before the Russian guns. A Tregarthan could do no more. And, pardon me, I do not know that a Calthorpe ever did so much."

It was a keen little thrust. The sword of the dead Captain Vane never found its mark more surely. For Mrs. Tregarthan's late father, a great contractor, had made himself a name by supplying bad clothing, and worse boots, to our Crimean troops.

"You hear, Brother Paul?" and the lady turned to that personage, still smoking in silence. "This is the lady whose arms are to be quartered with yours. This is the lady whose love for our nephew is to bring him poverty, ruin, and disgrace."

"Ah, I hear," he rejoined with a huge puff. "But what did you expect, Agatha? I don't think any the worse of this young lady that she shows fight. Tregarthan Hold and my money are worth fighting for, even though there is not much hope of victory."

"Is there nothing in life," cried the girl despairingly—"nothing save wealth? No higher aims—no nobler purposes? Is poverty so dreadful?"

"No, not at all," sneered Mrs. Tregarthan. "My son, absorbed in his artistic studies, of course has told you that, and a great deal more romantic nonsense. The idea of a Tregarthan meddling with paint-pots, and pencils, and dirty brushes!"

"Quite true, Agatha," put in her brother-in-law. "Unless the lad's paintings brought him the shekels."

"Shekels!" she echoed contemptuously. "Would it bring him bread-and-cheese? Come, Miss Vane, be rational," she added more gently. "Though my son be headstrong and wilful, your hand should not lead him to his ruin."

"Alas! I seem doomed to bring him sorrow," sighed the girl. "You speak of ruin, but at least he has the Hold."

"Oh yes," rejoined his mother, smiling cruelly. "Yet surely you have weighed the chances carefully enough to know what that means? Gregory Tregarthan is master of the Hold—a tumble-down mansion and a few acres of poor land. Why, but for my small fortune, he would be a beggar; and now, when the world is opening before him, fairer, brighter in every way, you and his own folly are to be the wreck of all."

"That is so," chimed in Paul Tregarthan. "Let me explain, young lady," and he laid aside his pipe in preparation for a speech. "Let us understand each other. Mine was the misfortune, for I suppose that is what people call it, to be a younger son. Your lover's father came into these estates. His inheritance was any amount of mortgages and debts, with an old name well-known amongst money-lenders, and not much respected by the tribe of Judah. I, lacking these precious gifts, turned out in the world to seek my fortune, and found it in Chicago, in commerce—the pig-trade, as a matter of fact. Of course, living under the stars and stripes so long, I learned to sneer at ancestral pride, therefore," and Paul smiled mockingly—

"therefore I came home, with all my dollars, to buy back our lands—to restore the lustre of the old race—to make my nephew, Gregory, my heir—to see him allied to some noble family, the sort of thing which, as a true republican, of course I worship—and I find you."

"What shall I do?" came her cry when he had ended. "I may not wreck his life, and yet—and yet," with a quick, sudden motion she sprang forward, and was kneeling at Paul Tregarthan's feet, "I plead not for myself, but for him—for him!"

She did not even look at Mrs. Tregarthan. She was striving to gaze in Uncle Paul's face, and it was turned away, as, unmoved, he was re-lighting his pipe.

"Have you no pity? Surely, in some far-off day, you knew what it was to love. You must have some remembrance of the dreams of your own youth."

"Hush!" he said softly. He turned his face yet more from her, and was silent a while. When he spoke again, his voice shook a little, but his features showed no relenting. "I have loved, and it does not kill. You will learn that lesson, Miss Vane, even as I have."

"Be content," and the girl rose to her feet in the calmness of a great despair. "You have triumphed. I leave Gregory—my Gregory that was—to his brighter destiny, and go from here to-morrow—will see him no more, and may Heaven aid and pity us both!"

Her head bowed down in sorrow, Winifred listened to their departure, and then she heard him return—knew that he was standing by her side.

"Miss Vane," and she looked up, dashing her tears away, to meet his pitying glance, "I fear that we are playing it rather low down on you. Will this be some little compensation?"

His hand held a roll of bank-notes, of greater value than ever the girl had seen in all her life, and, with a quick gesture, she put it aside.

"My love is not bought and sold," she said in scornful bitterness. "Perhaps, with your ideas of commerce, you may not understand that. But pride is not the exclusive prerogative even of the Tregarthans. Poor and humble as this dwelling may be, until to-morrow it is mine. Please to leave me. Misery enough is for me, without this last insult."

CHAPTER II.

"STAND back, sir!"

The speaker was but small, yet his voice was large, and it vied with the parting whistles of two trains gliding out of St. Bedwas Station.

The official dignity was hurt. True, St. Bedwas was only a little place, a mile or so from the Hold. But a station-master, though new to the post, is a station-master, and must not be roughly pushed aside by a handsome, but certainly unceremonious young man, even though his ancestors once owned all the lands around.

"Back, sir. It is against the company's rules. Stand back, I say."

"Hush! It is Mr. Gregory, the young master."

The words were well-nigh jerked out of an obsequious cap-touching porter, as his superior was tossed into his arms by one whose course was not to be stayed. Then Gregory Tregarthan's impetuous hand wrenched open the door, and, after running an instant by its side, he sprang lightly into the moving carriage, tenanted by only two travellers.

"Master Gregory! My dear boy, how can you risk your life so?"

He smiled a careless smile at an elderly lady, very plainly attired, who had regarded his leap in fearing admiration.

"I would risk nine lives, if, like a cat, I possessed so many," he cried gaily, "in such a cause. You know that, Jane Barnard—" Then in a moment his voice grew grave and tender, and his glance rested lovingly on the fair maiden shrinking away from him, striving to hide herself behind her companion, and failing signally, inasmuch as Miss Jane Barnard was so supernaturally thin and spare, that it was cause for wonder how in such a small face, such pinched withered features, so much affection could dwell, as now beamed on them both. "Winifred, why do you look so? Why do you turn from me? Your face is pale, dear one, as if I were a ghost—not your own Gregory come to claim your promise—to hold your hand against all the world."

Winifred Vane uttered no word. Her only answer was a low, weary sigh—a drawing away yet farther from him—a futile effort at interposing her spare fellow-traveller.

Gregory Tregarthan pushed Miss Barnard aside. Not quite as he had treated the outraged station-master, but with the same firmness.

"I have been in your arms many a time, you good old soul, so excuse me now."

Without another word he deposited her on the opposite seat, then he sat himself down by Winifred's side, and took her hand in his. There was a feeble effort to deny him, but he was not to be gainsaid. His strong grasp imprisoned the trembling fingers, and would not let them go.

"Winifred, speak to me! Say, what is the meaning of this! Where are you going? This train is bearing you away from St. Bedwas—from the home which was to be yours and mine, love, and I was coming to claim you."

"Yes," she whispered in sorrow. "You say truly. It is bearing me away, and it must be so. The Hold is farther from me each moment, even as it must be in the future. And—and—"

Then, with a quivering sob, she bowed her face in the one free hand.

"Miss Barnard, dear friend of my sorrow, guide of my hard path, in pity tell him, for I—I cannot."

"Yes, tell him, somebody," cried Gregory Tregarthan. "Although what need is there? Can I not see my mother in this? And the lovingkindness of my uncle Paul? Is it for this that I have laughed at his promised wealth—disregarded threat and sage remonstrance, even as I will and do disregard all and everything, save my love. Winifred, is your faith so weak? And Jane Barnard—you who have served our house so many years—who have nursed me, a child, in your lap; who loves me, or at least I fancied so, till now."

"And loves you still," answered the elder woman. "This is no time for reproaches. The name and fame of Tregarthan Hold are dear to me as to you, although I am—or rather, was—only a poor servitor of the old line. It is for your sake, for your brighter life, that Winifred takes her hand from yours—is going far away with me to London."

"She does not take her dear hand from mine," he cried. "See," and his own closed more tightly upon it, "I hold it so, and will never let it go from me. Ah, I feared this! yet," and his face lightened with a trusting smile, "I knew, when again I met her, the arguments of Paul Tregarthan, the scorn of my mother, would be but as dreams to my darling. Say, Winifred, is it not so?"

"No, no," she murmured, "it must not—it can never be. Who am I, to be the evil star of your life, Gregory? You will forget poor me when I am lost to you, unknown in London."

"Yes, that shall be so, when it happens," and he laughed in unbelief. "You may go there, but I go too; and I say I will never lose you. Although," laughing again, "I confess I fail to understand why Jane Barnard wants to be lost also."

"Master Gregory," a tear rolled down the withered cheek as she called him by the name of his boyhood, "Master Gregory, I am dismissed from Tregarthan Hold."

"After all these years! My poor old nurse!" ejaculated the young man. "Will you tell me why? Stay, I can tell you: it was for taking my part."

"Yes, Master Gregory," said the other, forgetting prudence in her grief, "you are right. I have no cause of complaint, perhaps. I am old for service, but St. Bedwas was my home so long. And Mrs. Tregarthan need not have sent me away so unkindly. I was there when she was brought home, a fair young bride, by your poor father. I held you in these arms, a baby." And there Jane Barnard fairly broke down.

"Nay," interposed Gregory, "no tears on this, which I mean to be a happy day. It strikes me that we have all three 'got the sack'—my lady-mother would condemn the slang, but it embodies the position—for about the same cause. So nothing remains for us poor offenders, expelled from Eden, but to stick together and make the best of the outer world. Jane Barnard, where are you going?"

"My sister dwells in London; I am going there. Thank goodness, my small savings will suffice for my few remaining years, even though I see Cornwall no more."

"And Winifred was going with you;" and it was a statement more than a question.

"Winifred was to make her home with me," she assented. "Not to eat the bread of idleness. Until she could find something to do—some employment."

"That is found at once," he cried gaily. "As the wife of a poor man, and a worse painter, my darling shall gratify her desire for work in darning stockings and making pies. Winifred dearest, look up and say it shall be so."

The girl's happiness was in her grasp, yet her hand, only striving for what she deemed his good, would have put it away from her.

"No, Gregory. Hard though my lot may be, it may not be so."

"But I say it shall. You cannot help yourself. Your promise is mine, and I will not release you. I will never let you go. I always had my way as a child, as a boy—ask my old nurse about that—and I will have it as a man."

Her answer was again an effort to withdraw the hand he still held, and Gregory Tregarthan let it go. He released it—only to throw his arms around her, to press her passionately to his heart, to rain kisses upon cheek, hair, and brow.

"I do not fear the future," he said in hopeful joy. "I can get on without Uncle Paul and all the wealth from a million defunct Chicago porkers. Tregarthan Hold is mine. I might let it; but it is my mother's home. Alas! it may not be ours whilst she scorns my bride, but that cannot last for ever, dearest. I have my little patrimony; it is bread-and-cheese, if nothing more. And I have my beloved art. I sold a picture yesterday. You would deem me a Cæsus if I told you for how much. There is nothing to keep us asunder. And nothing shall. Winifred, lay your dear hands in mine—so, darling, and send me away if you can."

Her eyes met his at last. But all he could read there was love, and tenderness, and trusting faith.

"Now say, 'Gregory, I am yours ever.'"

Her lips murmured something, certainly not the words which rang through the carriage from an unsympathetic collector, "Tickets, please, tickets." And then that obdurate individual proceeded, in default of the young man possessing that necessary adjunct to railway travelling, to enforce the company's rules (illegal, by-the-bye), and mulct him from whence the train had started.

"It is a bit of a pull," said Gregory Tregarthan, restoring his purse with a wry face. "And it is your fault, dear—yours and Jane Barnard's. Just as I was beginning to be economical. Going without gloves, and learning to smoke fourpenny bird's-eye. Nevertheless, this is the happiest journey of my life."

CHAPTER III.

"GREGORY dear, do you believe in ghosts?"

The question was propounded by Mrs. Tregarthan. Not the lady of the manor, who distributed discomforting tracts and juvenile physic at St. Bedwas. This speaker was young and winsome, and fair to look upon. But the face usually so happy and bright, was quite grave, as her loving blue eyes rested on the man whose name she took very soon after her impetuous husband made that memorable journey.

"Do you believe in ghosts? Are there such things as haunted rooms?"

"Well, yes," he rejoined. "As a Cornishman, of course I do," with a smile for her gravity. "The studios of most of the fellows I know are haunted by the same unpleasant shade—the ghost of chronic impecuniosity—which sometimes takes a very tangible shape indeed."

"Gregory, I really am not jesting."

"Nor am I," he laughed. "You give me an idea of quite a novel branch of high art. Only fancy the scope in 'Hamlet' and 'Macbeth'! Why, Jane Barnard's sister might ask any price for these rooms, if she could guarantee an obliging ghost, kept on the premises, and willing to be a model."

The girl did not smile. Nervously she glanced round an old-fashioned chamber, in a rambling, old-fashioned London dwelling, and away to where a curtained doorway led into Gregory's painting-room.

"You may laugh," she rejoined gravely. "But there is something—something strange here. I have felt it many times lately. I say 'felt' it for want of a better word. A kind of knowledge of being watched by something."

"My dear child," and Gregory saw that she really was distressed, "you are out of sorts, and no wonder. This gloomy old house, this busy London, make a sad change after the sea, and the cliffs, and the Cornish wild moorlands. We must try and see it all again as spring advances. Meantime, I must not leave you of an evening."

She shook her head.

"It is not then, Gregory, not so much when I am by myself as when we are together, quietly talking. Last night, as we sat here, I felt that we were not alone. I knew that each word of ours was heard by other ears; that eyes were watching us—nay, I could see them, I am sure I could. Yet I, myself," and her pointing finger trembled at the reminiscence, "had closed those curtains. And—and—I heard stealthy footsteps in there."

"You dear, silly little goose!" he answered fondly, as he drew her to him, till the fair head rested on his breast. "And you never said anything. Why should there not be footsteps? We are not the only people in the house."

"I did not say anything," she whispered, with courage returning in his fond embrace. From what evil would not that protecting arm shield her? "You would only have laughed, sir, even as you are doing now, sir."

"A true Cornishman does not laugh at ghosts," with assumed gravity.

"But when you left me," Winifred continued, "I was very brave. For I searched everywhere; especially, though I dreaded to go there, in the painting-room. And what do you think I found?"

"I dare not hazard a guess, darling. Perchance a strange cat."

"I found nothing!"

"Just what I expected," interpolated Gregory Tregarthan.

But she laid her hand on the mocking lips.

"Nothing to see. But some one—something had been there. The curtains were parted in the middle. The door which leads out into that dismal corridor was open. More than that, those same footsteps passed through it as I approached."

"I must ask the mistress of the house about it," said the young man. "Even a ghost has no right to a London lodging without payment. Or perhaps my old nurse can enlighten us. Living under the same roof, possessing a goodly store of Cornish superstition, Jane Barnard may have the same supernatural privileges as yourself."

"I have asked Jane," said his wife with a smile of triumph. "Jane and her sister too. They were both strange and confused in their manner, and pretended not to understand me. Gregory, I am convinced there is some mystery in this house."

"Therefore, dear, we will leave it very soon."

Lightly as he had spoken, the girl's revelations had impressed him. More than that, even as they had been talking, he had fancied a quiet footstep in the next room. And he was listening keenly, although making no sign.

"I am getting on very well, and am so thankful for your sake, darling. My mother is going to reside for an indefinite time with her relatives in the North, and, as I told you, I think I can let the Hold. Why, I shall be quite awfully rich."

"But Paul Tregarthan," doubtfully, "what will he do? And now, he is buying back all the old lands."

The owner of Tregarthan Hold laughed just a trifle bitterly.

"I do not know that we need concern ourselves with Uncle Paul's future. Our present does not trouble him. I imagine that astute individual can take care of himself. The wealth of a porcine commercial magnate enables him to live anywhere, and for the matter of that, the Hold is as free to him as any other tenant. I cannot forget that I, his only brother's only son, have hardly seen him since his return to England."

"Yet you bear him no animosity, Gregory? Say that you do not," pleaded Winifred, as her husband's brow darkened. "I should be so sorry, for it would be my doing."

"Animosity? No, indeed, dear one. He takes his path in life, even as I take mine, and well for him if he had found the same happiness. I ask him for nothing, he offers me nothing, not even his hand, which I would gladly grasp. But I must let the Hold for your sake—for mine."

"And I have robbed you of it, my own. Can you never live there again?"

"Never is a long word, dear," kissing away the gathering tears; "I hope, I pray, that my old home may be mine once again. But it may not be yet. Our small means could not maintain it. The hill of the world has to be climbed first. Yet, if I never see St. Bedwas again, I would deem it well bartered for your love."

The young man paused abruptly, and she failed to notice his abstracted look, as the girl's ghostly suspicions occurred to him with a certain force. Surely he had heard footsteps. And if mistaken in that, there could be no error about a well-known cold draught sweeping in through the studio-door. Gregory was intimately acquainted with that particular draught. It always made a dead set at his knees when at work, and he could swear to it in a thousand, even as he could swear that the door was no longer closed, though his own hand had fastened it.

"Winifred," he said quietly, "will you go upstairs for me? My favourite pipe is about somewhere."

It was purely an apocryphal errand. The article in question was resting in his pocket. He knew it, but was anxious she should leave him.

Alone, Gregory Tregarthan's actions were peculiar. Rising from his chair, with every sense keenly sharpened, but to all appearance undisturbed, he gradually worked his way towards the curtain, which he distinctly saw move, then quickly he dashed it aside and passed through, to find—not a ghost; ghosts do not wear garments on which strong hands can lay a tangible grasp, ghosts possess not harsh cracked voices, and a ghost must have been on very intimate terms with him indeed, to call him Gregory.

When Winifred returned from her unsuccessful quest, she found the young man very serious and thoughtful. When he left her the next day he was serious and thoughtful still. He was more serious, more thoughtful, when he returned in the evening. Then he said:

"Winifred, congratulate me! I have let the Hold for a better sum than I dared to dream of. No, not yet, dear one; I have better tidings still. The new tenant is a man of unbounded wealth."

He is simply insane on Cornish scenery, and has given me an unlimited commission for pictures around St. Bedwas."

CHAPTER IV.

"WHAT a lot of things have happened in the past six months, and hardly a single one to be regretted. It seems so long ago, that I fancy the old home ought to be showing the ravages of time."

So spoke Gregory Tregarthan, as, his wife by his side, he saw again the turrets of the Hold.

The place was, indeed, little changed. The shrubs perhaps were better trimmed, the drive more carefully tended than before, but there was nothing else to mark the new reign—a month old then, since Winifred detailed her ghostly suspicions.

The sunlight of the west was fading away in a glowing crimson glory. The evening mists were rising over the moors to soften the rugged grandeur of the Cornish cliffs, sweeping in gently from the quiet sea, whose murmur, the only sound to break the restful calm, seemed welcoming them back.

"Are you glad to see it all again, dear one? Does it appear familiar?"

"Hardly that," said Winifred, and her voice was very grave, even sad. "You forget, Gregory. It was never very well known to me. I was a poor school-teacher, with no right here. I scarce ventured to intrude more than once or twice within those hard-hearted old gates. I feel myself on forbidden ground now."

"Well, sweet, as a matter of fact, we are on forbidden ground—at least you are."

He smiled very brightly, with a happy look not at all becoming in a trespasser.

"I have a certain business here—on my employer's premises—a right of way to the studio, at least. But I have not brought you all the way from town merely to see the outside of the house. At all events I may show you the rooms where I have to work."

He passed with her into the wide hall, the doors swinging back silently before them; and they stood amidst the relics of his race. Battered armour was on the walls. Helmets and shields, lances, swords, the trophies of war and the chase, from a long line of brave ancestors, were all around. Banners, tattered and war-worn, hung from the carved oaken beams, and the failing light of the evening shone through stained glass upon it all, and on her grave face grown graver still.

"I cannot bear this, husband. It makes me so sad—so sorrowful. I have thought of it all many, many times. But until now I never saw it—never realised what my hand had done. Oh, why did you—how could I let you—cast it all aside for my poor love? All these things seem a reproach. But for me it might be yours still."

"It is mine," he answered proudly. "Mine! and shall be mine still more some day, even though fickle fortune compels me to leave it to another a while—to Mr. Jobling."

"I hate the name!" murmured the girl almost indignantly.

"Well, I dare say, Winifred, its owner does too," he rejoined. "It is not a pretty patronymic, and does seem a trifle out of place and incongruous here. But everyone must have a name of some sort, and Mr. Jobling is not a bad fellow. Artists, even those at the top of the tree, may not select their patrons on account of names. It is good enough for a cheque-book. Come, darling, let me show my workshop."

"Oh, Gregory! How charming it is! I never dreamt of anything like this," and Winifred repressed a little cry of admiring wonder.

Her husband had drawn aside a curtain of heavy velvet, not like that faded baize, behind which the girl used to imagine all sorts of horrors, in the home she had left, and she stood in what was to be his studio.

The light was failing fast outside, and much of the large room was in shadow, save where, in the centre, an antique silver lamp was burning. Its gleam fell on the polished floor, strewn here and there with costly skins and rare Oriental rugs; on carved oak, on splendid bronzes, on curiously-fashioned weapons, on mediæval brass-work, on bric-à-brac from every part of the world, such as money can command, and the artist's soul delights in.

"I am glad you like it, dear one," he said. "You can hardly see it in this gloom," and the young man turned the lamp higher. "But you shall examine it all to-morrow."

"Gregory dear, am I to—shall I ever come here again?"

"Certainly," was his assured response. "You shall come here and see me work as often—as much as you like. It is an agreement with the owner of it all—with Mr. Jobling."

"Gregory, what is that?"

At the far end Winifred had caught sight of a mass of drapery, which in the obscurity had seemed to stir.

"An artist's wife," he laughed, "and unacquainted with a lay figure."

"But I thought—I fancied it was moving."

"It had no business to, then," and he laughed again. "That is not carrying out the contract. You see, dear, it was not quite fair to leave our old friends in town, and so your ghost is down here with us. Prepare yourself for a surprise."

Gregory Tregarthan left her side. He tossed away a huge hat, a disguising great cloak, and disclosed—not the "Bravo of Venice," but a spare little man, whose fingers clutched a short pipe, suffered to go out for once.

"The best friend we have in the world," and her husband's voice trembled in spite of himself. "My employer—Mr. Jobling," and Uncle Paul Tregarthan himself stepped forward to kiss her.

"I do not understand," gasped astonished Winifred, her gaze wandering from one to the other, and to a fresh personage, who attired in crisp, rustling black silk, attended by the jingle of keys, looked the picture of a highly respectable housekeeper, and was—Jane Barnard.

"Will you tell her, uncle?" said Gregory. "I am a little too happy for talking."

"Yes, dear boy."

The two men grasped hands, and Winifred had never fancied that Paul Tregarthan could speak so jovially.

"Wait just a moment."

Uncle Paul was lighting his pipe. Perhaps it was to hide his own emotion, but there was something in the action which carried her thoughts back to the past troubles, to the little school-house on the moor, to the man who had appeared so hard and merciless, so cruel then.

"I did not know anything about you once, my dear," went on Uncle Paul. "What I had heard was from this lad's mother, and—there, I must say so—it was not to your advantage. I understood you to be a cunning, designing young person, who had entrapped my nephew. I make no doubt you did, my dear. He could not help it. And I envy him his luck. Well, I did want to break it off. Living so long in a republic, affecting to sneer at all the old world's ways, it goes without saying that I would have given my ears to see Gregory make a great alliance, with a countess, a duchess, a grand duchess, or a princess"—warming with his subject—"but it was not to be. Few dreams dreamt by Mr. Jobling," and the old man sighed, "have ever been realised, save the one of wealth, and that is not everything. You do not understand the name of Jobling. I traded under it. When I left England long years ago, ancestral pride was not for me, but I had too much respect for the old line to post Tregarthan over the pigs. Well, the boy's happiness was my care, and I did not know, Winifred, your love could be so true, so unselfish. Do not blame me," and he was speaking sadly. "I loved once, and—and—There, enough of that. I was deceived, and had learned to doubt it all."

A pitying impulse moved the girl, Uncle Paul's voice was so full of a weary sadness, and she lightly touched his withered cheek with her lips.

"Thank you, my dear," he said simply. "That was very good of you, and I take it as an earnest that we will be better friends in the future—that you will pardon me my mistrust."

"Rather, uncle"—yes, Winifred did call him so—"rather you should forgive me for thwarting your plans."

"Hush, my dear child! You have made Gregory a happy man; what more could all the British peerage do? Well, let me finish. I meant not to be unkind to the lad for ever. I thought to try this wonderful love by the cruel tests of time and poverty, and with the Tregarthan obstinacy, your silly husband foiled me there, for you were married. Then I made friends with Jane Barnard here, and her sister. It was not enough that they told me how good and patient you were. Still unbelieving, they smuggled me into the house, and night after night I watched you, all unsuspected."

"No," interposed Winifred. "I was sure there was some mystery."

Uncle Paul kissed her into silence.

"I know, my dear. You thought it was a ghost. Well, ghosts, like other listeners, ought to hear no good of themselves. But this ghost did. Listen as I might, I heard no evil from those pretty lips. Never a harsh word of one who had been harsh to you. Nothing but hopeful, loving faith for your husband, and pitying kindness for a worldly, suspicious old man."

"You were the ghost, then?" cried Winifred; "and Jane Barnard knew it! Jane, how could you?"

But that respectable housekeeper could, and weeping a few happy tears on her own account, seemed no way ashamed of her share in the transaction.

"Yes, Jane knew it. She told me of your terrors, and I, convinced at length, was going to declare myself, when the ghost was laid, exorcised by your husband's exceedingly strong hand. It is a month ago," said Uncle Paul, ruefully touching his neck, "but I feel the grip of those fingers yet. Then we took counsel together, and prepared a pleasant little surprise for you—the more fitting, as this is the first of April."

Then came smiles and tears, sobbing and rejoicing. And there was a quartette, embracing all round, for Jane Barnard was not left out.

"How happy you have made us, Uncle Paul!" murmured Winifred. "You dear, unbelieving, kind-hearted, sceptical ghost. Only one thing is wanted yet," with a shadow of pain; "Mrs. Tregarthan—Gregory's mother."

"I think I can answer for her," cried Paul Tregarthan. "She is gone off in a bit of a huff. She will come round in time, but will not return here because she is going to be—Gregory knows all about it—married again herself."

"Married!" ejaculated Winifred.

"Why not?" said Uncle Paul. "Do you think no one has a right to that happy state but yourself? But she will do well if it bring her the same joy and peace which has come to us all on this most happy first of April."

Going to the Ball.

THE rhythmic beat of the horses' feet

Rang on the frosty road;
Away in the west, o'er the low hill's crest,
One star in splendour glowed;
On fields and fells, like sentinels,
Stood many a leafless tree,
And as we swept, by the watch they kept,
I thought of thee.

Over the ridge, where the grey-stone bridge
Arches the swollen river;
O'er the winding path, the oaks beneath,
Where the shadows lurk for ever;
Through the village street, where the idlers meet,
The flying wheels to see;
O'er the breezy down, through the little town,
I thought of thee.

Through the lonely park, where in boskage dark,
The deer in covert lay;
Past the wooded shades and the ferny glades,
Where the fairies love to play;
Then a sweep around, and a clash of sound,
And the lights of revelry.
And the carriage stopped, and the world's veil dropped
O'er thoughts of thee.

"My Lord Conceit."

(A SERIAL STORY.)

By the Author of "FRAGOLETTA," "DAME DURDEN," &c., &c.

Book VI.

CHAPTER I. FAME.

DUSK was falling over the thick autumn woods of Vaux. Lights gleamed here and there from the windows of the house like watchful eyes mistrusting the deepening shadows. Now and then the rising wind shook a shower of leaves from the branches, and then went sighing round the grey old Abbey, and rushing through empty corridors and passages in a weird and echoing fashion of its own.

The pretty mistress of Vaux walking through one of those corridors shivered involuntarily.

"It makes one think of ghosts," she said, and quickened her steps, finally pausing before a closed door through whose cracks a faint light streamed. She knocked, and then entered.

The fire-light was leaping up the wide chimney, and seated on a low chair before the flames was the outlined figure of a woman; she raised her head and looked round:

"Come in," she said. "I have done work for to-day; you don't disturb me."

Mrs. Dunbar closed the door and advanced. Another chair, small and cosy, stood invitingly opposite that already occupied. She drew it close to the fire and shivered:

"I hate this time of the year," she said. "Did you ever hear anything so mournful as the wind? Makes one think of ghosts, and all sorts of creepy horrors."

"Are there ghosts at Vaux?" asked a voice, low and musical, but with a tired sadness in its soft notes that spoke of trouble, and pain, and knowledge of life's sorrows—of something that had hushed youth's music, and brought in its place only faint and far-off echoes of what "had been."

"Ghosts!" cried Madge Dunbar. "My dear Beryl, of course there are. Could one have a properly authentic ancestral possession, without some history appertaining to it? There's one about Vaux. The housekeeper told me, and it gave me the horrors for a time. Cosmo laughed at me. What a blessing it must be to be a man, and have no nerves. By-the-bye, would you like to hear the story? you might introduce it in your new book, you know. If I were an authoress, I should be always on the look-out for information. I can't imagine how you can write at all, buried alive as you are. I do wish you'd come out of your shell. You really ought to. Why, do you know when people say to me, 'I wonder who on earth "Damia" is,' I am absolutely in agony to tell them, 'Why, she's my dearest friend, and her real name—'"

"Oh, hush, Madge," interposed that low, pained voice; "we have gone over that ground often enough. A woman situated as I am cannot bear the light of publicity. I don't want anyone to know me as the woman I am—deserted, suspected, friendless. Why should my private history be at the mercy of every chattering fool? What gain is it now to be known as Beryl Marsden, or 'Damia'?"

"I don't know about the gain," said Mrs. Dunbar, ringing the bell for some tea as she spoke; "I should think it was nice to be famous myself. I don't think I'd hide my light under a bushel. Why, the way you've got on is wonderful. Only three years, and already your name is quite famous."

"Famous! Ah, my dear, do you call mine fame? I just had the luck to write on a topic and in a style that hit popular taste for the moment. I had twelve months of trying and failure with that same book. I am still wondering what could have possessed Tonson and Co. to publish it. I am sure Colonel Dunbar had a hand in it."

"How modest we are," laughed Mrs. Dunbar merrily. "Our own merits count for nothing. Why, my dear, I always knew you were clever, but everyone says now you are a perfect genius. And you must be. Gracious! Fancy writing a whole book, page after page—chapter after chapter. To me it seems a perfect marvel. And such a book. Why, it's a household word now!"

Beryl Marsden smiled sadly.

"You were always my consolator and encourager," she said, looking fondly at the bright face. "I should have lost heart long ago if it hadn't been for you. Besides, I owe you the suggestion. I should never have thought of authorship myself."

"Oh yes, you would," said her friend, wheeling her chair round to the tea-table, which the footman had just set out. "It would have come by inspiration, or something. Why, years ago you told me you studied people because you were collecting materials for a book."

"Did I?" said Beryl with a faint blush. "That must have been one of my random speeches."

"I wish you made them now," said her friend as she brought her the cup of tea she had just poured out. "I wish I could see something of the old, bright, sparkling Beryl I once knew."

"She is getting an old woman now, dear—a woman who has had far too long an acquaintance with sorrow and with pain, to be bright, or thoughtless, or heedless any more."

"You have indeed had trouble—a mountain of it," said Madge tenderly. "I wonder sometimes you are alive."

"I should not be if I only sat with folded hands and thought of it," said Beryl with a weary sigh. "There is never a day in my life that I don't say, 'Thank Heaven for work to do and brains to do it with!' I can lose myself, and all memories of what I am, and what I have lost, in that, and that alone."

"I wonder what your worthy husband would think if he knew," said Madge incautiously.

The beautiful sad face beside her grew very white.

"Nothing I do can affect him now," she said slowly. "He misjudged me by the calumny of others. I care very little about justifying myself in his eyes again."

"I expect he is sorry for it now," said Madge Dunbar thoughtfully. "Mephistopheles rather over-acted his part, didn't he? His treachery did him no good and you no harm. I wonder sometimes you consented to a separation. I should have fought it out to the bitter end."

"And faced the scandal, the disgrace, the horror of it all? Oh, I could not! I would have consented to anything rather than that. Wretched as my married life was, I could not bear to see it analysed and discussed through the length and breadth of the land. And what could freedom be to me? Only deeper shame."

"Was he very unkind to you?" asked Madge tenderly.

"I suppose he would not think so," said Beryl. "We were only thoroughly unsuited. I—I don't like to speak of this subject, you know, even to you. I did not think he cared for me enough even to be jealous."

Madge Dunbar's face flushed suddenly.

"My dear," she said, "it was not that—only. Cosmo told me long ago. He wanted to screen himself at that time. Everyone knew the reason. All Simla was ringing with it. I should think Mephistopheles has often ground his teeth in wrath over the money wasted on that telegram. Failing Ivor Grant, he must have tried John Marsden. I shouldn't think he was an easy subject to wring money out of, though. I wonder what has become of the wretch!"

"Don't talk of him," cried Beryl with a shudder; "his name is always ominous of trouble. I hate its very sound."

"And poor Ivor!" continued Madge Dunbar softly. "How completely he has disappeared. I wonder when they will find the missing heir to the Court. They've been nearly three years over it now, and it looks so desolate all shut up and neglected."

Beryl Marsden only sighed. Her thoughts went back over a passage of years, sad, and cruel, and bitter years; which had changed her from a frank, bright girl into a suffering woman. Years in which she had striven to do her duty bravely and honestly, yet somehow always seemed to fail. With her children had come new hopes and tender sympathies, but they, too, were blighted in the uncongenial soil to which her own life had been transplanted. Then followed darkness and anguish, on which she dreaded to look, till like a rift parting the thick black clouds of sorrow came that sweet and manly sympathy for which her heart had hungered through starved, cold years of brave endurance, only to find—too late. Since then there had only been for her utter solitude of heart and life. All effort to justify herself in the sight of her husband had been unavailing, the truth being that he dared not show himself in England, and dared not have her out in his retreat among the hills. His own gaoler was a tyrant as unscrupulous as himself, and would have thought nothing of ordering his death had the whim seized her to do it. He was not averse, therefore, to turn the tables on his wife, and utterly refused to believe her own and her father's assertion of her innocence, or put his own suspicions to the proof.

"Some day," he said to himself, "it may suit my purpose to be magnanimous and forgive her, but not just now. I must teach her a lesson first."

Beryl had been three years learning that lesson. The first year had been spent at the rectory with her father, and spent also in setting herself to work at the only thing for which she felt she had any talent, or inclination—literature.

She was not sure of her fitness to be an author, and the first year had only added to her doubts, yet failed to quite extinguish that little spark which burns only in those who feel within them the power to conquer, as well as to achieve.

Beryl possessed that feeling in a remarkable degree. Obstacles did not daunt, difficulties did not baffle her. Having said in her heart, "I will succeed!" she simply went on in the path she had marked out for herself, turning neither to right nor left. Often discouraged but never hopeless, until now, after three years, success began to smile on her, and her nom de plume was already one of note and soon to be one of envy.

Looking at her now in the dim firelight, she did not by any means seem to agree with the typical idea of an authoress.

Only a pale, delicate, sad-faced woman, with an air and appearance more suggestive of the atmosphere of home than the arena of Fame. A woman who did not give any impression of power or genius, and yet possessed both in a remarkable degree.

Perhaps there is nothing more disappointing than preconceived ideas of celebrities. People always expect their looks to bear the impress of the gifts or talents with which they are associated, and not unfrequently refuse altogether to believe that a commonplace, ordinary-looking individual can possess a mind that is very far from being either.

However, Beryl Marsden had not yet run the gauntlet of public criticism, for only Mrs. Dunbar, and her husband, and her publishers knew her real name.

Once launched upon that treacherous sea of public favour, it was surprising with what eagerness and enthusiasm she threw herself into the profession she had adopted. Her life and thoughts seemed to hold nothing else. Experience of life and indomitable perseverance are absolutely necessary to genius, however great its natural gifts, and Beryl Marsden possessed both. Her whole heart was in her work and in the characters she produced. The sorrows and joys she had lived through were actual things to be transcribed—not phantoms to be outlined. Word-painting may be very beautiful, but it is not life, it cannot touch us to tears, or smiles, or laughter. No, that is an art unteachable, and marks the unapproachable difference between mere ability and genius. The former is a laboured effort to accomplish what the latter performs with no effort at all. It is the rare combination of the two which marks out the path of success, and brings to their possessor that laurel wreath of fame which thousand vainly covet.

A long silence had fallen between the two friends—silence filled by that thoughtful retrospect of her past, in which Beryl Marsden rarely indulged. It made her weak and sorrowful, it took the very light of hope from life; it made her say to herself:

"Of what use to struggle, to fight, to waste time, and thought, and energy? Will any single soul, out of the many who read or know me, have even one grateful or regretful memory for me when I am dead?"

Therefore, because thought led to retrospect, and retrospect to sorrowful misgivings, and misgivings in their turn to that inevitable cry of every tired and weary soul, "Vanitas vanitatum," she rarely allowed herself to indulge in them.

That one bright, beautiful romance of her life had faded away into the sombre colouring of regret. Regret for her own blindness and folly, regret for the sorrow brought on the noblest, manliest life she had ever known, regret for the passionate joys for which her heart had once thirsted, and which were never—never—to be hers.

In her writings alone such feelings found vent. In her picture heroes lived again and yet again that hero of her own dreams. Every energy of her nature, every gift of her mind, every thought that glorified her pages, were but so many tributes laid at the feet of the man who had called forth what was best in that mind, who had worshipped her so vainly and so well, and to whom she mentally dedicated all she did, saying to herself: "One day, perhaps, he will know, and feel a little proud of the woman he called friend."

On the whole, at this period of her life, Beryl Marsden was far less unhappy than a woman in her unfortunate position might have expected to be. The most wholesome, perhaps the only cure for sorrow is occupation of the mind. It is that idle brooding over trouble, that endless lamentation over the love, or the loss, or the suffering of life, that makes grief so bitter and so trying a thing. Life must be lived, be it ever so wearisome or so hard.

Beryl Marsden had learnt this fact, and even got used to accepting it, though she was only a lonely woman struggling against fate, with very little love or comfort in her life. Perhaps the ideal world took her out of her own, perhaps the people who talked with her, suffered with her, in whose joys her own lived again, and for whose sorrows her own tears fell, helped more than she herself knew to console her. She forgot in their companionship that her own life was so dull and empty. She felt that interest, and delight, and inspiration which every author—if he be worth the name—feels, as the children of his brain grow into life and being, and become actual realities, not figments—the substance of a shadow they have embodied, not the unsubstantial presence of that shadow itself.

Perhaps that time of creation is the sweetest of all. No alien voices come between the writer and his friends—no reviewer's scoffs brush away the bloom of fancy and inspiration; no cynical minds jeer at sentiment, or mock at pathos; no blame or praise of the world at large invade the sanctity of his chamber, and drag him thence into the cold, hard light of day.

Well, Beryl Marsden had served her apprenticeship and learnt by experience that writing and publishing are two very different things; she had not had much idea of making money, though she longed to be independent even of her father, and after three years of hard work she knew that her success was, after all, only problematical. Still, she had done something—she had got the thin edge of the wedge in, and was determined to drive it farther and farther. Madge Dunbar thought her wonderful, but then Madge was a mere butterfly of fashion in comparison with Beryl Marsden, and knew it too. That fact, however, did not prevent her loving Beryl with a wonderful, admiring, and most loyal love. In fact, her pride, and belief, and encouragement were her friend's sweetest incense at this time, and those periodical visits to Vaux were the brightest and happiest of her brief days of leisure.

So for three years had her life passed; so at the close of those three years it finds her now; a woman on whom success begins to throw the glamour of its smile—yet a woman who, after all, is true enough to the instincts of her sex, to long and long, as only a woman can, for one brave, tender heart on which to rest her weary head—for one voice which should whisper in her ear, not of praise or homage, or wonder or renown, but only the sweetest words which thrill her soul as never trumpet-call of fame did yet: "I love you—is not that enough?"

CHAPTER II. A GHOST-STORY.

"HAVE you fallen asleep?" cried Mrs. Dunbar with a sudden start. "You haven't spoken a word for a quarter of an hour."

Beryl roused herself with an effort.

"I—I was thinking," she said.

She rose from her seat, and stood with an arm resting on the oak mantel-shelf, and leant her head on her hand. Her face had resumed its expression of settled melancholy.

"You were going to tell me that ghost-story," she said, with her eyes on the dull glow of the wood-fire.

"Ugh!" said Madge Dunbar with a shiver. "Why did you remind me of it? This is such an eerie place, and the very sound of the wind makes one fanciful. Besides, I don't suppose the ghost-story would interest you at all, for you have a mind superior to superstition."

Beryl smiled faintly.

"For all that tirade, I know you are dying to tell me the story. Say on."

"Well," said Madge, settling herself more comfortably in her chair, "you know the north corridor; at least, perhaps you don't know it, for it leads past a suite of dismantled rooms that we never use. Well, hundreds of years ago, when Vaux was an abbey really, a beautiful young girl, daughter of an ancient Catholic race, was serving her novitiate here, and a very wicked and unscrupulous priest had fallen in love with her. The girl knew nothing of it, no more did anyone else, so says the story; but, of course, like most of the holy retreats of that time, Vaux possessed secret passages and doors, and all that, and one night the nuns and the abbess were awakened by fearful screams, and came rushing out of their cells to see what was the matter, and there on the oak floor of the north corridor lay that poor young novice—murdered. No trace of the murderer was ever discovered, and years went on, and the priest grew powerful and rich, and became a great Church dignitary; but it happened that one dark wintry night he was weather-bound on the way to some monastery, and obliged to put up at the Abbey of Vaux. The abbess received him most hospitably and proudly, of course, and was entertaining him with—not quite monastic fare—in her own rooms, when a message came to say that one of the nuns was dying, and was calling unceasingly for a confessor. So the abbess thought she would take the holy prior to the cell, as it was a great privilege for the humble sister to be shrived by so great a man. Well, as they got to the north corridor, the prior suddenly turned ghastly white, and began to tremble so much that the very teeth in his head shook. The abbess was amazed. 'What is the matter, holy father?' she asked. But he only stood shivering and pointing, and looking such a perfect picture of terror that the good lady was quite bewildered. The truth is that the prior could not move a step forward because that bleeding nun barred the way; but no one could see her but himself, and he was too frightened to say what it was he really saw. And all the time the poor dying sister was crying out for someone to hear her confession, and there outside the door stood the great and holy man, utterly unable to attend to her bidding, for, every time he took a step forward, that dreadful vision waved him back, and struck fresh terror into his guilty soul. At last, made desperate by the entreaties of the dying woman, the abbess left him in the corridor, and went on a few paces, and entered the cell. She said some soothing words, and then turned back to see if the holy man was able to do his duty. The corridor was empty! Imagine the consternation, the confusion, the terror of the whole body of chattering, nervous women. But, search where they would, look where they would, not a vestige of that holy man was to be found. He had disappeared as completely as if the ground had opened and swallowed him. Of course after this, all sorts of strange stories were told about the north corridor, and the nuns used to declare that they saw the priest's figure in his cowl and gown standing there, as they went by to their cells, and after several had died of fright, and a great many others gone out of their minds, the cells in that corridor were closed, or only used for punishment-cells. And now for the conclusion. Years and years after, when most of the abbeys and monasteries were taken from the priests and given by Henry VIII. to his faithful followers, Vaux descended into the hands of our venerable ancestors, and was turned into a habitable dwelling. Then at last it was discovered that underneath that corridor was a stone staircase leading to a passage that traversed the lower portion of the building. The entrance to this passage was through a small, square oak plank, let into the flooring of the corridor in a manner that defied detection, and opening by a spring inside the vault. At the time these discoveries were made, a human skeleton was found at the foot of the stairs, the skull broken in such a way that it showed death must have been instantaneous. And now there's the story for you. Isn't it thrilling?"

"Very," said Beryl with a faint smile. "Rather improbable, though. Who could have opened the spring, and shot the priest down the trap-door if the secret staircase was unknown?"

"The ghost, of course," said Madge. "Don't you see the sublime justice of the affair? The priest came up that stair to kill the ghost—by the way, she wasn't a ghost till afterwards, but that's a mere detail—the ghost comes up the stairs and kills the priest. The only weak point of the story seems to me that—"

"That no one found the trap-door?"

"Oh no. That no one seemed to possess any olfactory organs," laughed Madge. "Fancy living for years above a mouldering body, and not discovering it!"

"The corridor is not haunted now, I suppose?" said Beryl.

"I beg your pardon. Did I not tell you the family considered it absolutely necessary to have a ghost laid on the premises—quite as much so as the water? Oh yes, the good prior still takes his 'walks abroad,' in and out of season, and always in that same corridor. I think it's a pity he does not vary the locality a little; even ghosts must find one spot for perambulation a trifle monotonous."

Beryl's lip curled with faint contempt.

"Has anyone professed to see it?"

"You are sceptical, I see," said Madge Dunbar lightly. "Well, so was I. But I do most solemnly assure you, Beryl, that I actually did see it once."

"My dear child!" exclaimed her friend, "don't try and impose on me any further."

"It's not imposing on you," said Madge gravely. "It was some years ago now. In fact—why should I mind saying it?—it was when you were staying here that Christmas, and—and Ivor Grant. You know what a number of people were here? And one night I was looking at some rooms with the housekeeper that I wanted arranged for some coming guests. I had never heard this ghost-story then, and was going along the corridor quite unconcernedly, when I saw before me a tall figure in an odd sort of black robe. I wondered who it was, and called out. At the sound of my voice it turned, and I caught a glimpse of a pale face and glittering eyes under the shrouding cowl. I can't tell you for a moment what a horrible feeling it gave me. I stood quite still, I was so frightened, and then, quite suddenly, it seemed to melt away, and there was nothing."

"Fancy!" said Beryl laconically.

"Fancy, indeed!" said her friend with an indignant glance. "It was nothing of the sort."

"Well, did you go along the corridor, and see if anyone was hiding there?"

"No—o," said Madge doubtfully; "I was too frightened."

"That's how all ghost-stories are so weak," said Beryl. "People never try to trace them out. They see something, and terror and imagination do the rest. The stories never lose in the telling, you know."

"I am perfectly convinced I saw the ghost of the Abbey," said Madge decidedly; "and nothing would induce me to go through that corridor at night—nothing in the world."

"Wouldn't you come with me?" asked Beryl, smiling. "I really feel very much inclined to brave the ghost."

"I hope you won't," said her friend energetically. "It's all very well to make fun of ghosts and supernatural things, but I'm sure there's something in them for all that."

"Air," remarked Beryl concisely.

Madge shook her head in pretended wrath.

"Sceptic, beware! Perhaps you'll say there's no such thing as magnetism or clairvoyance, or feelings that come by inspiration, like antipathy—instincts that warn us of something to be avoided, and which, if disregarded, invariably lead to harm. Did you never feel such an antipathy?"

"Yes," said Beryl in a low voice, "once."

"And who was it gave you the feeling?"

"Count Savona."

"Ah," said Madge quietly, "you see my theory is right. You have seen very little of that man, yet you felt he was repugnant to you, and he has worked all the harm of your life. I do wonder what has become of him," she added abruptly. "I would give anything to know."

"We are leaving the field of mysticism," said Beryl. "After all, the count has done as much harm as lies in his power. Why did you bring him up, Madge? It always makes me feel uncanny."

"Well, let us drop the subject," said Madge, rising with a laugh, and pushing back her low chair in order to stand beside her friend. "It is about time for me to dress. You might come down to dinner for once," she added, "and help me entertain the county fogies."

Beryl shook her head.

"Don't ask me to break my rule, dear. Besides, I am much happier here. I can always work best at night."

Madge shrugged her pretty shoulders.

"Each to his taste, and certainly yours would not be mine. I hate solitude."

"I am never lonely now," said Beryl, glancing at the piles of manuscript covering her writing-table. "I have plenty of companions there."

Madge was silent for a moment. A step sounded outside in the corridor, and she was listening to it, wondering whether Colonel Dunbar was coming for her, as he often did. A knock, and then the door opened, and she saw her husband standing there with the post-bag in his hand, his usual bright face clouded and troubled.

"Letters?" she said, and stretched out her hands lazily.

He gave them her in silence. He was looking at Beryl, and she, catching his gaze, felt her heart give a strange, sudden throb.

"You—you have heard something?" she said hurriedly.

Madge looking up from her letter at sound of the sharp, troubled ring in her friend's voice, read too that strange expression in her husband's face.

"What is it, Cosmo?" she asked timidly.

He held an open newspaper in his hand, and at their joint questioning he pointed to a paragraph contained in it.

"Shipping list," murmured Madge vaguely. "What of that?"

But Beryl Marsden's face grew like stone. She saw plainly enough what was printed there. Only a list of passengers homeward bound in the mail-steamer from Madras, and midway in that list was her husband's name, "John Marsden."

CHAPTER III. THE HAUNTED CORRIDOR.

LONG, long after, while Mrs. Dunbar was entertaining the "county fogies," and lights were gleaming and voices sounding through the brilliantly-lighted reception-rooms, Beryl Marsden sat alone in her little "study," as Madge had named her sanctum; sat with listless hands, from which the pen had dropped, and aching brain from which all inspiration had fled—sat, wondering and conjecturing what she had best do under such strange and unexpected circumstances.

Why was her husband coming back to England? Was it for reconciliation, or the reverse? Would he demand her return, or widen still further the breach that treachery had created?

How distinctly she remembered when last they parted! How, in frenzy, and terror, and wild grief, she had accused him of being the cause of her children's danger, and scarcely paused to say farewell, in the agony of mind caused by Ivor Grant's message!

Then she remembered his unsympathetic receipt of the news that had almost broken her heart, his cool advice that she should remain in England with her friends until her spirits were likely to be less morbid and depressing; then her own illness and his long silence, and the vague rumours following—rumours on which fell, sharp and swift, the horrors of disgrace and ruin. After that all had gone wrong between them. He had hurled at her life the bitterest insult that can touch a woman. He had refused to believe in her innocence or receive any justification from her hands. He had left her with neither pity, nor counsel, nor means; left her in the most painful situation that can befall a woman; banned by suspicion, homeless, husbandless, moneyless. And now what would he do?

Conjecture showed her a hundred pictures, equally unlikely, yet equally possible, but in one and all she only saw herself enduring, suffering, struggling with the dreariest, emptiest life that ever showed itself to a nature passionate, and gifted, and faithful as her own.

How strange it is that some lives are so ordered, that thirsting for joy and sympathy, and full to the brim of passionate affection, of the capacity for giving and receiving happiness, they yet never can taste that tantalising cup, never drink one draught from the spring on whose borders their feet are stayed!

Beryl raised her head at last with a weary sigh, a sigh that echoed strangely in that quiet room. She might have been in some far-off desert for any sound or sign of human life about her.

The fall of the wood-ash, of the tick of the clock, were the only audible sounds, and she rose from her chair at last with a faint, nervous shiver, and stirred the logs into a brighter blaze.

"I can't work to-night," she said to herself. "I am thoroughly upset. Oh, Heaven, what will become of me if I have to go back to that old miserable life! I would sooner die now!"

Poor Beryl! sad, and tired, and heartsick. She had yet to learn how elastic may be the heart's capabilities for sorrow ere Death can still its weary aching, or chill its throbs of pain.

The wind still went round the house with plaintive sighs. The long empty corridors re-echoed to its sounds. She grew nervous and irritable, listening to those weird complaints that were like the sound of a human voice in pain.

"I can do no more work to-night," she thought to herself, as she put the scattered sheets together, and wheeled the table away into its recess. Then she opened the door, and went out into the dimly-lighted passage.

The little study set apart for her use in all her visits to Vaux was far removed from the reception and morning rooms. As she moved slowly along, her eyes turned half unconsciously to the staircase leading to that disused suite of rooms opening on the north corridor. Her thoughts were far enough away from any memory of Madge Dunbar's story; indeed, she was wrapped in a maze of sorrowful and perplexed thoughts, in no way associated with the ghostly legend of the Abbey. Yet suddenly a deathly chill seemed to fall over her, as if some numbing blast had swept across her face.

Involuntarily she paused, and her eyes caught sight of a figure moving swiftly along in the dim gloom of the unlighted corridor. Half in wonder her glance followed it. A tall figure in dusky, swaying garments, and drawn over its head a monk's cowl. Then swift as thought came the memory of Mrs. Dunbar's story, and Beryl caught her breath in a sudden spasm of fear. An instant, and she sprang up the staircase, her light feet echoing on the polished oak. The figure turned. From a window above a flickering ray of moonlight fell across the gloom, and showed her a white, bloodless face, with eyes that glittered evilly beneath that shrouding cowl.

For a second's space that look held her spellbound, as much by some memory re-created, as by the thrill of terror that ran through every vein. Yet, summoning all her courage, she thrust aside the fears that crowded round, and still advanced.

The figure retreated. That sight gave her courage, and quickened her own pursuit. But, as she reached the last stair, the moonlight faded into darkness, and the whole corridor was again wrapped in gloom. At the same moment, her foot slipped on the polished oak surface, and she fell backwards, clutching at the balustrade to save or break her fall.

Bruised and shaken, she rose at last, and again, as if in mockery, the flickering moonlight showed her the long, dusky corridor stretching before her. It was empty. Not a sight or sign of living creature as the moon-rays swept it from end to end.

Trembling greatly, she paused midway on the staircase, wondering what she should do. She felt she had not courage to pursue the intruder, whether material or ghostly, and a shuddering fear took possession of her.

Dazed and shaken, she groped her way back, and found herself at last in her own room. The reflection of her face startled her as she met it in the glass. Involuntarily she pressed her hands to her eyes as if to shut out their fixed look of horror.

"What have I seen?" she asked herself, and only the wild throbs of her heart answered the question. She sank into a chair before the fire, and there remained lost in deep and confused thought.

It seemed to her that hours had passed since she had left the study. Her limbs ached with the shock of that fall, and a large bruise was slowly showing itself on her white forehead where it had struck the balustrade. But she was unconscious of pain, or lapse of time.

The sound of Madge Dunbar's laughing voice struck on her ear at last like a jarring discord. The presence of the pretty little woman fluttering into the room in her Parisian toilette and glittering jewels seemed to her horribly incongruous and irritating. Madge was too excited and full of chatter even to notice her friend's strange appearance. She was used to see Beryl sitting in absorbed meditation, and accustomed to her prolonged fits of silence. She rattled on with a description of her dinner-party, and the dresses, manners, and conversation of her guests. Seeing, however, that Beryl never seemed to heed or hear her, she stopped abruptly, and took a survey of the white face leaning back on the chair-cushions.

"Is anything the matter?" she asked abruptly. "Mercy, you look as if you had seen a ghost!"

"I—I think I have," said Beryl Marsden.

(To be continued.—Commenced in No. 141.)

A Family Feud.

(A STORY IN FIVE WEEKLY PARTS.)

CHAPTER XIII.

IT occurred to Sir Raymond Bradwell with a vague sense of wonder, as he retraced his steps from Croyle Farm to the manor-house, that from the first word to the last of his conversation with Agnes Fenton, no direct reference had been made to the relations existing between herself and his son. The presumed engagement had been tacitly ignored. In face of a common and urgent peril, all lesser considerations had fallen out of sight. But it by no means followed that the offence was condoned. When once this cloud had passed it would be time to deal with the minor problem. The baronet assured himself that Agnes would understand this, and would know that a judgment upon Harry's youthful rashness and disobedience was for the present simply suspended. Somehow he had faith enough in the girl's good sense to believe that she would not regard the day as won, and all obstacles removed out of her path, merely because Harry's father had found it necessary to consult her in a very unconventional and awkward strait. Whether in the last resort—if Harry were obstinate and Agnes true to him—Sir Raymond would yield, was a question advisedly left unanswered.

According to arrangement, the interview between Harry and his father and his betrothed duly took place in the one cell of the little Hunstone detention-house. As was inevitable, it was a pathetic meeting, and yet there was an element of constraint in both the demeanour and the utterances of each member of the trio. A consciousness of the delicacy of the situation, and of the liability of his own words and acts to at least some measure of misinterpretation, weighed upon the baronet, in addition to the burden of shame and grief which he carried on Harry's account. And a closely kindred reserve oppressed Agnes. In the presence of this stern, grave elder—friend or foe she could hardly as yet divine—she could not possibly give vent to the half that was in her heart. Harry, in his turn, was bewildered by what he saw and heard, and while grateful to his father for bringing Agnes to his prison, was convinced by a peculiar hard gleam in Sir Raymond's eye, and by the pursing of Sir Raymond's lips, that the phenomenon implied far less than at first he had been eager to suppose.

The discussion naturally concerned, mainly, Harry's defence. This had been placed in the hands of a popular and clever Sellworth solicitor, and he was that very hour in Hunstone testing evidence and weaving together important facts.

"Of course it is absurd to believe you guilty, Harry, for a single moment," Sir Raymond said, "but I'm afraid there's a considerable prejudice against us in the village—the fools!"

"I am aware of it," Harry answered gloomily.

"Nadow thinks it will be advisable to employ a London detective. If we could discover the real criminal, that would upset the theory of these stupid country police in the most satisfactory manner."

"That is precisely what he urged upon me this morning. I gave him instructions to use his own judgment in every way."

"Exactly, and I reiterated your directions. Cost cannot be allowed to stand in the path. He thinks you innocent—I am convinced of it," Sir Raymond answered, eager to apply to his own heart the warmth and consolation of the assurance. "He holds that the motive of—of the murder was most probably robbery after all. He fancies that the assassin was either disturbed in some way, or took fright at his deed and decamped without his meditated spoil. He says he has known instances of this sort of thing, of a man's nerve failing him in the crucial moment, before now, and Nadow has a wide and lengthy experience."

Harry was silent, and the gloom upon his countenance refused to be dispelled. He had his doubts how far this hypothesis would commend itself to a jury, if ultimately his fate should depend upon the decision of that tribunal.

For a couple of precious minutes at the close of the conference the lovers were alone. The baronet had stepped into the small courtyard with the police-sergeant, who, for the time being, was in charge of the prisoner.

"Do not worry, Agnes dearest," the young man whispered; "I am innocent, and this will soon be proved. Who knows but that good may come out of this seeming evil yet? Every cloud has a silver lining, remember."

For his sake the girl kept up her spirits, and even smiled wanly at his forced enthusiasm of faith.

"At least there is one heart which can and does trust you altogether, Harry," she answered, "and whatever comes you will be certain that I am loyal. If only some door would open by which I could help you, and show to the whole world your freedom from this terrible stain!"

She little guessed how nearly this wish was hovering on the verge of fulfilment.

Agnes went home, and was astonished to be informed by her aunt that a second visitor awaited her.

"It is a girl, scarcely as old as yourself, I should imagine," Mrs. Francis Bradwell said, "and she seems half dazed by some trouble of her own, poor thing! I told her you were out—engaged; but she said that she must and would see you. She has walked from the station at Hunstone Junction. You will find her in the second parlour."

A moment later Agnes was face to face with Miriam Huke. The recognition was mutual and instantaneous. But how altered Miriam was! Pale, dishevelled, with heavy, drooping eyelids, and face haggard with an ever-present anguish, her whole appearance testified to the accuracy of Mrs. Bradwell's description. Agnes exhibited the marks of her suspense and sorrow; but this girl seemed to have tasted the very bitterness of despair. What could be her errand?

"You are surprised to see me, of course," she began rapidly, in a low, vibrating voice; "but you did me a kindness once—and a friend of yours is—is—charged with—an awful crime, isn't he?"

Agnes Fenton's interest was almost painful in its suddenly aroused intensity.

"Yes, yes," she said; "he is innocent—he is innocent, and you know it! I can see it in your face. Oh, tell me who did it—the murder!"

There was a brief pause, measured in seconds on the old-fashioned dial-plate, but in years to Agnes Fenton's strained imagination. Miriam Huke was fighting for some semblance of self-possession.

When the story did come it was in half-coherent sentences, with many a break between. Agnes listened, with tightly clasped hands, and conflicting sentiments of pity and relief—pity for the narrator, relief at the tenor of her narrative.

"I fear it was—my father," the girl groaned. "The gentleman—this Captain Middleford—came to our house on business in the morning of—that day"—a shudder seized the speaker—"and my father and he had a quarrel—at the time I didn't know what it was about; I can guess now. Then the captain went away, and the same afternoon my father disappeared also. I haven't seen him since. I fear—I fear—that he followed Captain Middleford—that—that beside himself with anger, he struck the blow." Miriam's voice was paralysed by a wild outburst of sobs.

"I am so sorry for you," Agnes said, a great compassion going out to this tried and weary stranger. And she came closer, and took Miriam's ungloved hand with an impulsive, protecting gesture. Alas! she was powerless to console the suffering one.

"I read the account of—of the affair at Hunstone in the newspaper," Miriam continued, "and my duty seemed plain. I was sure before that that something was wrong, else my father would never have stayed away. But indeed I do not think he had been well or quite himself for a long time. He had met with losses, and they had preyed upon his mind. My poor father! And—and I found proofs. This was amongst my father's papers; it is almost a confession."

She drew from some hidden receptacle the dingy-looking diary, and opened it. There, on the indicated page, Agnes deciphered Samuel Huke's inelegant scrawl as follows:

"Middleford has been here again, and at length I've forced him to an avowal of his intentions. He repudiates the bargain—the scoundrel! the cur! He did it in so many words, and as coolly as one could please. There should be room for no further mistake, he said. Mistake! Yes, I have made a big one—a mistake in supposing that there was honour amongst thieves—we are that, the captain and I—in thinking that I could depend on him when once the screw was loosened. And he shall discover that he's made a blunder too. He has led this country baronet by the nose so successfully that he can play fast and loose with promises, and throw away his old tool with contempt. Can he? I've nothing to live for—except revenge. It has been the dream of my life to make Miriam a lady; and he was bound by a dozen vows at least to marry her. It seemed a bright chance. For that I sacrificed half my fortune in his schemes. And now Miriam is forsaken, as I forsook her mother; and I am his dupe! He shall wed no other wife: I'll see to that. If he lives to float these Drincorn mines—swindle, like the rest—it sha'n't be my fault. I've a long debt to pay, and I'll pay it at once. Good-bye, Miriam, my little one, my doubly-lonely little one! You shall soon be avenged."

As Agnes read slowly on, her last doubts were removed. Here was indeed the key to the mystery.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE Hunstone police were astounded, and well-nigh indignant, at the turn events were taking. To be proved to have perpetrated an egregious error is not exactly delightful, even to men not marked out by destiny as the guardians of the social order. Even Prime Ministers have been known to lose their tempers when confronted by such an unhappiness. And where prestige counts for much in guiding moral weaklings and overawing wrong-doers, whatever detracts therefrom is surely of the nature of a public misfortune. Such was Sergeant Munn's opinion.

"It's a nuisance," he confided to Brentley, the innkeeper, "a confoundedly awkward nuisance! Here's a case as plain as daylight—everybody said so, crowner's jury an' all—knocked into a cocked hat by the chatter of a couple of girls. Why, 'twill be no wonder if, when we catch a fellow in the act next, he sets up a plea as he wasn't there at all. Ay, and gets evidence to prove it."

"Yes; but you never do catch anybody in the act; 'tisn't police rules, ye know," answered Boniface, chuckling.

The London detective, telegraphed for by Mr. Nadow, had arrived only to find his services forestalled. The clue so unexpectedly supplied by Miriam Huke had been followed, and was being followed, with sufficient success. Already it was certain that both the adjourned inquest on the murdered man and the forthcoming magisterial investigation would have a like issue—the release of Harry Bradwell and the removal of even the faintest stigma upon his character. As is invariably the way of the world—living from hand to mouth in its judgments—a strong revulsion of feeling had now taken place in the village in Harry's favour. Those who a few hours earlier had been foremost in the ranks of the accusers, were now wishful to persuade their acquaintances that they, at any rate, had seen through the absurdity of the charge. Of a sudden it had become quite glaringly obvious that so dastardly a crime was out of all keeping with the young man's antecedents and disposition.

The chain of facts ensuring Harry's vindication was destined to be rendered complete by a further melancholy discovery. Long before the breakfast-hour on the third morning the intelligence was speedily around the village that a body had been found in the stagnant waters of Hunstone Mere. "The rumour was well founded. A labourer, passing by accident along the brink, had observed a puzzling shadow where no tree existed on the sloping bank to play wanton freaks with light and shade. A narrower scrutiny revealed to the man's horrified gaze the outline of a human figure. He raised the alarm, a little crowd was soon collected, grappling-hooks were used, and the corpse of Samuel Huke, pawnbroker, commission-agent, money-lender, murderer, was dragged into the chilly autumn sunshine.

It was felt that identification was scarcely needed, except as a matter of form and a tribute to the genius of red-tapeism. But Miriam was brought to the little roadside inn where the remains lay, and with many a heartbreaking sigh and sob recognised the features of her erring father. He and the man of higher rank and better birth who had deceived him had quitted life's stage together. Whether, after hunting down his victim and accomplishing his fell purpose, the usurer had mistaken his path, and in hasty flight had stumbled unintentionally into those dark waters, or whether he had committed suicide, it was impossible to say. Public opinion—backed, certainly, by the final words of passionate farewell in the diary—was unanimous in clinging to the latter theory.

Harry Bradwell was once more free. As the convalescent measures his joy at the fresh vigour beginning to bound in his veins by the recollection of days and nights of sickness; as the returning exile measures his happiness at seeing again the white cliffs of Britain by the loneliness he has undergone in a foreign land; so Harry could but estimate his present relief by the pain and depression of spirit which he had so recently endured. The burden he had carried loomed heavier in the retrospect than it had actually been. In his cell the constant elaboration of plans of defence had helped to keep up his spirits.

It was a strange sensation to step out into the familiar streets and receive the congratulations of friends who did rejoice, and of friends who desired to rejoice—Mr. Keith in the one category, Sergeant Munn in the other. Brief as had been his incarceration, the regained liberty seemed a thing to test, to dally with, to but half believe in. There was a novelty about this return to the active, bustling world, very different to any earlier experience on which Harry's memory could lay its hand.

Harry's father was there to welcome him, and to drive him home to the manor-house.

"I was confident that it would all come right in the end," Sir Raymond said. "I had a letter of very warm apology this morning from Ockley at South Cedars, who committed you. Of course I know that he had no option but to sign the paper on the testimony the police brought forward. I should have done it myself if the cases had been reversed, and his son had stood accused. Murder is a grave charge."

"He was not in the least to blame."

"Decidedly not. I wrote and assured him that these unfortunate circumstances—especially now the matter was made clear—would make no alteration in the regard either you or I entertained towards himself and his family."

"It would be very ridiculous if they did."

"And I find, Harry, that I as well as you have been saved from a peril. I was thoroughly mistaken in Captain Middleford. To speak ill of the dead is not a pleasant task, but there are times when it is more or less inevitable, and this is one of them."

Sir Raymond was speaking swiftly, and in a lowered voice. It was evident that the confession he was entering upon was a very disagreeable one. In making it in any shape he was doing violence to his pride. Harry listened intently, far better prepared than his father guessed for the revelations that were coming. He had in his pocket at that very moment the memoranda which he had commenced to compile from Mr. Keith's notes, and from information obtained from other sources.

"Captain Middleford, under the disguise of friendship, led me into many unprofitable adventures," Sir Raymond continued, "and if occasionally I doubted his good faith, it was only for an instant. I did not dream that any man could so abuse another's hospitality. I was an easy dupe"—a world of bitterness and self-upbraiding echoed in the accents—"an easy dupe! He must often have sneered at the blindness of his victim. The speculations that he recommended I rashly ventured upon, and miserably I have paid the piper for my dance! And but for that felon's blow, I might to-night have been a totally ruined fool!"

"Sir!" Harry ejaculated. He did not like to hear his father talk in this strain. There was a reflected humiliation in it.

"Aye, it is true, too true!" the baronet said. "He, Middleford, had called my attention to the draft prospectus of a new mining company, the Drincorra, and he persuaded me that in that venture I should not merely make good past losses—no light inducement in itself—but make a large and permanent increase of income. He represented the undertaking as absolutely safe, even rivalling the solidity of English railway shares, and I believed him, and had actually made it my business at Sellworth to arrange for throwing all the remaining capital on which I could lay my fingers, into—the sea, or his pockets, and those of his precious confederates."

Sir Raymond gave a hoarse and unnatural laugh, and paused a little.

"For my own part I had come, almost by chance, to suspect his true character," Harry remarked.

"Which was that of a swindler. I have discovered since these events have taken place, that had the purchase of shares actually been made, and had the chief promoter of the Drincorra lived, every penny would probably have been lost beyond redemption. Middleford was scheming to rob the very benefactor whose bread he ate."

"I am not very greatly surprised at what you tell me, sir, considering the nature and the extent of the information I already hold," Harry said. And he rapidly recounted the facts of which Mr. Keith had put him in possession. "I should have approached you on the subject most likely that same evening," he added, "but for the catastrophe which unsettled all plans."

"And saved an estate. I trust I've learnt for the future to abjure speculation."

A long conference in the Manor library followed, and the embarrassments of the inheritance which must one day be Harry's were fully gone into and energetically discussed. Fronted bravely, the problem presented its gloomy features certainly, but was not one to necessitate despair. The humbled and contrite baronet was happier that afternoon than he had been for months, if not for years, past.

But Harry was not yet content. At length he rose, with a new huskiness in his voice, and a peculiar line of determination across his forehead.

"I am going down to my uncle's, to Croyle Farm, for an hour or two," he said.

A flash of anger crossed Sir Raymond's face, and for a second his eyes met his son's. There was no flinching in Harry's gaze.

"You want to see—that girl?"

"My future wife. You will admit that the desire is a natural one."

Sir Raymond was silent. The power of resistance was consciously slipping from him. Was the family feud at last to be healed?

Harry lingered for no permission.

CHAPTER XV.

SIR RAYMOND was perplexed and mortified, but scarcely so angry as he wished to bring himself to believe. He had expected this conduct on Harry's part, and the sensation of surprise being discounted, the remaining resentment was the less formidable.

Not that the baronet yielded without a struggle. Few things are harder to abandon than an old and cherished enmity. The habit of the evil, vengeful thought clings to a man or a woman like a language learned in youth. To exorcise its spell a real effort is required, and in this instance the force of tradition was behind the hatred. It had originated and received its earliest emphasis in the heart of Sir Raymond's father. Had not old Sir Harry sternly forbidden his self-willed second son to so much as cross his threshold after his alliance with Ruth Rayne?

Yet it was plain that Harry would be obstinate, and during the last fortnight circumstances had combined to play into his hands and to break down barriers. Sir Raymond felt like an indifferent swimmer battling in vain with a current too strong for him. He had gone through deep waters, and his trials had chastened him. He had lost his confidence in his own wisdom. He was subdued, humiliated.

For a full hour he sat in his library chair and meditated. Gradually and painfully he reached a decision.

"The girl deserves her reward," he soliloquised hoarsely; "there can be no doubt of that—no doubt of that. She stood by Harry staunchly, and she helped materially in the unravelling of the mystery. She is pretty, too—as pretty as she seems ingenuous and modest; I don't wonder at the lad's choice. She will disgrace the family neither by her looks nor by her manners."

If the maiden whose qualifications for the exalted position of a baronet's daughter-in-law were being thus weighed in the balances had overheard the praise, she would probably have been both pleased and amused. Her lover would have interpreted it correctly as a sign of approaching triumph.

At length Sir Raymond folded away his papers and made a move.

Mr. Francis Bradwell was superintending harvest operations in a field near to his farm, working early and late to garner safely his more than usually bountiful crops. Suddenly a gate swung on its hinges at his side, and a stranger entered. He looked up half startled and recognised his brother.

"Ray!" he cried, using in his mingled bewilderment, alarm, and pleasure the unforgotten boyish diminutive, and with equal impulsiveness he stretched out a sunburnt and toil-begrimed hand. Sir Raymond took it, which, to the men and gleaners smitten into statuesque astonishment amongst the sheaves, was a far more wonderful phenomenon.

"This is a fine day again, Francis; a splendid season!" said the baronet, speaking with a nervous haste which to keen ears would have betrayed his inward agitation in spite of his commonplace observation and the matter-of-fact tone in which he had tried to utter it. There was a dramatic publicity about this reconciliation which made him half regret his haste. But it was too late to retreat. And if he were to welcome Agnes, there must be a pact of friendship at whatever cost with these kinsfolk.

"You have my son here, have you not?" he added in lower accents. The farmer made a gesture to his subordinates to proceed with their several tasks, and then turned towards the house in company with Sir Raymond.

"I believe Harry is indoors," he answered. "I am very glad that this preposterous charge against him has been torn to shreds as it has."

Here was a topic on which both could agree, and around which conversation might safely revolve. In the course of a dozen minutes the chasm of twice as many years was satisfactorily bridged over. The alienation and prejudices of the past were never once referred to. The family feud had slipped into oblivion.

The baronet's ordeal was not yet ended. He had to undergo a formal introduction to Mrs. Bradwell and to her merry little daughter. But the awkwardness of this also was more formidable in imagination than in fact. Mrs. Francis Bradwell was deficient in neither self-possession nor tact, and she received this embarrassing visitor with a grace and an urbanity which was calculated to set the most nervous individual at his ease. Sir Raymond was compelled to admit to his own inner conscience that for good-breeding the farmer's daughter—condemned as she had been—was surpassed by no high-born lady of his acquaintance. Perhaps the heightened colour on the matron's face was the only proof that she comprehended how, after many days, her hour of revenge had struck.

Harry could scarcely believe his eyes as he saw his father enter. Agnes blushed shyly, and, the baronet thought (Harry would not have contradicted him), looked tenfold lovelier than ever. Sir Raymond had resolved to make no reparation by halves. He crossed the room to where Agnes was standing, and with a stately, old-fashioned politeness saluted her.

"My son has made his selection, I am confident a happy one," he said, "and I beg you will grant me the privilege of ratifying it."

The girl submitted, the rosy glow upon her cheeks mounting to her very temples.

"You have made a double conquest, Agnes," Harry whispered slyly; "I shall be jealous soon."

Whereat the dangerous dimness in the damsel's eyes cleared away, and a rippling, April smile broke out.

In the course of the lengthy conversation that followed, the name of Miriam Huke was mentioned.

"Poor girl! the shock of these events has been terrible, almost enough to upset her reason," Agnes said, "and no fault could possibly be imputed to herself. Like Harry, she is an innocent sufferer."

"And lonely too, I presume," replied Sir Raymond. "Cannot we devise some scheme to assist her?"

"I am writing to-night to a friend in town. Frank Neale I can thoroughly trust, and he will go to Sussex Row and make enquiries," Harry said.

"A matron's assistant is wanted at the Sellworth Infirmary, perhaps she would accept that post. The duties are light, and no doubt I could procure Miriam the appointment," suggested the baronet.

"I should imagine that a change would be good for her in every way," Mrs. Bradwell replied, "and Sellworth will be far enough removed from the scene of the crime to prevent melancholy thoughts springing out of the association."

The upshot of the discussion was that by the end of the quarter Miriam Huke was domiciled at Sellworth, and preparing to find relief from the dark shadows of her own bygone life in doing good to others.

At Christmas there was a wedding at Hunstone, and the whole village was rejoicing.

"The old manor-house yonder has never seen a bonnier bride," said Host Brentley, of The Swan, speaking with the authority of a judge of beauty, and no loiterer within his bar was rash enough to dispute the verdict.

(Concluded.—Commenced in No. 149.)

A Year in Our Lane.

I KNOW a lane, by poet never sung,

Where, when the sun has melted winter snows,

But bare trees tell us that the year is young,

Amid the moss, the first shy primrose blows.

First here and there, after long search, we find

The pale sweet blossoms, that so coyly hide

Beneath their leaves, but, if the spring be kind,

Right soon they gem the banks on either side.

And when the primrose gold no more is seen,

The hedge above puts on its Maytide dress,

And clothes itself in panoply of green,

While hawthorn buds burst into loveliness.

Here, when the hawthorn snow has passed away,

The wild rose bends to kiss the ferns below,

And honeysuckle with its trumpets gay,

Looks through the hedge to where red poppies blow.

At last, when summer's treasure all is spent,

An autumn glory fills our tranquil lane,

Till 'neath a leafy pall, in calm content,

It rests until the primrose comes again.

Scared.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

"It is many years since it happened, yet the vivid recollection of that dreadful episode in my life will never fade from my memory. It is present with me now as though it had occurred but yesterday. I seldom speak of it, for it always—even at this distance of time—has a disturbing effect upon my nerves. But sometimes at night, in my dreams, it is there; or, when I lie awake in the still small hours of the morning, it stands before me. It is that that caused this portion of my hair to turn grey all of a sudden."

So spoke Mrs. Douglas, a handsome lady, hardly yet arrived at middle age, to three or four of us assembled in the comfortable library at Pencombe Manor, in Blankshire, one evening towards the close of last year; and her narrative made such an impression on me, that next day I committed it to paper, I think almost word for word as she related it to me. I subjoin it (with Mrs. Douglas's entire sanction), as possibly someone besides my wife may care to read the story.

"My husband was quartered with his regiment at Cawnpore, but had obtained a month's leave in order to go up country in quest of sport. We went up north, or rather north-west, as far as the neighbourhood of Roorkee, in the Valley of the Ganges, and were fortunate enough to be able to hire about the best bungalow in the place from a gentleman and his wife, who had been forced to go south on account of some law business, which was expected to last four or five weeks at the least. They were very pleased to get rid of the responsibility of home and servants during their absence, and I need not say we were delighted to find a little establishment ready to our hands. It was a case of sheer good luck on both sides.

"The reason Colin had taken me with him on his shooting expedition was; that I was far from well at the time, being scarcely acclimatised as yet, and the change of air was likely to prove beneficial to me. Besides, we—we were very fond of each other," this with a pretty blush as she recalled her early days of wifehood, "and did not like to be separated from each other then—any more than we should now.

"After we had settled ourselves in our temporary home, my husband, accompanied generally by two or three officers from the neighbouring military station, a native guide, and some beaters, would sometimes start at daybreak, and not return for perhaps a couple of days. I never felt alarmed at his absence, for I had a conviction that should anything happen to him, I should know of it on the instant.

"Know of it?" I asked incredulously.

"Yes. I am obliged to you for only looking incredulous, and not laughing at me. Coming—as well as my husband—from the land, par excellence, of second-sight may have had something to do with it; but I had a strong belief in what has been called a 'sympathy-wave.' This wave I believed was capable of being set in motion between two persons who might be strongly of accord, and acting as communicator between the one and the other in any crisis of life or moment of danger. Perhaps you will not think me so very foolish for my belief when you have heard all.

"Well, on a certain Monday, Colin had set out as usual early in the morning, telling me that it was most probable he would not be back till the evening of the next day. He had kissed me before he took leave, but I remember noticing it as strange that, after he had, as I supposed, finally bid me good-bye, he turned when he had reached the door, and, again taking me in his arms, said: 'Good-bye, my girl; take good care of yourself till I come back.' I laughingly said I would, knowing that I should only be separated from him for about thirty-six hours at the most. And away he went.

"What should I do while he was gone? First, I wrote a letter home, telling them all the news since last mail. Then I took up a piece of wool-work which I had been employed upon for the last six months, off and on. I am ashamed to say I hated needlework, and had I been the orphan-girl recommended by the young man in the poem, as a fitting sewing-pupil for Lady Clara Vere de Vere, I think I should have begged her not to have forsaken her flirting proclivities on my account. How I detested that particular flower on which just then I was engaged! I had but completed three petals in two months, so I leave you to guess when it was likely I should finish the remaining twelve or fourteen—to say nothing of the rest of that nauseating nosegay! Of course I was young and foolish then. I have grown wiser with my years. After an interview of about a quarter of an hour—no more—with my petal, I rang the bell for my 'bawarchi,' in order to discuss ways and means. But he did not make his appearance, so I ran to the kitchen; only, however, to find it empty. I suddenly remembered that it was a Hindoo feast of some kind, and that, although Colin had given permission to one or two of the servants to observe the holiday, he had left strict injunctions that I was on no account to be left unattended. But the ways of Hindostanee servants are 'peculiar.' Those among our little household who had absented themselves without leave would have the skilfully-prepared lie ready in their mouths against their return, and so plausible a tale would they unfold that it would be next to impossible to convict them."

"Were you not afraid when you found you had been left alone in the bungalow?" one of us asked.

"Not in the least—what was there to fear? so I thought. It was certainly annoying to be left without your cook when you were bent on discussing household affairs; that was all. So I sat down to the piano. It was fortunate for me that the wife of the gentleman from whom we had rented the bungalow was a musician, for a capital Erard in the drawing-room was the result. Now of music I was really fond, and was generally considered a remarkably good player—at least, I was by Colin, but then he may have been prejudiced."

"What should I play? As a beginning I indulged the four walls—much more attentive listeners apparently than the talking noodles of London afternoons—with Gungl's last. Next my ambition prompted me to attempt Beethoven's 'Sonata Appassionata,' but found that the artistic soul within me was hardly equal to coping with its many difficulties. Result of the first trial—dismal failure. Again I attacked the citadel; this time I mentally chronicled—with slight confusion of metaphor—'decided improvement in the patient' (for I was, very)—it sounded like a bulletin outside the door of an illustrious sufferer! I was now becoming engrossed in my work, and struggled bravely through shoals of flats and quicksands of sharps. I would try to give at least a fair, though necessarily amateurish, rendering of the piece."

"What was it that made me pause in the middle of one of the least difficult passages—one which I had already waded through with some degree of comfort, and had looked forward to, as to a kind of musical harbour of refuge? What was it that made me instinctively look over my shoulder? There was not a sound in the room to distract my attention. But I felt there was some other living thing in the room besides myself."

"I looked slowly round in my chair, and the sight that met my gaze transfixed me to the spot. I held my breath and stared in the direction where stood that living thing—a large snake, glistering, smooth, flat-headed, and with the stony, pitiless eye of his kind."

"He had uncoiled himself to nearly his full height, and stood with head erect, motionless. No sign of life appeared to be in him save the occasional darting forward of the cruel forked tongue and the low hissing sound that issued from the hard, thin lips."

"What could I do? I was too terrified even to scream; besides, who could have heard me? The servants were out. I was alone with the creature. I dared scarcely draw my breath, for I felt that if I stirred a muscle the thing might dart forward and close with me. I had heard that with head elevated, as if to bury their fangs with greater energy, they threw themselves upon their prey with a fierce and sudden bound."

"Thought is never quiescent; the brain, no matter what the terror endured, must fulfil its functions; so thought flowed on as I sat appalled at the sight before me. The snake had been attracted by my playing; he had, noiselessly and unmolested, glided into the room, and was fascinated by the music. These were the conclusions at which my thoughts arrived. It was evident that when I stopped he would be dangerous. While I played I was safe. All the signs preparatory for a spring were there, as though he desired revenge for being even momentarily deprived of his musical treat."

"With an almost imperceptible movement I cautiously reached one hand back to the piano, and touched a note. In a moment a change seemed to come over him. His eyes no longer glittered fiercely, he appeared to rest them on me as upon one from whom he derived great pleasure; he moved his head, too, slowly to and fro to the music. Once more he stood spell-bound."

"My other hand now touched the keys, and unconsciously my fingers formed the notes of a dreamy waltz; from this I glided almost imperceptibly into one of the 'Lieder ohne Worte'; then to the tender 'Spirito Gentil' of the 'Favorita.' It is strange how I can recall these slight details, but they have, I suppose, become crystallised into my brain."

"Still I played, still the reptile seemed wrapt in the charm of the melodies I poured forth. It will scarcely be believed that I felt so safe while I played that all fear gradually left me. If I with my music fascinated him, he in his turn 'held me with his glittering eye.'"

"At length I had the courage to turn round and closely watch him. I marked the strange hood about the head, the black patches resembling old-fashioned spectacles; the sinuous body thickening towards the middle. I knew then that the creature was the dreaded cobra."

"Still I played. Still he listened."

"Why do not the servants return? Had I been in a reverie? I was awakened to consciousness by a feeling of extreme weariness. How long had I been playing? My back ached from the upright position in which I had been sitting. My fingers felt cramped. Had I fainted? Was it a dream? I peered with caution over my shoulder, half expecting to find the reptile a thing of my imagination."

"No; it was but too true. There stood the cobra—his eyes resting upon me. Still he swayed his flat head to and fro to the music; for when I awoke from my reverie—faint—whatever form of unconsciousness had taken possession of my senses—I yet found myself playing. What had happened to me? I myself was swaying to and fro. A feeling of dizziness was overcoming me—I felt very, very tired; the notes of the piece of music I had been playing before the snake appeared, were dancing before me—now flashing across the page—now glaring at me like ten thousand eyes. Then, and then only, I guessed the truth."

"I was becoming exhausted, and the moment exhaustion supervened I knew my last hour had come. Nothing could save me. The spell that held the snake at bay would be broken; the wicked head would be darted forward—the cruel fangs close on me—the slimy, deadly poison, loosed from its poison-bag, eat into my flesh."

"I dared not cry for help, for I knew not how the discordant note might exasperate the cobra. I would play on as long as strength were left me, and then—"

"I know not what I played—snatches of songs, sonatas, dances, in one wild jumble. I was too scared to begin or finish any air or set piece. At last I even burst into a song myself—for the moment I must have been mad. It was a French chansonnette with a laughing refrain—and I laughed—I shrieked hysterically to the music—I knew not what I was doing."

"Then suddenly I became quite still, for the marrow in my bones seemed to freeze within me. Something sparkled close beside me. I turned hurriedly. My cheek was touched by something sleek and cold, yet living."

"The snake had advanced towards the piano, drawn irresistibly nearer to the sounds it loved so well. Now it stood so close beside me that its head almost rested on my shoulder!"

"Oh, the horror of the moment! I do not know whether it is an ascertained fact that the human hair can stand on end; it may be but a fancy of the poet, without foundation in the laws of nature. Certain it is, my hair felt as though it were rising from my head. It must have been at this instant that this lock—the one nearest to the snake—turned white."

"For one moment I was perfectly calm. I listened—as if listening to someone other than myself—to the music I was playing. It was the 'Dead March,' of Chopin. Slowly the solemn tones rolled out. My fingers, from sheer exhaustion, almost refused to strike the keys; they were swollen and caused excessive pain. One note more. I must keep him off as long as I have the power left. I reeled on my seat—another chord—one last grand harmony. The two eyes beside me glowered like live coals. I fell forward—and—"

At the bare remembrance of the scene, Mrs. Douglas had fainted. We ran forward to help her, and her husband, who had been in an adjoining room with our host, hurriedly entered on hearing the scuffling of our feet, and assisted one of the ladies in reviving her. Before long she was herself again to all outward appearance. Major Douglas would not, however, hear of his wife relating the sequel to the story for fear of further excitement—a sequel as strange as the adventure itself.

The next day the major took up the tale at the point at which Mrs. Douglas had left it.

It appeared that he had not started on his shooting expedition more than an hour when he became conscious that he was being followed by two eyes. This he at first put down to the unromantic source of all ill, as some would have us think—the liver. Yet he was in robust health; the hearty exercise he was in the habit of taking should surely have prevented any evil from that source. Still, the eyes seemed fixed upon him; sometimes from a thicket, when he would get ready his rifle in expectation of big game. But when he neared the spot, not a sound, not a rustle, indicated the presence of even a bird. Once he declared he distinctly heard a strain of music. Then, somehow, from no distinct reason that he could assign, Major Douglas became nervous for his wife's safety, and sent back one of the beaters with all speed to the bungalow, returning himself in the direction of home at the same time. The man, with the almost incredible swiftness of a native runner, soon reached the house. He looked through the open window, took in the situation at a glance, glided noiselessly into the room at the very moment when Mrs. Douglas had fallen forward on the piano, and the reptile was about to bury its fangs in her flesh, seized the cobra, and, with a dexterous sweep of his keen-edged knife, cut the throat, almost severing the head from the trunk.

Whether Major Douglas and his wife were gifted with what is called "second-sight"—for each had the requisite amount of Scottish blood in his veins and to spare—I cannot tell. Whether it was that they both devoutly believed in the mysterious "sympathy-wave," and that from the belief sprang the supposed fact, I cannot determine. I tell you the story as it was related to me. Let wiser heads than mine wrangle over the problems contained in the theory of psychic force. After all, we can but return to the assertion of the Danish Prince to his old fellow-student of the College of Wittenberg—there may, indeed, be more things in heaven and earth than are dreamt of in our philosophy.

The Editor's Note Book.

THE state of Parliament and of parties gets more and more confused as the session advances, and so comparatively small a circumstance as the temporary indisposition of the Prime Minister leads to the demoralisation of his followers, and the almost complete collapse of public business. It is the fashion to abuse the House of Commons for this state of things; but I think the explanation is rather to be found in the system of elevating the Prime Minister for the time being into something like an irresponsible autocrat, until the shock of the next general election reminds him that he is but mortal after all.

AT one time Lord Beaconsfield, and at another Mr. Gladstone, is thus invested with a power which has no parallel in any other country in the world, to the complete destruction of the independence of Parliament, and to the grievous straining of our constitutional system. To such a pass have the quarrels and jealousies of party managers brought the political intelligence and conscience of the country.

WHILE public attention is fixed on the Soudan and on General Gordon's critical position at Khartoum, people seem inclined to overlook Cairo and the difficulties which are preparing for us there. The situation is simple enough, and may be summed up in one sentence. The Government of the Khedive has no power and no money. We have both, and it seems as certain as anything can be in these distracted days that an English Protectorate would restore order and solvency in a comparatively short time. Perhaps after we have heard of an insurrection and a massacre or two in Cairo and Alexandria this view of the case will begin to dawn upon the House of Commons, and even in process of time upon the Government.

IT is a pity that so distinguished an officer as Admiral Hewett should have taken a step which has led to his virtually receiving a reprimand from the Government. The proclamation of a reward for the person of Osman Digna may possibly be explained on the hypothesis, that the general vagueness and confusion which attend our position and proceedings in Egypt not unnaturally misled the admiral. And if people in authority on the spot are in doubt as to the character of the warfare in which we are engaged, it is not surprising that most people at home should fail to understand how it is that while we are with one hand hailing the Mahdi as Sultan of Kordofan, we should with the other be administering condign punishment to his lieutenant and followers in the neighbourhood of Suakin.

THE agitation for the retention of the plumed bonnet by the Highland regiments seems ridiculous to rigid economists and consistent philosophical Radicals, but in these matters—as well, happily, as in some others—the world is ruled by something besides strict logic, and imagination and sentiment are still powerful influences. Such things are intolerable to the Gradgrinds of the world, but statesmen ought to know that some respect for them is calculated to assist, rather than to hinder, the work of governments.

OF all the odd functions I have ever heard of, I think the unveiling of a monument to Samuel Pepys in the church of St. Olave, Hart Street, was one of the queerest. That Pepys's memory should be celebrated by a monument is, no doubt, quite right, but the mixture of service and public meeting by which the occasion was celebrated was not without incongruity. By his own confessions, which he never meant to meet the public eye, the author of the famous Diary was as persistent a follower of the world, the flesh, and all the rest of it, as has often been seen, and a very unlikely candidate for posthumous religious honours.

If anybody had set himself deliberately to discredit the Royal Commission on the Housing of the Working Classes, he could not have done his work more effectually than it was done by the members of the Commission themselves when they decided to conduct their deliberations with closed doors. Nor is the reason which is alleged for this step calculated to restore confidence. It is alleged that secrecy is necessary, inasmuch as the evidence will necessarily seriously affect property in certain districts, and that publicity is consequently to be deprecated. Rightly or wrongly an impression will get abroad that secrecy in these cases means jobbery, and the report of the Commission will be received with a certain amount of doubt, if not of suspicion. On the whole, I cannot help thinking that it would have been better if the examination of the question had been entrusted to a body comprising fewer persons of eminence and more men of business and practical experience.

ONE of the few things connected with the Belt Trial which can be looked upon with satisfaction, is the admirable judgment of the Master of the Rolls in dismissing Mr. Lawes's appeal. The merits of the case, and the real points at issue, have been so obscured by the clouds of envy, hatred, and all uncharitableness which have emanated from certain art circles and have been industriously increased by the efforts of the counsel for the defence, that a good wholesome breath of simple common-sense is a relief indeed. It is a pity that Lord Coleridge should not have addressed himself to this side of the case instead of surrendering his judgment to the dogmatism of the Royal Academy. Had he done so he would have probably saved Mr. Lawes and his friends a good deal of money, as well as having prevented the waste of much valuable public time. It may be hoped that after Sir Balliol Brett's emphatic utterances, no more will be heard of the persecution of Mr. Belt.

MR. CHARLES READE, some years ago, in his novel "Hard Cash," did good service in exposing the lax system under which powers can be obtained for the incarceration of alleged lunatics, and the same moral has been again pointed by the experiences of Mrs. Weldon. Most people will be inclined to share Baron Huddleston's astonishment at the existence of such a state of things.

ONE may, however, sympathise with Mrs. Weldon in the indignities to which she was exposed, without approving of a system which permits of the putting witnesses into the box for the sole purpose, apparently, of insulting them because she considers she has been ill-treated by her husband and General de Bathe. And, indeed, the very numerous witnesses whom Mrs. Weldon subpoenas in a speculative manner, although they know nothing whatever about her and her grievances, have, I think, just cause for complaint.

CONSTERNATION has been carried into many nurseries by a decision of Mr. Sheil at Hammersmith, that it is against the law to wheel perambulators along the pavement. Of course, if the strict view is to be taken, and the perambulator is to be banished to the roadway, its days are numbered. But I think that, if we had a full report of what actually took place before the magistrate, it would be found that the nursemaids implicated, were fined, not so much for wheeling their perambulators along the side-walk, as for wilfully creating an obstruction.

THE pavement was made, in the first instance, for pedestrians, and only in a minor degree for hand-barrows, go-carts, perambulators, and the like, and although there are hundreds of streets in the metropolis where such vehicles are not in the way, they are most certainly serious nuisances in crowded thoroughfares, more especially when their drivers, as is their gregarious custom, walk two or three abreast for the purpose of improving their minds by conversation. Circumstances alter cases, and before falling foul of Mr. Sheil's decision, as some of the papers have done, it is well to recollect that it may be useful to have such a law as that which he put in force, to serve, not necessarily for everyday use, but in case of need.

IT appears that when a police-constable sees a drunken gentleman in the company of suspected persons, whose movements are suspicious, it is no part of his duty to interfere for the protection of the portable property which the misguided drunken gentleman may have about him. His duty, as defined by the instructions of his superiors, is, when he sees suspected characters to watch them, and not to interfere until the drunken gentleman has been robbed or knocked on the head.

IT may be said that to put the power of interference in the hands of the constable, before any overt act is committed, would be dangerous, and so, if it were not safeguarded, no doubt it would be. But I cannot understand why the police should not be taught to exercise a discretion in this matter, and should not be ordered, while exercising great care in the case of persons unknown to them, to interfere at once when known criminals are concerned.

MISS OCTAVIA HILL, whose opinion on these matters deserves the greatest respect, is strongly opposed to giving gratuitous meals to children in Board Schools, declaring that the food would practically be a rate in aid of idle or drunken parents.

Of course there is some truth in this, although it does not go much below the surface. A good many parents would undoubtedly take advantage of any assistance given to the children, but it might not be difficult to devise means of preventing such an abuse, and it must be remembered that the parents of many of the children who are forced into the Board Schools are absolutely incapable of providing their unfortunate little ones with sufficient food.

MISS HILL has done so much good in a common-sense way that one is sorry to see her adopting these hard-and-fast lines of political economy, which, however good in their way, are not equally applicable to all contingencies.

THERE is a homely truth about the adage, "Charity begins at home," which is too often overlooked by persons of benevolent but impulsive minds. The Rev. Dr. Pigou, vicar of Halifax, appeals in the Times for funds to provide dinners for the poor rag-pickers of Paris. No doubt these unfortunate people are much to be pitied, but, as we know that the charitable efforts of many zealous helpers of our own poor countrymen in the East End of London are almost paralysed for want of funds, it is clear that the duty of those who can afford to give assistance lies on this side of the Channel. Miss de Broen's Parisian soup-kitchens are no doubt well deserving of being supported by Parisians, but it will be time enough for Londoners to think about helping her when they have provided ample funds for such objects as the London Cottage Mission's weekly dinner to poor children, to name only one deserving case out of many dozens.

C. D.

French Duellists.

AFTER the death of the detestable Count Larillière,* there sprang up in Bordeaux a tribe of duellists, obstinately prepared to contest with each other the succession to that vacant post of infamy which the Count had for so long a time filled without a rival. Among these were two, more audacious and resolute than the rest, who eventually remained masters of the field, and who for five years rivalled each other in effrontery and temerity, with the view of obtaining the wished-for title of "first blade." One, an Italian by birth, recently settled at Bordeaux, was the Marquis de Lignano, and the other, his intimate associate and friend, M. Lucien Claveau. Both were extraordinarily skilful of fence, and each recognised in the other the only foeman really worthy of his steel. They shared the glory for the time, but each hoped some day to kill his rival, and so enjoy the much-coveted succession to the deceased Count. Meanwhile, they seemed to be on the most intimate and agreeable terms. Each used to congratulate the other, with much apparent cordiality, on the successful termination of the many sanguinary and generally fatal encounters which they had wantonly provoked and followed up to the bitter end. They were always to be seen together, and at last took to living in the same house, even occupying a sleeping-room in common, in which each had, of course, his separate bed.

One summer morning, long after their usual hour for rising, their man-servant, hearing nothing of either of his masters, began to feel rather uneasy. He tried the door, but found it was locked on the inside. At last, becoming alarmed at the continued silence, he proceeded to force the door. Entering the room on tiptoe, he was somewhat reassured when he saw, by the dim light which penetrated through the closed shutters, that both his masters were in bed, and to all appearance quietly asleep. He was about to retire cautiously when his foot struck against something which gave forth a ringing sound as it rolled along the floor. He had evidently kicked against a sword.

A frightful suspicion crossed the valet's mind. Without loss of a moment he threw open the shutters, and saw at a glance that the room was in a dreadful state of disorder. Clothes were strewn about, furniture was overturned, candlesticks, vases, and various knick-knacks scattered over the floor, while near each bed lay a sword, the bloody stains on which too plainly indicated that a desperate encounter, a horrible and deadly struggle, had taken place between these men, who were lying side by side like two brothers under the same roof.

At the sight of all this havoc the valet uttered a terrified cry, on hearing which the Marquis and Lucien, both of whom had seemed dead, rose up at the same instant in their beds. Both were ghastly pale; their blood-stained shirts were torn to rags, and each man appeared to be covered with ghastly wounds. Spite, however, of the pain they were enduring—spite, too, of their weakness, and of the burning fever which consumed them, they preserved their sitting posture, glaring at each other; enfeebled, it is true, but still unvanquished. They remained thus for several seconds. Suddenly Lucien Claveau, overcome by some painful impression, fell heavily back, and gave vent to a loud sob. At this cry the Marquis bounded on his bed, as though he had been shot, a shrill, sinister laugh escaped from his thin ghost-like lips. "Oh, you are crying, are you," said he in a firm voice; "then you confess yourself vanquished, and I can now pronounce you a coward."

At the word "coward" it was Lucien's turn to spring up, and the valet, sole witness of this frightful scene, had to keep him from throwing himself upon the Marquis. "I, a coward! Ah, I have committed my share of crimes, been guilty of countless follies, rendered many people unhappy, but never has a living soul been entitled to say that Lucien Claveau was a coward, and feared to face danger, even if death should be the result. You, Marquis, are a far greater villain than I, for you are incapable of repentance, and impotent for good. A moment ago when I was looking at you, covered with wounds, I forgot my own sufferings and forgave you, and felt a real pity for you, which found vent in the first tears I have shed for years. And yet you taunt me, and still dare to laugh at all I am saying. You are incapable of understanding a heart that can repent and forgive. Well, know that I again hate and despise you. You have called me coward, and both must not remain alive. We are only a few paces from each other. Have you strength to hold a pistol?"

The Marquis made a movement and replied: "Ah, I understand, a duel with pistols, and then we shall have done with each other. Joseph," said he, addressing the servant, who was pale with affright. "Take the two pistols on the mantelpiece, load them, hand one to each of us, and then give the signal; or, better still, let us draw lots who shall blow the other's brains out."

"So be it," answered Claveau. "Joseph, you have heard. Load one of the pistols."

Joseph made a pretence of going to execute the order, but no sooner was he fairly outside the bedroom door than he quietly locked it, and ran for a doctor, into whose hands Lucien and the Marquis were compelled to resign themselves.

Lucien was conveyed by his friends to the home of a distant relative, a widow lady with several children. Assisted by her eldest daughter, a simple country girl, she attended him with so much care that Claveau recovered.

His heart was touched, and he spoke of marriage, promising a thorough reformation; and he did marry. To enable him to withdraw himself completely from his old associates, it was decided that he and his young wife should leave Bordeaux, if only for a time.

But just before they were to leave, chance brought them, in spite of all precautions, face to face with the Marquis de Lignano, who accosted Lucien, saying:

"I had heard that you were convalescent, but have always maintained the contrary, because, coward as I have called you, I did not believe you coward enough to hide behind a petticoat."

Lucien, merely replying "Never mind," passed on.

The Marquis followed, and again hissed his taunt into Lucien's ear.

The excitement consequent upon this meeting kept Lucien's wife awake all night, and next day she was too ill to leave her room. Her husband sat moodily by her bedside until the afternoon, when, finding she was asleep, he determined to go and exact revenge. Chafing with anger, he hastened to the café which Lignano frequented, rushed up the stairs, and, disregarding the salutations of his old acquaintances who advanced to greet him, made straight for the table at which his enemy was seated, who immediately rose.

"Well, here I am," said Lucien savagely, and hardly able to restrain himself from clutching Lignano by the throat.

"Pshaw!" said the Marquis contemptuously. "Go back to your petticoat; you are too great a coward for my notice."

Lucien, a man of great physical strength, at once seized him by the coat-collar with one hand, and by the skirts with the other, carried him to the open window and out on to the balcony, and, holding him over the street, said coldly:

"If you do not ask my pardon I shall let you drop."

The Marquis, in the grip of his powerful adversary, whom he knew to be thoroughly unrelenting, had nevertheless the audacity, or it may be the courage, to reply:

"If you are simply acting, and do not intend to let me drop, you are a coward."

At that moment an old servant of Lucien's, who had made his way upstairs and on to the balcony, whispered something into his master's ear, whereupon Lucien instantly carried the Marquis back into the apartment and released his hold of him. Hardly was the Marquis on his feet again before he sprang towards Lucien, and dealt him a sharp blow on the face. To the surprise of those present, Claveau offered no kind of response to this new insult, and the Marquis retired, saying:

"To-morrow, wherever you please."

The poor young wife, on awaking after Lucien's departure, had been seized with fainting-fits, and became delirious. Claveau held a brief conversation with two of his acquaintances, and then quitting the café in company with the old servant, drove with all speed home. In little more than half an hour he was at his wife's bedside; calmed by the sight of him, she slept. When she woke in the middle of the night, Claveau was still watching over her. After conversing affectionately with him for upwards of an hour, she gradually dozed off, and Claveau, so soon as he saw she was sound asleep, stealthily left the house, and proceeded on foot to Bordeaux to a rendezvous he had arranged with his two friends at the café the previous afternoon.

* HOUSEHOLD WORDS, Vol. VI, p. 116, "A French Duellist."

He was first at the appointed spot, but had not long to wait, for his two seconds shortly after arrived, and following close upon them came the Marquis and his seconds, when the duel immediately commenced.

For several minutes the two men fought with remarkable ardour; they developed all their most cunning tricks, and each endeavoured, in accordance with the approved rules of fence, to spit the other upon his sword's point. While the engagement was thus proceeding and Lucien was pressing his adversary closely, he suddenly said to him:

"You gave me a blow yesterday with your fist; as yet I have not deigned to return it, but I intend doing so before I send you, as I shall shortly do, to your last home."

As Lucien spoke, the pair being in close conflict, he rapidly passed his sword under his left arm, and, at the same moment, dealt the Marquis a violent blow in the face. Then regaining hold of his weapon, he assumed a defensive position before Lignano had time to recover himself, for the blow he had received had sent him reeling to the ground. This daring feat, the most audacious, perhaps, that has ever occurred in a duel, astounded the seconds. The Marquis was beside himself, and, wild with rage, sprang with raised sword upon Lucien, who calmly and confidently awaited the onslaught.

"Monsieur le Marquis," said he, "we are now quits."

The Marquis renewed his attacks again and again, but always to find himself foiled. Presently, by a rapid movement, Lucien disarmed his foe, and then, thrusting his own sword downwards, pinned him by the right foot to the ground. After a few seconds, Lucien drew out his sword, and handed the Marquis his own weapon.

The seconds came forward. Lignano made vain efforts to continue to stand upon both feet.

"It is useless," said his seconds, "and it is quite impossible that this can go on."

Glaring savagely at his adversary, he replied: "It is not over yet. I have still the chance of putting a bullet through your head."

The pistols were loaded. The impetuous Marquis, regardless of the pain he was enduring, hobbled along until he arrived at the point where he was compelled to stop; he was then ten paces distant from Claveau, who had not advanced a single step, and who remained immovable while he received the Marquis's fire.

"It is now my turn," said he; and, advancing five paces, he took a deliberate aim.

"Claveau!" exclaimed one of his seconds, "this will never do; it is nothing less than murder."

Lucien turned. "Look here," he simply said, pointing to a hole in his shirt at the shoulder, from which blood was oozing. The next moment he fired. The Marquis fell with his face to the ground. When they raised him he was dead; the ball had pierced his forehead and entered the brain.

Lucien, after his wound, which proved to be slight, was dressed, hastened home to find that his wife, alarmed at his absence, had relapsed. All night she was in great danger. Next morning Lucien was arrested by the police, on information furnished by one of the Marquis's seconds. This new shock killed his wife. Lucien, in despair, threw himself upon her lifeless form, and was only removed with difficulty. Then, assuming an air of calmness, he said he was ready; and the next moment, seizing one of a pair of pistols which were always kept loaded on the top of a small cabinet, and placing it to his ear, he disposed with his own hand of the last of the Bordeaux duellists.

Sagacious Dogs.

PERHAPS the best dog-story we ever heard—though, as there are such a number of best stories of this honest fellow, it may very well be an old one; but we cannot forbear telling it for the benefit of those who may not have met with it before. A surgeon found a poor dog with his leg broken. He took him home, set it, and in due time gave him his liberty. Off he ran. Some months afterwards the surgeon was awoke in the night by a dog barking loudly at his door. As the barking continued, and as the surgeon thought he recognised the voice, he got up and went downstairs. When he opened the door, there stood his former patient, wagging his tail, and by his side another dog—a friend whom he had brought—and who had also the misfortune to get his leg broken. There is another dog-story of a different kind, which we think very amusing. A poodle belonging to a gentleman in Cheshire, was in the habit of going to church with his master, and sitting with him in the pew, during the whole service. Sometimes the master did not come; but this did not prevent the poodle, who, always presenting himself in good time, entered the pew, and remained in it alone, departing with the rest of the congregation. One Sunday, the dam at the head of a lake in the neighbourhood gave way, and the whole road was inundated. The congregation was therefore reduced to a few individuals, who came from their dwellings close at hand. Nevertheless, by the time the clergyman had commenced reading the Psalms, he saw his friend the poodle come slowly up the aisle, dripping with water, having been obliged to swim above a quarter of a mile to get to church. He went into his pew as usual, and remained quietly there to the end of the service. This was told on the authority of the clergyman himself.

The Naturalist.

WILD FLOWERS.

THE "merry month of Spring" brings, even with our somewhat changed seasons, at least the promise of good things to the botanist, who has patiently, though not idly, waited through the "melancholy days" of November and December, when

The dead leaves strew the forest walk;
And withered are the pale wild flowers;
The frost hangs blackening on the stalk,
The dewdrops fall in frozen showers

JANUARY brings but little to add to his store, but even this cold month is not entirely without floral interest. Chaucer's "Day's-eye" blooms everywhere, and almost at all times. It is a type of a large class, the composite flowers; those, that is, that are composed of a number of little flowers, enveloped in one outer covering. The Golden Gorse is also in bloom, for there is mostly a blossom here and there on its porcupine stems to gladden the village rustic's heart, who declares, as he claims his privilege, that "whenever the Gorse is out, there are pretty girls to be kissed."

FEBRUARY, and, in southern parts of England, even the latter end of January, brings us the Early herald of the infant year,

the Snowdrop, and her elder sister, the tall Snowflake. Both Snowdrop and Snowflake are of the great division of Monocotyledons, amongst which are classed corn of all sorts and grasses. This order is easily distinguished by the parallel veining of the leaves, so different to that of such plants as the vine, the oak, or the nettle.

BUT it is in March that the botanist—the collector of flowers—and the mere lover of flowers just for their beauty's sake, bestir themselves, and feel that it is time to get all into working order. The botanist must look out his tools and et ceteras, to be ready for the many beautiful days this month often gives us in spite of its bad character. "March cometh in as a lion, and goeth out like a lamb," says the old proverb, but sometimes it "cometh in as one lion, and goeth out as two." Bitter east winds, nipping and paralysing the whole frame, prevail during the thirty-one days, and flower-buds keep their noses wisely within shelter, till balmy April woos them with its mingled sunshine and showers, and tempts them forth. Nevertheless, in some years, there is often a fortnight of deliciously mild spring-like weather in March, when the "heart leaps up" with a universal gladness, and flowers burst under the feet.

FOR these happy chances the lover of wild flowers must get everything ready to start afild the first of these fine spring-like days. He must provide himself with a tin collecting-box. This, if it is the regular botanist's collecting-box, is rather costly, especially if purchased at a naturalist's. One may avoid this by using an old "ice-cream biscuit" box, such as those made for Huntley and Palmer. This may be easily covered with dark American cloth, and fitted with straps, which can be carried over the shoulders. If this box is airtight, it answers every purpose of the more expensive ones. A strong trowel and a small iron spade are necessary; the first for small, short-rooted plants, the latter for larger ones. If a long excursion be contemplated, additional weight is a consideration. A batch of paper should be taken. The Times cut into quarters makes a very good substitute for the "Botanists' Absorbent Paper," which becomes expensive by dint of the quantity required. A light portfolio holds this, and such specimens as are easily shaken. A strong sheathed knife is very useful to get up the roots with, and in doing this it should be remembered that to be perfect, in a botanical sense, every specimen should be taken up entire, that is, carefully dug up by the roots, that the tender fibres may not be injured. Even this is not enough to ensure perfection. Unless the plant be a rare one, the collector should make choice amongst a number, selecting the most perfect and typical, as to roots and root-leaves, regular leaves, stem, flower-buds, full-grown flowers, and perfected seed-vessels. It is exceedingly difficult to identify or to compare almost identical plants, where there are only scraps to judge from. And when an anxious collector requests the aid of a scientific botanist to determine some doubtful specimen, he should endeavour to send it him prepared in true botanical form.

If the plant itself has a long straggling stem, it may be bent backwards and forwards once or twice, in order to bring it within the limits of the portfolio. Before arranging the specimens, trim off all withered leaves, clean the roots from sand and grit, or wash them if they were taken from a clay or mud soil. Get a couple of drying-boards about half an inch thick as outer boards; the inner boards need be only half the thickness; they must be all the same size, namely, a foot and a half long by one foot broad. Spread three or four sheets of drying-paper, if "absorbent," but of common newspaper twice as many, on one of the outer boards, and on the top sheet arrange the plants, according to the room they occupy; arrange them as if they were growing, displaying as clearly as you can the characteristics of each plant, the form of its leaves, both the upper and under sides, the shape and habit of the buds, flowers, and seed-vessels, and its general appearance when growing. Lay another set of sheets over the specimens thus arranged, and a thin board, then more sheets and more plants, until four or five layers of specimens are arranged, when an outer board must be laid over all, and on this a weight. Large stones are often used, but a neater plan is to cover a couple of common bricks with green baize, sewing them up in it. They are much more convenient than stones, are more regular in their weight, and more cleanly.

THE drying papers should be changed frequently, the moist ones being removed and thoroughly dried before they are used again. To mount the specimens when they are quite dry—you can determine this if, when you bend a leaf, it breaks off in a brittle manner—have ready some sheets of white paper, the same size as the drying-boards. The better it is, the better the plants look. Lay the plant in its dried position on the sheet, and either gum it lightly here and there on the underside, or fasten narrow slips of paper over it in different parts to keep it in its place on the sheet.

THE arrangement of the various sheets depends upon the classification of the plants and their order and families. Some plants of a thick succulent nature, such as several of the Stonecrops and Samphire, are so tenacious of life that, unless previously dipped in boiling water, they will grow between the papers. In the case of fleshy, tuberous, and bulbous roots, it is necessary to halve them with a sharp thin knife, and merely dry the half left on the stalk.

DURING March the number of flowering plants increases. Foremost amongst them comes the Coltsfoot with its yellow blooms, the curse of the farmer; this, like the Daisy, is a composite plant. The common Butterbur is another pretty little leafless flower, throwing up its pale pink blossoms in March, to be followed later on by its large broad leaves, well known to village school-children as umbrella-plants. The Ground Ivy, so constantly used medicinally by the labouring classes, is another March flower, bright blue, with a graceful trailing stem and scalloped leaves. This is a plant capable of very pretty arrangement in the herbarium. The dear, sweet, familiar purple Violet also makes its appearance in this usually bleak east-windy month, and is never so welcome or so powerfully scented. We have repeatedly gathered seven different sorts of Violets in the village of Egmont, Notts, all growing near each other in the same soil, and on the same bank—the usual deep purple, a striped purple and white, a deep lavender, a muddy pink, the common white, a pale pink, tinged lavender, and a yellow violet, besides the distinct scentless Dog Violet. There seems to be something in that special neighbourhood, within a circuit of a few miles, especially favourable to the growth and variety of wild flowers. We know of no other spot in Great Britain where such an abundance and such an abundant variety of wild flowers, many of them almost unique and others very rare, are to be found as in a beautiful wood about four miles or so from Egmont. This is Wellow Wood, distant about five and a half miles from the Great Northern Railway. To a botanist this wood well repays the expense and trouble of a visit. There are more wild flowers of different kinds, and distinct varieties of the same kind, to be found there than in any other place we know of, of the same area.

IN May the wood, in parts, is literally a dense carpet of the blue Germander Speedwell, well known as Forget-me-not; and besides the blue, a pink and a white variety, and the very rare yellow Speedwell, which occurs, as far as we know, nowhere else in England. Hundreds of other lovely and interesting plants grow on the hills, in the valleys amongst the brushwood and fallen timber, along the little beck that run through the lower part of the wood, and in the swampy ground, whilst the meadows on the border are filled with flowers suited to the soil.

To give a slight notion of the wealth of botanical specimens to be culled in this wood alone we will mention some of them. Agrimony, pink and yellow, on the roadside skirting the wood. There also are found the Rest-harrow, pink and white Centaureys, including the lovely blue Corn-flower, the white and pink-tinted Yarrow, the Spear-plume Thistle, Musk Mallow, common Mallow, Honeysuckle, Cinquefoil, pink Persicaria, Stork's-bill, and Red-berried Bryony; whilst in the wood itself grow the large white Bindweed, Mullein, Tormentil, greater Willow-herb, Succory, blue Brooklime, Wood Vetch, greater Celandine, Shining Crane's-bill, Ragged Robin, Water Ragwort, yellow Dead Nettle, and several other Dead Nettles, Stitchwort, common Avena, yellow Water Iris, Spurge Laurel, Ground Ivy, Primrose, Cowslip, Hyacinths of two varieties, Orchids and Ophrys, Lady Smock, yellow Loosestrife, Sweet and Dog Violets, Arums, Pimpernel, Hairy Vetchling, Nightshade, Broom Aconite, Bugloss, pink and blue, several varieties of climbing and dwarf wild Roses, Foxgloves, Speedwells, Figworts, yellow and pink Rattles, the Wood-ruff and the Wood-sorrel, a lovely striped Vetch hanging in graceful festoons from branch to branch, wild Strawberries, Crab-blossom, Crowfoot, the well-known Burdock, the Scabious, the odoriferous Meadowsweet, the common and beautiful Hop, and many others which we have not the space to enumerate.

WE challenge any other portion of the United Kingdom to produce in so small a space such an infinite variety of wild flowers, or so great a variety in such abundance. Wellow Woods is par excellence the paradise of botanists, and, besides its wealth of wild flowers, is abundantly rich in mosses and ferns.

Two American Generals.

THE ex-Confederate General Gordon used to tell an interesting story about two interviews he had with General Barlow. At Sharpsburg Barlow was apparently mortally wounded, and fell into Gordon's hands. Gordon took a liking to him, and asked if he could not do something for him. "I think not, General," said the young man; "I shall be buried here, no doubt. I do not expect to live. But you can do one thing for me; here is a package of letters from my wife, which I wish you to destroy before my eyes." Gordon, who was then a young man also, took the letters and was about to destroy them when Barlow, with a bubble at his throat, murmured: "Would you take the trouble to read me one of them first? Any one will do." Gordon opened one of the letters, and read it to the dying man—his last friendly words, perhaps, from home. Then the letters were destroyed. But the incident touched Gordon so that he made a special exertion to have Barlow sent through the lines, and to have his wife admitted to him. This being done, the two armies fell apart, and these two men saw each other no more. Gordon considered Barlow to be dead. Barlow had also seen that a General Gordon had been killed somewhere. They met again at a friendly table in Washington, but did not know each other through the changes of time. After some lapse Gordon said: "General Barlow, are you a relative of that Barlow who was killed at Antietam?" "No," said the general, "I am the same man. Are you any relative," enquired Barlow in turn, "of that General Gordon who was recently killed on the Confederate side?" "That was my cousin; I am John B. Gordon." Then at the request of the persons who overheard, Barlow told the tale amid tears and emotion on every side.

The Fashions.

THE weather in "the roaring moon of daffodil," as the poet calls March, is the unknown quantity in our plans for spring dresses. It may rain, hail, blow, or snow throughout the whole month, or we may be choked with some of that precious dust, a bushel of which in March, the proverb tells us, is worth more than a king's ransom. It is always wise to buy slowly in spring, not rush upon cold colours suddenly, but to wait and look round first at the shops. The less a woman has to spend the more deliberately should she buy, so that this intermediate time may be spent in doing up the half-worn dresses, "making auld claes look maist as well as new," as Burns put it.

BEGIN with the skirt-hems, where damp or mud may have made the hems look shabby. If the skirt be pleated or kilted, it is well to unpick it, damp and iron out the marks; but before pulling to pieces be careful that the colour has not faded in any place, for, if so, the dress will look worse than better when taken to pieces. Reversing the folds is not always successful. Turn up a fresh hem so as to take an inch or more off the length. Make a thick quilling of some other material to go round the hem; it makes the dress look fresh; and, better reason still, it makes the feet look small. Satin is rather extravagant to put upon a half-worn dress, but there are good serges, French twills, tweeds, etc., in bright colours that look exceedingly well. A navy-blue dress with deep red—the fashionable shade—looks remarkably well. More of the red can be introduced in other parts of the costume, as bordering to a tunic, and for cuffs. A full habit-shirt of red will conceal worn button-holes, and be more becoming to the figure than a plain dress. A brown dress will take red, or very deep gold, according to taste. Plaids can also be introduced upon plain dresses, or plain materials upon plaids, always making sure that the fancy pattern has a large proportion of the colour of the plaid.

THE fulness at the back of the skirt is now supplemented by a large pouffe, or double puff, which is put on the back of the basque, not on the skirt below; this altogether dispenses with padding underneath, or one of those detestable cane things, which the wearers are so deluded as to style "dress-improvers."

MANY of the bodices are made with three points behind, two of which are seen, and the third concealed by the pouffes alluded to, or a large bow of the silk, surah, or satin, which makes a part of the dress. Woollen materials are unsuitable for sash bows, but they will drape or make a large puff very well. The short jackets of deep red cloth are being made for house wear as well as for the street. Serge is an economical material, as there is no waste in cutting it out. For house wear these bodices come in usefully to wear with old skirts of black cashmere, satin, velveteen, or brocade. For street wear, ladies who have no fear of catarrh or rheumatism before their eyes, will wear these red cloth bodices in the street all through this month and next, but with the addition of fur trimmings. If intended to be displayed late in the year, marabout trimming is preferable to fur. The fur must be a contrasting colour—brown, grey, black, etc., and the same remark applies to the marabout trimming, which in this deep red is scarcely suitable for a rough material like cloth or serge, being rather too dainty.

RED cloth worked up with fancy materials requires skill and good taste. The Princess of Wales has just had a new walking costume which is a model of skilful blending. The bodice is altogether of red cloth, with basque border of natural otter, in the pale yellow brown which harmonises so well with crimson. A collar, cuffs, and trimming down the front of the same fur, makes literally a border, as it goes all round without a break. The underskirt has a thick quilting, similar to the bodice; the skirt itself being of a plaid material, red ground with narrow brown and gold lines crossing and recrossing each other. The tunic, which is red cloth also, is draped low on each hip, and the back, instead of loose puffs, is draped like the front, but in very ample folds, and meets the front at the right side, caught with a large gimp ornament.

ANOTHER dress for the same illustrious lady is chiefly of plaid, with very little plain material, only waistcoat, lappels, and turned-back cuffs. The prevailing colour in the plaid is peacock-blue, with a faint brown check. The trimming material is of plain peacock-blue cloth. On cold days the Princess wears a pelisse, or dolman, of slate-grey brocade, trimmed with grey marabout, and lined with gold colour. With this costume is worn a grey bonnet with large cluster of marigolds in two shades of deep gold colour. With the red dress a bonnet of deep red velvet, cased in large rows, is worn, and the bunch of ostrich feathers is of three shades of red, the deepest being almost black. The Princess seems to have quite adopted the bonnet with a front a little open, and framing the face, in which she has been photographed several times during the last few months.

MATERIALS intended either for dresses or mantles, have patterns on the largest scale possible for cutting out with a view to the proportions of the human figure. These huge designs are favoured by the very skilful dressmakers, as affording opportunities for the display of their accomplishments. In the hands of an inferior modiste most terrible are the results of trying to deal with large brocades.

LAST year flowers were the chief designs, and trails of vine, maple, ivy, etc., slightly exaggerated, supplied the motives of the patterns. To change these graceful designs for fruit is not an improvement, but we cannot control that impersonal queen—Fashion. Plums, peaches, grapes, etc., are all introduced in brocades, but there is no slavish adherence to natural colours, as grey cherries, chaudron apples, coral grapes, and terra-cotta plums, are all to be seen in brocades. Wearers of the Blue Ribbon will be shocked to hear that the newest colour is called rum, and that ladies are heard openly exhorting each other to take to rum—velvet. Or a town mouse writes to a country mouse somewhat to this effect, "Whatever you get this year, be sure you include rum. You cannot be seen anywhere without it, and though some people insist on veiling it with black lace, I, for my part, prefer to have it au naturel."

THICK silk cord round the basques, collars, pockets, cuffs, etc., of dresses and pelisses has come again into use; and the gimp ornaments for looping up tunics are made of coils of silk cord.

THE only novelty in skirt-making is knife-pleating, which makes a little change from box-pleats. The material is kilted by hand or by machine, as is found most suitable for the material employed, and fastened as before with a tape on the wrong side; but each pleat must stand on edge, instead of being sewed to lie flat. Skirts made entirely knife-pleated from waist to hem, called accordion skirts, will be very light for summer wear, as no lining is required, and the lowest tape on the wrong side will be only a little below the knee.

ON the same principle as the knife-pleats are fans inserted in skirts of dresses between folds or quilts. A second material is generally used for the fans, which spring from about the knee. Satin covered with lace is used for fans, which are tacked in knife-pleats.

THE tendency of fashion in children's dresses of late years has been to exaggerate certain details, no longer preserving that correct balance of proportion in each part which reduced the making of frocks, pinafores, and under-garments to rules. For instance, the waist of a frock, where the sash-band fits, is to be found down somewhere near the knees, instead of upon the body. Sash bows have increased in width, until what was formerly called a scarf is now what is required for a little girl's adornment. The growth in size of little girls' bonnets has been mushroom like, for there was no intermediate increase from small to middle size, but a great leap to "grannies" all in one season. As to hats, either very wide-leaved shapes or little turbans were worn last year, but if the former, the plumes of feathers which nodded over the front were on a liberal scale, and this fashion will prevail during the coming season. But the greatest exaggeration of the present day is the large collar which has become de rigueur for outdoor costume. Coarse tatting has been revived, done with écoré thread for these collars. Irish crochet is a collar of a similar character. Both these collars are finished round the edge with a row of little tassels made of flaxen thread, and these are knotted into the points, or scallops, like fringe on a chair-cover. Guipure embroidery is also much used. A bold pattern is traced on linen, outlined with button-stitch, and the ground cut away. Wonderful imitations of this work, machine wrought, can be bought very cheap, and as they are strong, likely to bear frequent washing, one set will supply a nursery, and most likely outlast the fashion.

So much more attention is now given to the form and trimming of children's frocks than was the case some years ago, that dressmakers are obliged to provide fresh sets of patterns every season for school-room and nursery, as they do for drawing-room and promenade. Bodices with full habit-shirt fronts, or with vests, are made for children, but except for very dressy occasions, one material only is employed. On a tiny figure two colours, two shades, or two or three different materials, give a look of deformity, and serve no good purpose.

THE newest buttons, buckles, or ornaments for looping up skirts, are made of wood, beautifully carved. Some are coloured to simulate ivory, others are like lava, and a few in malachite in vivid greens. The designs are mostly heraldic: griffins, unicorns, lions—passant, rampant, couchant—and birds. The strangeness of these ornaments is their origin, as they are Parisian, and no one would expect the French republicans to study heraldry, or choose these particular designs.

NARROW velvet ribbon has really come back to fashion, but only in the modern colours, which consort with new materials. It is run in several rows upon flounces, or on kilted skirts just above the hem; broader widths are used for rosettes to loop drapery, made with a few loops, and several long pendent ends.

Household Gardening.

LAST week we gave what we thought timely instruction for preparing soil for seeds, pointing out also the best modes of sowing them in the open garden. It will not be inappropriate now, nor unseasonable, to name a few hardy flowers, the seed of which, if sown now, and the plants make satisfactory progress, will render the garden attractive and sweet during the ensuing summer.

FRAGRANT ANNUALS.

Not many hardy annuals, the flowers of which are suitable for bouquets and vases, are highly perfumed, yet there are some, and these are indispensable in all gardens where flowers are grown. There are many, however, which eminently deserve notice because of their beauty, even if they are only slightly sweet, or even possess no fragrance. But first to the few that are scented.

MIGNONETTE.

Of all fragrant and popular garden flowers that may be raised in any quantity by sowing seed in the open ground this remains the favourite. For a long time only one variety was cultivated, but now there are several.

For growing in large masses and cutting in large handfuls or basketfuls, the old variety may be grown because the seed is so cheap, while the flowers are as sweet as any; but the spikes are not so large, nor the colour so clear as some others. Sow, as directed last week, in a sheltered position, but reserve some seed for sowing again in the course of three weeks, for maintaining a long succession of flowers.

For sowing in small quantities in gardens, also in window-boxes and flower-pots, some of the choicer varieties may be preferred, the seed of which can be purchased in small packets, varying in price from three-pence to one shilling each. Of these, one of the most effective is Miles's Spiral, which, in rich soil, produces gigantic spikes of cream-coloured flowers deliciously scented. A dark-flowered sort, also very robust, is the Crimson Pyramidal, which has reddish flowers. A particularly sweet kind is Garraway's White, the lightest in colour of all, but the spikes not so large as the preceding; while, last year, a new French variety, Golden Queen, with yellowish flowers, was introduced to British gardens. This is distinct and attractive, but only a portion of the plants appear to come quite true to character. There are other forms of Mignonette, but we have named sufficient for the majority of readers.

SOWING IN BOXES.

Boxes of Mignonette are always enjoyable on window-sills, and the present is the time for preparing them. The boxes should be six inches deep; the length and width being determined by the space they are desired to occupy, and a few holes, half an inch wide, should be bored in them for the purpose of drainage.

The best compost for Mignonette is two-thirds fresh and rather strong loam, and one-third of decayed manure, two or three handfuls of sifted lime rubbish being well mixed in the soil for each box. But although that is the best preparation, very good results may be had in common garden soil, provided it is fertile, or made so by the addition of an admixture of bone meal, say a tumblerful of meal to a gallon of soil.

Before placing the soil in the boxes, put in a layer of good manure, pressing it down quite firmly to a depth of two inches. The soil also must be made firm, but not pressed together when wet; it should be moist enough for the particles to adhere readily, and that is all.

Fill the boxes to within an inch of the top, and make the surface quite firm, level, and smooth. If the soil is at all dry, water it well; but if distinctly moist it will need no water. Scatter the seeds evenly and about an eighth of an inch apart all over the surface, pressing them down gently; then dust a little sifted soil over them, just sufficient to place the seeds out of sight, and no more; and finally lay a few squares of whitewashed glass across the tops of the boxes; clear glass would admit the sun too much if the days were bright, drying the surface, and preventing the free germination of the seed. When the seedlings appear prop up the glass slightly, and eventually, when the plants are half an inch high, remove it. They will need thinning out, probably, but of this more anon, and if judiciously watered, fine healthy masses of delightfully fragrant spikes will be produced. Many persons fail in growing Mignonette in boxes, but if our instructions are followed exactly, success will be achieved.

SWEET PEAS.

Where there is room for growing them either against walls or fences, or in the open garden and supported with sticks, these beautiful butterfly-like flowers, with their refreshing perfume, must never be forgotten.

There can be no better time for sowing than the present. Fork the soil over deeply and add manure liberally, if needed, as in poor soil the plants soon cease flowering. If a row of these Peas be desired, make a drill an inch deep and four inches wide, running the foot along it to make the bottom quite smooth and level; scatter in the peas half an inch apart all over it; draw the soil over them neatly, and the work is done. If the plants are required in clumps and patches, sow a dozen or two of seeds in each, covering as directed, and the plants will shortly appear. It will be well to dust them with soot occasionally, as this will check the attacks of slugs, and at the same time act beneficially as a manure. The scarlet, white, and dark purple varieties of this flower are the most effective, but some of the painted or variegated flowers are pretty, and they look the best grown in mixture.

SWEET SULTAN.

Of this not by any means commonly-seen flower there are three varieties, having respectively yellow, purple, and white flowers, and they are named in the order of merit. The plants grow a foot high, and the flower-heads, an inch or two in diameter, have a brush-like appearance, on account of their numerous anthers, and have quite a honey-like perfume.

Those possessing a frame had better sow the seed thinly in pots or boxes of light soil early in April, and transplant the seedlings about the middle of May; failing such convenience, sowing had better be deferred in the open ground until the last week in April, or even a week longer if the weather be not fine. Flowers of the Sweet Sultan continue fresh a very long time when cut, and last season were in much repute for dinner-table decoration.

SWEET ALYSSUM.

This dwarf white-flowering annual will grow almost anywhere, whenever the seed is scattered in the open ground. The flowers are not individually imposing, but are produced in such numbers as to form almost a sheet of white, and their peculiar fragrance is enjoyed by many, but not by all. Those who do not know the plant, and have room for a few patches, may give it a trial.

SWEET STOCKS.

As combining beauty with fragrance, no flowers surpass the dwarf double German Ten Week Stocks. Their massive spikes of rosette-like flowers, in a dozen or more different shades of colour, are admired by all, and the plants are grown in millions.

The seed may be sown now in frames, as advised for the Sweet Sultan, or in a few weeks' time in the open air. On this simple method of raising plants a reminder will be given, as it were a pity the sowing should be overlooked, for nothing can compensate for the absence of these flowers from gardens in summer.

NIGHT SCENTED STOCKS.

At the first glance these appear to have little resemblance to the Stocks above-mentioned, with which most persons are familiar, still a closer examination reveals their affinity. The former is, botanically, Matthiola annua, the latter Matthiola bicornis. It is a dwarf simple hardy annual with pinkish buff-coloured flowers, which are delightfully scented in the evening, but not during the day. The seed may be sown the same as Mignonette, where the plants are required to flower, and a few patches near a window, or the side of a walk, render a garden enjoyable during the cool evening following a sultry day.

SWEET-SCENTED TOBACCO.

We are not alluding now to the "fragrant weed" with which everybody is familiar, and which has to be burned before its virtues are evolved; but to a sweet and pretty flower not yet known by the multitude, yet which most persons may grow in their gardens.

The tobacco of commerce is made from the leaves of Nicotiana tabacum; the sweet-flowered Tobacco, now under notice, is Nicotiana affinis. The plants require to be raised under glass by sowing the seed thinly, then establishing in small pots, and planting out towards the end of May.

They grow about two feet high, and bear a profusion of greenish-white trumpet-shaped flowers, an inch or two in diameter, which close during the day, but expand beautifully in the evening, and are delicately scented. This comparatively new and very distinct species is worthy of a place in all gardens alike by its novelty and attractiveness.

Windsor Castle.

THE very prettiest legend about Windsor is connected with the little garden at the foot of its proud tower, from which twelve counties can be seen in clear weather. A young Scotch prince, sent to France to be out of the way of his dangerous uncle, the Duke of Albany, was captured at sea, and sent to Windsor, where he remained a prisoner for eighteen years. In his poem, "The King's Quaire," the prince has described how he fell in love with Lady Jane Beaufort, as she walked in the garden, unconscious of the admiration of the young prisoner. The garden, he says, had an arbour in the corner, and was railed in with wands and close-knit hawthorn bushes; and in the midst of the arbour was "a sharp, green, sweet juniper." Suddenly the prisoner's eyes fell on

The fairest or the freshest young flower
That ever I saw methought before that hour,
For which sudden abate anon astart
The blood of all my body to my heart.

Then the enraptured prince describes the dress of the maiden; her golden hair fretted with pearls and rubies, emeralds and sapphires; on her head a chaplet of plumes, red, white, and blue, mixed with quaking spangles; about her neck a fine gold chain, with a ruby in the shape of a heart:

That as a spark of fire so wantonly
Seemed burning upon her white throat.

But suddenly the fair fresh face passed under the boughs out of sight, and then began the lover's torments, and his day darkened into night. Altogether, a prettier love-story is not to be found in all the Castle history. James eventually married this incomparable lady, niece of the cardinal, and daughter of the Earl of Somerset, and took her back with him to Scotland. The accomplished prince was assassinated at Perth in 1437.

At the old deanery door took place the parting between Richard II. and his young queen, Isabella, then only eleven years old. Froissart says, when the canons had chanted very sweetly, the king having made his offering, he took the queen in his arms and kissed her twelve or thirteen times, saying sorrowfully:

"Adieu, madam, until we meet again."
Then the queen began to weep, saying:

"Alas, my lord, will you leave me here?"

The king's eyes filled with tears, and he said:

"By no means, Mamie; but I will go first, and you, ma chère, shall come afterwards."

After that the king and queen partook of wine and comfits at the deanery, with their court. Then the king stooped down and lifted the queen in his arms, and kissed her at least ten times, saying:

"Adieu, ma chère, until we meet again;" and placing her on the ground, kissed her again.

"By our Lady," adds the chronicler, "I never saw so great a lord make so much of, or show such affection to, a lady, as did King Richard to his queen. Great pity it was they separated, for they never saw each other more."

Soon afterwards came the death-struggle of Pontefract, and the child-wife became a widow.

It was in King George's Chapel that, in 1813, the body of King Charles I. was discovered. Charles II. had pretended to search for it, but probably did not wish to find it, or to incur the cost of a sumptuous monument. The corpse had been carried to the grave in 1648, in a snow-storm, and the dead monarch obtained secretly the name of "the white king" among his adherents, from the fact of the snow that day settling upon the pall. There was no service read over the body, as the Puritan governor forbade Bishop Prescott to use the Church of England prayers. On the coffin being opened, the face was found dark and discoloured, the forehead and mouth had little of their muscular substance remaining, the cartilage of the nose was gone, but the left eye, though open and full at the first exposure, vanished almost immediately. The shape of the face was long, the nearly black hair was thick at the back of the head; the beard was a reddish-brown. On examining the head, the muscles of the neck showed contraction, and the fourth cervical vertebra had been cut through transversely, leaving the severed surfaces smooth and even. The appearance was such as a blow from a heavy axe would have produced. In this chapel sleep many kings and queens, Jane Seymour among them, and Henry VIII., by his own desire, "near his true and loving wife, Queen Jane." The gigantic tomb, with six hundred and thirty-four statues and forty-four "historics," which the tyrant ordered, were never put up. His former subjects had better things to think of.

Odds and Ends.

A CLERGYMAN in Illinois having heard that a portion of the country was without "the stated preaching of the Gospel"—in fact, had had no minister in those parts within the memory of the oldest inhabitant—resolved to give a "service" on the Lord's Day. Notice was posted up at the cross-roads that preaching might be expected next Sunday in the school-house. Men came from all directions across the prairie, some on foot, some on horseback, some in waggons, but all with gun in hand, in hopes of meeting game on the way, and thus combining piety with profit. Passing over the preliminaries of a meeting thus strange and novel to most of the comers, we find the preacher holding forth on the duty of "observing the Sabbath," when all at once a dog outside set up a terrible yell, as hounds do in sight of the deer, for a noble stag had thrust his antlers in sight through the opening wood. All at once, as the deer was seen through the windows, there was a rush for the shot-guns and rifles, stacked in a corner, and in less than no time the room was cleared of all save an old man with crutches and the preacher. As long as the old man sat still the preacher went on with his discourse. But the fever of excitement extended even to the lame man, who suddenly gathered up his crutches and made for the door. "Well," said the parson, out of patience, "this is too much; it is all in vain!" "Oh no," said the lame man, as he jerked himself to the door—"oh no; I think they'll catch him!" And catch him they did.

DR. MÜLLER, the head physician of the Prussian general staff, was allowed to go to Japan in order to assist in the arrangement of the Japanese Military Academy. When the hour came for his presentation to the Mikado, he naturally clothed himself in full uniform. The court officials informed him that he could not be permitted to enter the awful presence unless he complied with Japanese usage, and pulled off his boots. Dr. Müller refused to comply. There was much debate over the difficulty, the court chamberlain insisting that the physician must unboot himself, and he declaring that he would not enter without his boots. At last Dr. Müller hit upon the ingenious notion of casting all the responsibility of the situation upon the Emperor Wilhelm. "My master, the German Kaiser," said he, "commanded me to present myself before the august Emperor of Japan in full Prussian uniform. Now, the boots constitute an important part of the Prussian uniform, and I dare not appear as his representative without these important accessories." The chamberlain went to the Mikado with this explanation, and the result was that Dr. Müller marched into the audience-chamber in his boots. His was the first shoe-leather which had ever desecrated the floor of the Mikado Palace in Tokio.

SOCRATES, at an extreme old age, learned to play on musical instruments. Cato, at eighty years of age, began to study the Greek language. Plutarch, when between seventy and eighty, commenced to study Latin. Boccaccio was thirty years of age when he commenced his studies in light literature, yet he became one of the greatest masters of the Tuscan dialect, Dante and Plutarch being the other two. Sir Henry Spellman neglected the sciences in his youth, but commenced the study of them when he was between fifty and sixty years of age. After this time he became a most learned antiquarian and lawyer. Dr. Johnson applied himself to the Dutch language but a few years before his death.

THE mania of the autograph fiend reached its climax in the case of a former clerk in the Massachusetts state library, who cut from ancient documents and colonial charters, signatures of eminent men and Indians who died two hundred years ago. Singular that a man should get together a collection of autographs he would be afraid to show anybody. But then it is so much safer to ask for the autograph of a dead Indian than a live one. Not that the live Indian wouldn't willingly and cheerfully make his mark for you, but he would be liable to make it on top of your head with his little hatchet.

A REALLY good housekeeper is almost always unhappy. While she does so much for the comfort of others, she nearly ruins her own health and life. It is because she cannot be easy and comfortable when there is the least disorder or dirt to be seen. A fine musician is always pained and made miserable at a slight discord that is not noticed by less trained ears, and a fine housekeeper is just as unhappy as she can be at a little dust or disorder which the ordinary mortal does not see.

A GENTLEMAN residing near Bogton drew the attention of the town council to a slough in the road as a nuisance, but no notice was taken of it. One day he found, to his amusement, that two councillors had walked into it by accident, and were floundering about in the mire, when he addressed them thus: "Gentlemen of the Town Council of Bogton, I have often petitioned to your honourable body against this slough, but I never had any attention paid to my petition. I now come forth to express my delight to see you at last moving in the matter."

A TWO-FOOT rule was given to a labourer in a Clyde boat-yard to measure an iron plate. The labourer, after much time, returned. "Now, Mick," asked the plater, "what size is the plate?" "Well," replied Mick with a grin of satisfaction, "it's the length of your rule and two thumbs over, with this piece of brick, and the breadth of my hand, and my arm from here to there, bar a finger."

IT rather annoys the lady holding the pug-dog in her lap in an omnibus to hear a learned-looking gentleman remark to a friend: "Do you know the female orang-outang at the Zoo has formed an attachment for a small dog and fondles it constantly?"

THERE is a story of a wise monarch not contained in written histories. Two of his court damsels had a dispute as to precedence. The king looked kindly at them and said, "Let the oldest go first," and the damsels embraced and went in together with entwined arms.

"LANDS are measured in rods, leagues, and so forth," said the teacher. "Now, what is a surveyor?" "A land-leaguer," shouted one of the boys.

A LADY politician asks: "Is it a crime to be a woman?" It certainly is when there is a great necessity for dressing in a hurry.

SAMUEL FOOTE, the dramatist and wit, once made a jest which cost him dear. It was after he had opened the Haymarket Theatre on his own account, and was doing well in the way of money-making. One evening, as he was walking alone down a street in the neighbourhood of Oxford Road, he was accosted by a man, who very politely asked him if he would be so kind as to direct him to Newgate Prison. Now it was utterly impossible for Foote to return a civil answer if he saw an opportunity for a jest, and few men could find material for a jest as readily as could he. He straightway answered the man: "My good fellow, you have only to rob the first man you meet, and you'll find your way there easily." Unfortunately for Foote, it chanced that this man was a notorious footpad, who was on his way to visit, if possible, a pal who was in limbo. "My dear man," said the highwayman, who had originally not a thought of evil towards the gentleman whom he had honestly interrogated, "I'll try the experiment on you, as that happens to be my profession. And now, sir, you know the alternative. There's a pair of bullets in this pistol, and they're for that witty brain of yours if you don't give up what little you possess of value about your person instantaneously." Foote delivered. He could do nothing else, for he knew that the man was in earnest. Robbed of his watch and purse, and robbed of his jest! It would be hard to tell which occasioned him the most chagrin!

THE following is an extract from the will of John Hylett Stow, proved in 1781: "I hereby direct my executors to lay out five guineas in the purchase of a picture of the viper biting the benevolent hand of the person who saved him from perishing in the snow, if the same can be bought for the money; and that they do, in memory of me, present it to —, a king's counsel, whereby he may have frequent opportunities of contemplating it, and by a comparison between that and his own virtue, be able to form a certain judgment which is best and most profitable—a grateful remembrance of past friendship and almost paternal regard, or ingratitude and insolence."

"GAZE upon that pure, beautiful evening star, and swear to be true while its light shall shine! Swear, my love! Swear by Venus!" exclaimed a youth in impassioned accents. "How stupid you are!" answered the Girton girl. "That is not Venus. The right ascension of Venus this month is 15h. 9m.; her delineation is 17 degrees, 25 minutes south, and her diameter is 10'2."

"ARE you not ashamed of yourself to fight with a boy so much smaller than yourself? I really can't understand it," said a gentleman to a big boy who was imposing on a small one. "So you can't understand it?" retorted the young ruffian impudently. "No, I can't." "Well, then, why do you meddle with things you don't understand?"

A MAN in a London train was heard to groan so frightfully that the passengers took pity on him, and one of them gave him a drink out of a whisky-flask. "Do you feel better?" asked the giver. "I do," said he who had groaned. "What ailed you?" "Ailed me?" "Yes; what made you groan so?" "Groan! Great land of freedom! I was singing!"

"How is this, Minnie?" asked one girl of another. "You have asked all these folks to your party that you scarcely speak to and left out some of your most intimate friends." "Oh, that's all right; I'm practising cooking, and I'm going to make the sweets for the party myself. I don't want to kill any of my friends."

A CLERGYMAN thought he would raise his own pork. So he bought five pigs and fattened them. Now that they are fit to kill, he says they seem so much like his own children that he hasn't the heart to kill them. The pigs are in good luck, but it's rather hard on the children.

AN AMERICAN has patented a device by which the front wheels of two bicycles may be so joined as to permit the machines to be driven tandem by two riders. The atmosphere is in a very chilly condition when some American is not trying to do good.

DID you ever notice the warning, "Paint," posted on the door that you did not test the matter with your finger just to find out if it wasn't dry enough to take down the warning? You probably never did. It would be contrary to human nature.

"MY case is just here," said a gentleman to a lawyer. "The plaintiff will swear that I hit him. I will swear that I did not. Now what can you lawyers make out of that if we go to trial?" "A hundred pounds easy," was the reply.

ROBINSON (after a meeting at the club): "It is awfully late, Brown. What will you say to your wife?" Brown (in a whisper): "Oh, I shan't say much, you know; 'Good-morning, dear,' or something of that sort. She'll say the rest."

A BOOKBINDER said to his wife at their wedding. "It seems that now we are bound together, two volumes in one, with clasps." "Yes," observed one of the guests, "one side highly ornamental Turkey morocco, and the other plain calf."

TWO Irishmen travelling on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad came to a mile post, when one of them said: "Tread aisy, Pat; here lies a man who was 108 years old. His name was Miles, from Baltimore."

"BOYS," said Admiral Truncheon, when his fleet closed in combat with the Dutch fleet under Admiral de Winter, "you see a severe winter approaching, and I advise you to keep up a good fire."

A HEALTH journal says that you ought to take three-quarters of an hour for your dinner. It is well also to add a few vegetables and a piece of meat.

A LITTLE girl hearing it remarked that all people had once been children, artlessly enquired: "Who took care of the babies?"

ÆSTHETIC girls never giggle. They merely express their delight by a dreamy, far-away, north-pole smile.

PAYING dividends on watered stock is now called "El Mahdi," because it is "false profit."

IT does not matter how well the gardener tries to do, he is always slipping.

WHEN were eggs first laid in England?—In the time of Hen. I., of course.

Don't you think the bride is foolish not to marry the best man?

Correspondence.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Enquiries will be attended to as quickly as possible, but, as we have to go to press several days before publication, some delay is inevitable. In no case can questions be answered "next week," as some of our friends demand.

We have received several very unreasonable complaints of delay in attending to letters, which have been addressed to us by Correspondents who have paid no regard to the instructions which are given every week in this Journal.

The Editor is therefore compelled to give notice:

1. That all letters containing postage-stamps for copies of this Journal, or on similar business, must be addressed to the PUBLISHER.
2. That all letters containing enquiries for the Correspondence Column, or on literary business, must be addressed to the EDITOR.
3. That Correspondents are urgently requested to adopt distinctive pseudonyms, and not to use such vague signatures as "A Constant Reader," etc.
4. That Correspondents wishing to write on two or more subjects—say to send in an answer to a Correspondent, and to enclose stamps for a copy of the Journal—must send each communication in a separate envelope, properly addressed as above indicated.
5. That NO ATTENTION can be paid to any Correspondents who do not observe these rules.

ANSWERS.

ALPHA.—Macmillan & Co. publish "Waterton's Wanderings," with biographical introduction. Mr. Waterton made four journeys to British Guiana, devoting himself chiefly to ornithology, which to the end of his life was his favourite branch of Natural History. He was born 1782; died 1865.

ARTISAN.—1. Baker's, High Holborn, is a good shop. 2. A pocket magnifying-glass would be useful. Try any optician.

CONSTANT READER.—"F. L." kindly informs you that the words you quoted in HOUSEHOLD WORDS, No. 145, are entitled "Happy Memories," are set to music by Cristabel, and published by Reid Bros., London.

CULTIVATOR.—Our present common flowers were for the most part introduced into England from the reign of Henry VII. to that of Elizabeth. The art of preserving flowers in sand was discovered in 1633. A very great number have been introduced from America, Australia, The Cape, etc., during the present century.

DORA.—1. Scarborough lilies, well cultivated, flower every year after the bulbs attain the requisite strength, and rank amongst the most beautiful of autumn window and greenhouse plants. The flowers should be removed as soon as they fade. Particulars of management will shortly be given. 2. For particulars respecting price of music, etc., apply to Mr. Robinson, New and Secondhand Music Library, 95, St. Martin's Lane, Charing Cross.

FLORENCE.—1. There is a village named after St. Florent on the Loire, between Angers and Nantes in Anjou. He is said to have cleared the country of dragons, and subsequently to have converted the inhabitants to Christianity. 2. We do not know of any saint of that name. You should consult the Roman Calendar.

HOUSEWIFE OLD STYLE.—1. You will find the following pudding a nice change from pastry, and it is wholesome for children. Stew rhubarb with sugar and water, taking care to have plenty of juice. Cut the crumb of a stale tin-loaf in slices about half an inch thick and put in a pie-dish, leaving room for the bread to swell, with alternate layers of rhubarb, until the dish is full. Then put in as much of the juice as you can without causing the bread to rise. When it is soaked up, put in the rest of the juice, cover with a plate, and let the pudding stand until the next day. When required for use turn out and pour over it a good custard or cream. The excellence of this pudding depends on there being plenty of syrup to soak the bread thoroughly. This pudding is improved by the addition of a little apple, and the evaporated rings answer well; they must, however, be cooked separately, as if boiled in sugar, they would harden. 2. For directions how to remove grease spots from your dress, see HOUSEHOLD WORDS, No. 151, under the head, "Spring Cleaning."

LETHE.—1. "Graphe Paranonon," according to Greek law, was the impeachment of one who proposed a measure at variance with the principles of the constitution. 2. We know of no better books for your purpose than the "Natural Science Primers."

M. A. B.—"G. M." kindly writes that you will find the article on "Petroleum for Fruit Trees," in the Nineteenth Century for November, 1883.

MAGGIE F.—1. We can only forward the copy to the correspondent who originally asked for it. 2. Please quote first verse of the poem you want.

MARBELLA.—Society in Madras is now mixed, and not confined, as in old days, to the military and civilians. It is the custom for the new arrivals to call on the residents, who return calls or not as they desire. As to the climate, there are three months of tolerable comfort—November, December, January; but the other nine months the temperature is 84°. On the coast there are sea-breezes, but as they are hot, there cannot be much refreshment in them.

M. S. M.—In an early issue we hope to refer to the subject of your letter. At present it will suffice for you to know that the stems should be cut off your bulbous plants immediately the flowers fade, and the foliage must be kept fresh and green as long as possible by keeping the roots moist, while at the same time the plants cannot have too much sun and air.

MURIEL.—1. Egerton Burnett has no agent; his "Royal Devonshire Serge" is supplied direct from Wellington, Somerset. 2. Leave only your husband's cards unless there is any special reason for adding your own. 3. You might try "Vaseline," or "Vaseline Hair Tonic."

NORFOLK.—The 1st of April is, as you say, called "All Fools' Day," but the rise of this singular kind of anniversary is not known. In "Brand's Popular Antiquities"—a book you should, if possible, consult before commencing your essay—we read: "There is nothing hardly that will bear a clearer demonstration than that the primitive Christians, by way of conciliating the Pagans to a better worship, humoured their prejudices by yielding to a conformity of names, and even of customs, where they did not essentially interfere with the fundamentals of the Gospel."

doctrine. This was done in order to quiet their possession, and to secure their tenure, an admirable expedient, and extremely fit in those barbarous times, to prevent the people from returning to their old religion. Among these, in imitation of the Roman Saturnalia, was the Feast of Fools, when part of the jollity of the season was a burlesque election of a mock Pope, mock cardinals, and mock bishops, attended with a thousand ridiculous ceremonies. . . . The continuance of customs, especially droll ones, which suit the taste of the multitude, after the original cause of them has ceased, is a great, but no uncommon absurdity." 2. One of the most favourite London jokes was to send greenhorns to the Tower "to see the lions washed." As an old writer says:

But 'tis a thing to be disputed,
Which is the greatest fool reputed—
The man that innocently went,
Or he that him design'dly sent.

THISBE.—There is a song called "Laddie," beginning, "My laddie is someone's darling," by Ciro Pinsuti; words by H. L. D'Arcy Jaxone.

SOLD EVERYWHERE.

Price One Shilling Each, or Bound in Cloth, 1s. 6d. Each.

DICKENS'S DICTIONARIES,

REVISED, CORRECTED, AND BROUGHT UP TO DATE.

DICKENS'S DICTIONARY OF LONDON.

WITH MAPS.

"We have been shown how abounding is our own world of a city with objects of interest, and if we only took the little trouble necessary to find them out, the reward would be much greater than we dream of. Whatever guide be chosen for this purpose, Dickens's well-known 'DICTIONARY OF LONDON' will be found a valuable supplement to them all."—The Times.

DICKENS'S DICTIONARY OF THE THAMES,

FROM ITS SOURCE TO THE NORE.

WITH MAPS, PLANS, ETC.

DICKENS'S DICTIONARY OF PARIS.

WITH MAPS, PLANS, ETC.

"There is, it is not too much to say, not a want which may be reasonably felt by a stranger in Paris which has not been foreseen by the dictionary-maker. The little book, besides its great usefulness, is one which may be safely taken up with the certainty of its pages affording some curious information."—Saturday Review.

PUBLISHED MONTHLY, PRICE ONE SHILLING,

DICKENS'S CONTINENTAL A B C RAILWAY GUIDE.

"I puzzled and suffered severely over my Continental 'Bradshaw,' and got deeper and deeper into perplexity. I tried my 'Dickens,' almost in despair, and at once found the particulars I wanted explained in the most concise and unmistakable manner."—Sporting and Dramatic News.

MACMILLAN & CO., LONDON, W.C.

NOTICE.

NOW READY, PRICE SIXPENCE,

PART XXXV. OF HOUSEHOLD WORDS,

Containing Serial Story, entitled "My Lord Concelt;" "A Family Feud," a Story in Five Weekly Parts; and numerous Short Stories.

The Editor's Note-Book on Current Topics. Interesting Articles on Cookery, Gardening, The Family Doctor, Fashions, Music, etc.

AND SOMETHING SUITABLE FOR EVERY MEMBER OF THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

NOTICE.

The Fifth Volume of HOUSEHOLD WORDS, containing Nos. 106 to 131, bound in cloth, uniform with Vols. 1, 2, 3, and 4, can now be had, price 4s. 6d. Also Binding Cases (including Title and Index), price 1s. 6d. Title and Index may also be obtained separately, price 1d.

All back Numbers, Parts, Quarterly Divisions and Volumes, also the Extra Numbers, are in print; and may be had by ordering from any Bookseller, Newsagent, or Railway Bookstall, or should any difficulty be found in procuring from an Agent, enclose stamps for the amount, adding price of postage, addressed to the Publisher of HOUSEHOLD WORDS, 24, Great New Street, E.C., when the copies will be sent per return.

The Publishers of HOUSEHOLD WORDS will send Copies direct, post-free, to any address in the United Kingdom or the Continent, upon receipt of P.O.O. made payable at the Fleet Street Office, to Messrs. CHARLES DICKENS & EVANS, at the following rates:

Weekly.			Monthly.
	s.	d.		s.	d.
Three Months .. ..	1	8	Three Months .. ..	2	0
Six Months .. ..	3	8	Six Months .. ..	4	0
Twelve Months .. ..	6	6	Twelve Months .. ..	8	0

New Volumes commence the first week in May and November respectively.

All applications for Advertisements to be addressed to Mr. Joseph Smith, 24, Great New Street, E.C.

FAMILIAR IN THEIR MOUTHS AS HOUSEHOLD WORDS."—Shakespeare.

HOUSEHOLD WORDS,

No. 154.]

SATURDAY, APRIL 5, 1884.

[VOL. VI.]

The Stone-cutter's Story,

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

THE portrait of a very fine face, you say, sir? Yes, indeed, it is; and, what is more, it is the face of a very fine fellow, though he was only a fellow-workman of mine. He has a history, too, that young man has. Will I tell it you, sir? Well, it is a story that I never have told, with all my love of story-telling; but the time and place being now so far off, I think it could do no one any harm if I did tell it you.

About twenty years ago—I was a hale young fellow of six-and-thirty then—we were making a railway in the Limousin. When I say "we," I mean Rollingstock, Ballast, and Co. I was only a master stone-cutter, but we got into the way of saying "we" when we should say "the firm." It was a short branch, about fourteen miles long, joining an important town to the main line from Paris; but it was a difficult job, owing to the nature of the country, which was all broken up into narrow steep valleys by spurs of rocky hills, which ran sometimes in one direction, sometimes in another. We had to bridge over six of these valleys, and I was at work in the widest and deepest, where the bridge, when it was finished, was reckoned a marvel of engineering. This young man, whose portrait you noticed hanging over my fireplace, was working with me, next in command, as you might say; he was a far cleverer workman, but he had not had quite so much experience as I had. His name was Cyprien Delbez. He was a Frenchman; we had a good many of them on the works. I had been so much about that I understood their lingo well, though I am quite out of it now; and as Delbez lodged with me in the little cottage I had run up for myself close to the works, he had picked up a good bit of English from me, and my wife, and my boy. I was very fond of him; in fact, I may say I loved him as well as if he had been my kith and kin, and I admired him and looked up to him into the bargain. His portrait tells you how handsome he was, and there was a look in his eyes, which the photograph brings out very well, which seems to draw you at once. It was that, no doubt, made you notice it among all my other portraits. He was very tall and well built, with an easy, graceful way of carrying himself, for he had served as a soldier, and had not forgotten his drill. He was a bit of a dandy—every good-looking young Frenchman is—and he had a knowing way of wearing his broad felt hat that was very becoming to his dark Southern face. I think I said what a good workman he was, and he was always studying to improve himself in his craft, for I dare say you know, sir, that in the higher branches of stone-cutting a good bit of mathematical knowledge is required. Mr. Lindsell, the agent who was managing the work for Rollingstock and Ballast, took a great deal of notice of Delbez, and lent him books and encouraged him in every way, for he was a nice, kind-hearted man. I had worked under him ever since I had been quite a lad, and had travelled all over the world with him.

Mr. Lindsell had now come to live with his family at Lantrac, a good-sized town about three miles from the valley I was working in. This valley was called Planche Torte. It was a lovely spot, the sides were almost precipitous in places, but where the railway was to run across, they sloped down more gently. There were chestnut-trees growing in all directions, with heaps of shrubs and tall ferns which clustered round the rocks. At the bottom ran a broad, shallow stream along a craggy bed, there were numbers of little falls, and here and there a deep pool, worn out by the water as it eddied round a rock. Far up the valley, where the stream entered, there was a great waterfall of about a hundred and twenty feet, in three leaps, as it were. Here there was a most curious thing to be seen. At the bottom of the first leap, which was perhaps ten or fifteen feet deep, there lay a pile of fallen rocks on a tongue of land, which divided the stream as it fell, and it flowed on in two parts—that to the right completed the fall, while that to the left found a terrace-like bed along the hillside and ran quietly on under the overhanging rocks as if it had no connection with the noisy, brawling torrent below. The only paths in the valley were a few sheep-tracks, and the rough road along which the carts brought us our stone from a quarry nearby; besides which we had made a sort of way to my house and to some other similar houses on the hillside. We crossed the stream by some great flat stepping-stones. Altogether it was a very beautiful place, though I am a poor hand at describing it.

There were a good many English people at Lantrac, who had come on account of the making of the railway, and large parties of ladies often came up to Planche Torte with the engineers to picnic, and to see the falls and enjoy a day among the wonderful wild scenery and pretty growing things, for the place was full of flowers.

One day—it was in the middle of May—Mr. Lindsell came on to the works with several ladies. One of them I knew very well; she was his niece, Miss Beatrice Lindsell. My wife had been a servant in her father's house for years before we were married. Miss Lindsell was a very handsome young lady, she was tall and finely-formed, with a beautiful forehead, from which her bright chestnut hair grew back in soft waves. Her eyes—I always notice people's eyes—were dark blue, large, with a powerful look in them. I dare say this may seem an odd way of describing her eyes, still "powerful" is the word they always brought into my mind, though, of course, a more educated man would have found a better. Her nose was just a little bit retroussé, and her mouth and chin were most exquisite. Her whole face had the frankest, most genial expression I have ever seen on man, woman, or child, and her manner was quite true to her looks.

Mr. Lindsell was showing his friends about the works, and telling them how the railway was to cross the valley. When they came to the place where Delbez and I were working, they stood still, and we both stopped our chisels.

"Ah, Talbot," said Miss Lindsell to me, "how are you, and how do you like living in this lonely place?"

I told her I had got quite used to it, for it was more convenient for us than being down in Lantrac.

"And don't you feel a little bit homesick now and then?" she asked.

"Well, no, miss," I said, "for you see I have brought my home with me."

Then she asked after my wife and little Joey, who was never very strong; and when I had pointed her out the roof of our little house, which we could see among the chestnut-trees on the opposite slope, she said she would come some day and pay us a visit. Then she began to ask questions about the bridge, for she was a young lady who took a deal of interest in engineering. Mr. Lindsell told her how high it would be, and how many arches it would take, and so on. She looked at the stones we were cutting, and asked why they were all numbered, and what we wanted that large plan for. Mr. Lindsell smiled and said:

"You had better ask Delbez here about the stone-cutting; he can tell you more than I should; he is a master of his craft."

Miss Lindsell turned to Delbez, who was standing by, Frenchman fashion, with his broad hat in his hand, and asked him, in very fluent French, a great many questions about his work. I dare say Mr. Lindsell could have told her all she wanted to know, but he didn't, and he didn't refer her to me either, because, you see, he was so pleased with Delbez that he liked to bring him forward. Cyprien described everything she asked him about very well, and she seemed very much interested. The other two ladies strolled on, and a man called off Mr. Lindsell's attention.

"Well," said Miss Lindsell at last, "thank you for all you have told me. I did not know that there was so much science in just cutting stones; I fancied bridges were built with much less trouble."

Cyprien explained to her that this bridge was all the more difficult to build because it crossed the valley in what we call a skew direction.

"I hope I have not given you a great deal of trouble, and wasted a great deal of your time with my talking," she said pleasantly.

"Oh no, mademoiselle," he answered, and indeed he looked very much gratified and pleased to be able to tell her so much.

His eyes rested on her with an admiring look. I did not wonder at it, for she was looking so lovely and so eager that no man could have looked on her with indifference, however cold his nature might be, while Delbez was a regular Southerner, with warm blood and quick feelings. Presently Mr. Lindsell called her, as he was ready to go on, and she bade us good-morning, saying she should take a great deal of interest in our bridge, and hoped it would be finished before she went back to England. We watched her go, and when we turned again to our work Delbez said:

"She is not much like the other English ladies who have been here, is she?"

"No," I said, "there are not many ladies anywhere like Miss Beatrice; she is so open and free with everyone, and yet no one would think of taking a liberty with her. She seems to be just what a queen should be, and then she is so beautiful."

"Yes," he said in rather a dreamy way, "she is very beautiful; her face reminds me of the pictures you see in churches over the altars."

I felt inclined to go on talking about Miss Lindsell, for I was glad to see her again, but Delbez did not answer me; for one thing the chisels made noise enough to drown our voices, besides which our work generally took all our attention; still, Delbez was unusually quiet all that day, for he was generally a chatty fellow, getting a joke out of everything.

About three days after, just as we were leaving off work at eleven to eat our lunch, which we brought with us to save some trouble, we saw Miss Lindsell coming down the hill, with no companion but a big dog. She came straight to us and said: "I am on my way to see your wife, Talbot; is she in?" I said yes she was, and that she would be very glad to see Miss Lindsell. How pleased she had been, poor thing! when I told her that she would have a visit from an old friend, and how she had talked of nothing else ever since, for she was longing for some home-news, and for the sight of a face she knew well.

"Ah, you see, Talbot," laughed Miss Lindsell, "your wife is not quite so easy to transplant as you are; she still feels as if she belongs to us at home."

I just said what I have always felt, that when you lead a very roving life like mine has been, here for a few years, and there for a few months; now under one sky, now under another; you learn to take root easily, and you soon shake yourself free from old associations; while for the womenkind it was different, they stayed at home more, and felt changes more in consequence.

"And you, monsieur," she said to Delbez; she called him "monsieur" because she knew that Frenchmen always expect such little marks of politeness, "have you also travelled about?"

"No, mademoiselle," he said; "I belong to this country. I was born at Lantrac, and have never left the department."

"Then you must know this country very well," she said, "this beautiful country."

Cyprien smiled; his idea of a beautiful country was the idea of all French peasants. Not romantic scenery, which they only call sauvage, but a broad plain, with fertile slopes, where the necessities of life come very easily, and the luxuries are not far off. He tried to explain to her that he could not see any beauty in a land of wild rock and stream, where nothing but chestnut-trees took root kindly.

"Well," she said gaily, "I cannot agree with you; to me this country is beautiful, and this valley superb; it will be my favourite walk as long as I am at Lantrac. And now, Talbot, tell me the easiest way to get to your house; it looks quite inaccessible up there among the trees."

I was pointing out to her where she must cross the brook and how she had best climb the opposite hill, when suddenly we heard a crash, and looking round I saw that her dog had overturned Cyprien's basket, and was making off with what was to have been his lunch. His wine-bottle lay smashed in a thousand pieces among the stones, and his dessert of cherries were covered with dust and dirt.

Miss Lindsell looked horrified, but Cyprien burst out laughing, and I could not help smiling, partly at the roguish way in which the dog was bolting Cyprien's lunch, and partly at the way in which Miss Lindsell scolded him for his trick.

"Oh, Captain," she said, "you naughty, naughty dog! You greedy creature—you sly thing! How could you go and take this man's dinner? For shame, for shame, naughty dog! I am so sorry," she went on to Delbez—"so very, very sorry."

But Cyprien went on laughing, and said his walk had given him an appetite, perhaps he thought he had come out to lunch. She had her purse in her hand now, and taking out a five-franc piece, she said:

"I am afraid you won't be able to buy anything to eat here, but please take this, for the damage the dog has done."

Delbez stopped laughing, and drew a step back.

"No, thank you, mademoiselle," he said; "no, thank you." He looked as if he did not like her to offer him money.

"Oh, do," she said, "seeing your bottle is broken, and all your eatables gone; I really wish you to."

"I assure you, mademoiselle," he said still more proudly, "that I will not take the money; and besides," he went on, changing his tone as she drew back her hand, "it is not such a serious affair as all that. I lodge at Talbot's, and I will go up now and get some more bread, if mademoiselle will allow me to show her the way."

She thanked him very pleasantly, saying that it looked such a break-neck way that she should be glad of a guide. She called Captain and scolded him once again, and they set off towards my house. Cyprien seemed a little embarrassed, but her easy manner soon put him at his ease—she had that way with her—she treated every one just as if they were her equals, and yet I always felt as if she were a princess. As I ate my lunch I watched them go, Captain walking behind, looking very much ashamed of himself. Miss Lindsell stopped several times, and I could see by their gestures that she was asking Cyprien questions about all she saw. They crossed the brook on the large flat stepping-stones, and began the winding ascent among the trees. It was rough going, and a narrow path. Cyprien went first, and I saw him turn sometimes to help her; every now and then they were hidden by the bushes, and ferns, and tall jutting rocks, but each time I saw them they seemed to be talking busily, and I caught the sound of Miss Lindsell's voice borne on the soft wind. To you it may seem a very uninteresting kind of thing to dwell on, but I feel as if I should like to shut my eyes and watch all that morning go by me in fancy again. I asked Cyprien afterwards what she had found to talk to him about, and he said that it was chiefly about the things they passed, and he added: "She seemed to love all the flowers and green things as if they were alive; and she watched the insects flitting about in the sunshine, and she stopped to listen to the birds. I think she is herself a good bit like the flowers and the sunlight, and the things that make summer pleasant."

After this we often saw Miss Lindsell; sometimes she came with her uncle, and sometimes alone. She often went to see my wife, now she knew the way—to cheer her up, she said. She always had a pleasant word for us as she went by with her hands full of flowers. I don't exactly know when I first noticed how Delbez used to watch for these visits, he always seemed to be on the look-out, glancing continually up the hill all day long if she did not come; but, anyhow, it dawned upon me that he did watch for her, and that the great event of his day was her coming. In fact, I began to suspect that Delbez had let himself, to put it quite plainly, fall very much in love with Miss Lindsell. Not from anything he ever said, for though my wife often talked about her at supper, he didn't join in the conversation. He listened eagerly, that was all. I very well remember the day when I was convinced in my own mind that I had guessed right. Miss Lindsell came past with her uncle; she had her hands full of large white daisies and dark green moss, or rather I should say she had filled her little basket with them, and held the overflowings in her hands.

She left her uncle, and came towards us; the wind swept by, and carried two or three of her daisies on to a heap of stones near us. She began to tell us that she was making a collection of butterflies, and she said to me:

"There is a very rare butterfly seen sometimes on the cytissus about here, which I should like to have. I certainly sha'n't find it in England, it is hardly ever seen there. I am going to give your little boy a butterfly-net, and shall show him a picture of the butterfly; then if he can get me one quite uninjured I will give him ten francs."

My little boy was just ten, but he wasn't much given to scrambling about over the rocks. His chief amusement was to climb up to the slow stream that ran near our house, and there sail his little boat, and work a bit of a water-wheel that Cyprien had made for him. I told her this, but she answered in her impetuous way:

"Never mind, I will bring the things to-morrow. We are going to have a picnic at the upper end of the valley, and I will come and find Joey late in the afternoon."

She went away nodding and smiling. I had looked at Delbez once or twice while she was by. Poor fellow! his face plainly told me I was right in my fears for him. He watched her with an expression of such adoration and love that I cannot attempt to say what it was like. I had to go and speak to Mr. Lindsell just then, and when I came back to where we were working, Delbez was putting something very carefully into the pocket-book he always carried. I said:

"What's your treasure, my boy?"

He looked up with a start as I came behind him. He did not know that I saw three daisies between the leaves, and he put me off with some answer or another. From that day I watched him with very great pity. Perhaps he oughtn't to have allowed such a feeling to spring up in him; perhaps he had fought against it and been beaten. However it was, I can only tell you that if ever a woman was worshipped by a man, Miss Lindsell was worshipped by poor Cyprien.

The next day was Saturday, and as we kept to English habits about half-holidays, Cyprien and I were at home in the afternoon. We had seen the picnic-party pass by in the morning. There were a great many ladies and gentlemen. Miss Lindsell had on a dress of very pale blue, with some dark crimson flowers at her neck and waist. You may wonder at my remembering such a thing as that, but I thought so much of all that concerned her then that I can see the whole scene exactly over again.

On Saturday afternoons, as a rule, Delbez used to smarten himself up and walk down to Lantrac, to see his relations, and he often spent Sunday there as well. His father and mother were dead, but he had an old aunt in the town who made a great fuss with him, and a married brother. His sister-in-law had two nice-looking sisters, and I used to think that they all wished to arrange a marriage for Cyprien with one of them.

However, this particular Saturday, though he dressed himself with more than usual care, he did not go to the town, but lit his cigarette and climbed up to the higher stream. No doubt from there he saw Miss Lindsell coming. She did not come alone ; a lady and gentleman walked with her to the door, and promised to come for her in half an hour. Soon after she had sat down, in came Cyprien, looking so handsome, with a glow of pleasure all over his face. Oh, sir, I could not make you understand how much I loved that man. I never had a brother, but he was all to me that a brother could have been, and now it seemed to me that I loved him ten times more than ever I had done, because of the pity I felt for this love that had taken possession of him. I couldn't make out what it could lead to. It looked equally sad whether he kept it to himself or whether he betrayed it. Miss Lindsell had got a book about butterflies in her hand, and was amusing little Joey very much by what she told him about them. She showed him the butterfly she wanted him to look for, and told him where he would probably find it.

"You know," she said, "I should enjoy looking for it myself, but it is usually seen in the early morning, so I can't manage it."

She showed him how to manage the butterfly-net, and promised him ten francs for a good specimen.

All the time Cyprien was standing near watching her with the greatest attention, though he only partly understood what she was saying, as she was speaking English. She looked up, and catching his earnest gaze, she said pleasantly :

"You look interested, M. Cyprien; should you like to know what it is all about?"

As their eyes met, I could not help looking from one to the other. His were so passionate and full of love—do not think of him, sir, as if he had been an Englishman, but make some allowance for his Southern nature—his look was so rapt and so adoring, that if hers had been less pure and innocent she must have read his secret then and there ; but though she did not learn it just then, I think she must have begun to suspect it soon after, for there is something in a woman's nature that does not leave her long in doubt when she is loved, though, of course, their position being so different, and the improbability of a workman presuming to love a born lady, made her slower to read the signs of this man's heart. He drew nearer to her when she spoke to him, and holding the back of her chair with one hand, he bent a little over the book with her, while she went all over again what she had been saying to Joey, but this time in French. As she spoke, he bent lower and lower till her head almost rested against his shoulder, and her breath must have been on his cheek.

To me it seemed that he was not listening to her words, only to the sound of her voice, which drew him like a spell. Suddenly she said, "You understand all I am telling you, do you not?" and turned her face towards him. He was so near her that by moving she must touch him. Her arm rested for a moment against his, and their eyes met close, with only a few inches between them. She drew back startled from his ardent gaze, though I doubt if she realised the truth then. She tried to go on about the insects, but I could see she was embarrassed, which was something quite new for me to observe in her. In a few minutes more her friends came back for her, and she left us.

Delbez took up the butterfly-net and examined it. I said :

"Well, Joey, do you mean to try and get your ten francs?"

"I don't care if he doesn't," said my wife ; "fond as I am of Miss Beatrice, I couldn't bear to live with my heart in my mouth until Joey had caught this creature, which I certainly should do while he was scrambling about over the rocks to get it."

I knew that after the mother had said this that Joey would not put her to much anxiety on his account ; but I also knew that, if the butterfly were to be caught far or near, Miss Lindsell would have it, for Delbez would get it for her.

A day or two after this I met with rather a serious accident : a block of stone slipped on to my foot, and it was nothing less than a miracle that my foot was not crushed to atoms. As it was, I had to lie up, and I didn't get the right use of it for some time ; so not being able to go to the works at all, Delbez replaced me there, and I did not see much of him except in the evenings.

Joey did not exert himself much about Miss Lindsell's butterfly ; he used to watch the heather and cytius by his favourite brook, but though he saw one once or twice, he did not manage to catch it. I used to hear Cyprien go out every morning soon after sunrise ; he did not tell me what it was about, but I made a good guess. I asked him several times if he had seen Miss Lindsell ; he always said, "No, she had not been near the place."

He was growing much more reserved and quiet than he used to be ; sometimes he would come and have a good laugh with me, but he spent most of his leisure time wandering about the hills with Joey's neglected butterfly-net. As to his relations in Lantrac, he scarcely ever went to see them.

One Sunday, his old aunt, Madame Sicard, made a great effort, and walked over to Planche Torte. She had heard of my accident, and I suppose she thought it was a good opportunity of coming to enquire into the absence of her favourite nephew. I could hear her talking to my wife and Cyprien as I lay in bed in the next room. She was very fat, and the long walk had made her very hot.

"What heat!" she began ; "I have been walking in a veritable frying-pan ; the dust suffocates one, and I have swallowed a good portion—more than my share, I bet. And so the poor Maitre Joseph has met with an accident—it is a terrible trade, a stone-cutter's. I knew a poor man who was crushed in a quarry by a block of stone falling on him, but he was a quarryman—it is more dangerous than that. Ah, madame, your lemonade is very good. Ah!" and she took another deep draught.

She gave a great many counsels about the treatment I ought to have, and the tisanes I ought to drink to keep off fever, and then she began on the subject nearest her heart.

"Why have you deserted us, mon fils? It is three weeks since you have been near us. To-day I prepared your favourite dishes—I made quite a dinner. I thought you would be sure to come. I did not go to the mass, but when I had finished my cooking I sat myself on the chair outside the door. Three times I thought I saw you turn the corner by the octroi; three times I watched a tall man coming along, and I said, 'It is he,' 'It is not he,' 'Is it my Cyprien?' and it was not. The dinner was quite spoilt before we ate it, and I had no appetite for disappointment. Last night, too, we looked for you, there was a dance—a beautiful dance—at the Café Plaisance; all the town was there, even M. Rombon, the fat butcher ; your sister-in-law thought you would certainly come to dance with Yronne and Margot." There she stopped, out of breath, and drank some more lemonade. Cyprien said he was sorry he had disappointed them all, "especially about the dinner," he said, laughing ; as to the ball, he was too tired in the evenings to be good for much dancing—Yronne and Margot would find better partners than him.

"Ah, mon cher," she said, "do not work too hard ; you are slaving early and late—you will kill yourself," and she went on making a great fuss, till Cyprien appeased her by offering to escort her home, to her great delight. He came back, however, early in the evening.

It was a sad thing to think that he was growing not to care to spend his time with the people who loved him so much. His mind seemed centred on this new emotion—this adoration of Miss Beatrice—which quite lifted him above all his old associations. The expression of his face even was gradually changing, and getting more refined ; sadder, a great deal sadder, but more handsome for all its sadness.

I do not know exactly how long it was after Miss Lindsell's visit when she had left the butterfly-net that Cyprien came dashing into my room, radiant with pleasure. I couldn't think what had happened to him.

"Joe, old fellow," he called out, "look at what my good fortune has sent me!" and he showed me a beautiful butterfly which he must have caught with great care, for it was quite uninjured.

He would scarcely let me look at it, for fear I should breathe on it and blow off its soft feathers. He put it into a little box and carried it off with him to work. I had never seen anyone look so happy as he did at having got something she had asked for.

When he came home at night I asked him if Miss Lindsell had been seen, and if he had had a chance of giving her his butterfly. He had not, and he seemed a little damped.

Day after day for quite a fortnight it was the same thing. Miss Lindsell did not come near Planche Torte, which I thought was strange of her, because she must have heard of my accident. I had not seen Mr. Lindsell either for some time. Sudden business had called him to England two days after I was hurt, and he was not expected back for another week at least.

By degrees I got a little better, and was able to hobble out with a stick and get some fresh air, and sit on the seat we had made under a chestnut tree by the door.

One Sunday, Cyprien and I were sitting there together. The day was oppressively hot ; it was the end of June, and we had had no rain for weeks ; the stream at the bottom of the valley was almost parched up ; there was not a breath of wind, and the leaves of the trees and the flowers hung heavily in the heat ; over the tops of the hills there were low dark clouds lying motionless against the dazzling sky.

Cyprien was reading a book of Victor Hugo's poetry—"Legende des Siècles," I think it was called. I know I could not understand it, but he enjoyed it very much. He had been trying to make me admire the story of Daniel in the lions' den as it is told there, but I could not see very much beauty in it ; it seemed to me fantastical to imagine the beasts reasoning about Daniel, and not killing him because of this or that. I like the Bible story better. Of course Delbez hadn't read his Bible, so I got mine, and began reading him the story there.

Presently I saw him start, and following the direction of his eyes, I saw Miss Lindsell coming down the slope towards the brook. I could not go to meet her, and I suppose Delbez was too conscious, so I went on reading until she had climbed our hill, and then we both rose and went towards her.

"Oh, Talbot," she said at once, "I am so sorry to see you so lame! I should have been up to see you before, only that Mrs. Lindsell has been very ill, and I have been nursing her closely, and have never had time to take any walks." She looked rather worn and pale, I thought. She sat down by me, and asked me all the particulars of my accident, and said over and over again that she had often wished to come and see me, but had not been able. "And," she added, "I wanted, too, to see if Joey had earned his ten francs. I hope he has."

I told her that Joey was too fond of dabbling and paddling in the brook to give much attention to anything else. He had seen the butterfly she wanted, and had been quick enough to catch it, but— And then I looked at Cyprien, thinking he would like to tell her himself that he had found one. She guessed at once, and said:

"Joey has not, but you have, M. Cyprien. That is kind of you. I am so much obliged. Do go and fetch it to show me."

She seemed quite to have forgotten the moment's embarrassment he had caused her, for she spoke to him as frankly as ever.

Cyprien did not want to be asked twice to fetch his treasure, but was back with it in an instant.

"I have been waiting to give it you for three weeks," he said; and when she thanked him again he added: "There is nothing to thank me for; it was a great pleasure to me to get it for you."

But dear me! when the lid came off the box it was plain to see that the butterfly was quite spoilt. One of its delicate wings was broken off, and it was all messed with knocking about for so long in his pocket. You see he wasn't used to dealing with such things, and he had never thought that each time he had carried it out in hopes of giving it to her it had grown so much less worth giving. You should have seen the look of disappointment on the poor fellow's face. Miss Lindsell, too, looked disappointed for a moment, but when he said very wofully, "Oh, mademoiselle, it is spoilt. I thought I was giving you quite a treasure, and it is only a decayed insect," she smiled pleasantly at him and answered:

"I value your kindness just the same, and think that with a little trouble I can make the butterfly look very well in my collection."

"Oh no," he said; "you wanted a perfect one, and a perfect one you shall have; you will let me do this one thing for you, will you not?" and he emptied the unfortunate box on to the ground and crushed the remains of the insect under his feet.

"Oh," she exclaimed, "that was a little too hasty; suppose you do not find another."

"Oh, I shall find another," he said; "I shall look until I do; it is quite enough for me to know you want it."

She thanked him quite simply, and then began to tell us that she had started her collection of butterflies after reading the life of a poor Scotch shoemaker, who had done wonderful things in the way of collecting birds and insects, and such things. I dare say she told us the story just then to turn Cyprien's thoughts from his failure. She told it very well, and I listened eagerly; as for Cyprien, it was just the same with him whenever she was speaking—he never turned his eyes from her face. She had not finished her story when a squall of wind broke at the upper end of the valley and came rushing down upon us, followed by a rumble of thunder, that came nearer and nearer. We had not noticed that the black clouds had rolled upwards, and gathered thickly until they hung like a curtain over the hill-tops. My wife came hurrying from a visit she had been paying to our nearest English neighbours, with Joey after her. We followed her quickly into the house, and the storm was upon us.

I do not know if you have ever seen how fast these storms gather and break in the narrow valleys in the centre of France. There is no long threatening of tempest as in England; certainly dark clouds may hang about for a few hours, but after the first gust of wind has whirled the dust high into the air, there is barely a moment to seek a shelter. The storm that evening was one of the worst I ever saw. We could scarcely see across the house, except when a vivid flash of lightning lit up every corner; the thunder was incessant, and what with the echo of it, and the roaring of the wind down the ravine, and the dashing of the rain and hail, the noise was deafening. We could not have heard each other speak, even if we had not been awed into silence by the storm.

Joey buried his face in his mother's lap, and she, who was herself frightened, sat close to me in the darkest corner of the room, and laid her head on my shoulder. Miss Lindsell drew back into another corner, and covered her eyes with both her hands. I do not think she was afraid, but it was impossible to face that awful blaze. Cyprien, however, scarcely seemed to notice what was going on; he sat near us, opposite to Miss Lindsell, with his eyes as usual drinking in her wonderful beauty and gracefulness.

She had said to me as we came in: "My aunt knows where I am; she will not be uneasy."

For two hours the storm raged, and then it suddenly ceased. It was near upon seven o'clock, and Miss Lindsell was anxious to get back to Lantrae. I could not possibly go with her, so, though I felt a little reluctant about it, there was nothing for it but to let Delbez go with her across the darkening valley. I sent Joey as well, thinking the child's presence would be enough to keep him back from any imprudence, for from his face and manner I almost feared that he might betray himself.

Miss Lindsell said:

"It is a shame to take you out on such an evening, and just at supper-time too; however, we are sure to meet some one coming for me. My aunt will have sent as soon as the rain ceased."

"Oh, mademoiselle," Delbez exclaimed, "do not think it is a trouble for me to do anything for you, it is my greatest pleasure."

I watched them from the door for a minute, but you could not see far down the slope among the trees, and the evening air felt chilly after the rain, so I turned into the house again.

Not long afterwards Joey came running in.

"Why, Joey," I cried, "you have not met Miss Lindsell's servant already?"

"Oh no, father," he said, "I'll tell you how it is: the brook at the bottom is so swollen that we could not see the stepping-stones—it looks dreadful. All muddy and rushing along, it would have come nearly to my waist. Cyprien said it wasn't safe for me to try and cross. I believe I should have been carried away."

"And Miss Lindsell?" I asked. "What did she do?"

"Well, she was in a great way, until Cyprien said that if she would let him carry her over he would take care she should get across safely, so she let him. I watched them across; he did not slip once, he seemed to know just where the stepping-stones were. Oh, father, I was frightened, for the water looked so wild and angry."

The time went on—nine o'clock struck, ten o'clock, eleven o'clock, and Cyprien did not come in; I could not go off to bed without seeing him. At last, nearly at midnight, I heard his step outside, and I opened the door for him. What my feelings had been during those hours of waiting I cannot tell you, because I really do not know what I dreaded; I felt as if something was happening or going to happen, and I longed to see Delbez in the house again.

"Where did you leave Miss Lindsell?" I asked, scarcely waiting for him to come in.

"On the high-road, hours ago," he answered; "we met the carriage almost directly."

"You have not been to Lantrae, have you?" I asked.

As he came into the light of the lamp I saw that he looked very strange; his face was pale, and his eyes had a far-off kind of look, as if he was watching something in the distance. He took no notice of my question, but began walking up and down the room; he seemed to forget I was there at all.

"My love—my darling!" he began in a soft, low voice; "though I shall never dare to tell you how I love you, though I am only a poor, low-born peasant with hard hands and rough ways, no one will ever love you as much as I do. And I have held you in my arms to-night; you have trusted yourself to me; your breath was on my neck, and I felt your bosom heaving and your heart beating close to mine; the wind blew a lock of your hair across my face!"

He paused a moment, but I could not speak, I was so amazed at him, and besides, he seemed not to know that he was thinking aloud. He went on:

"Ah, you must know I love you, you must have read it in my eyes a thousand times; my heart must have told it to yours this evening. How could you have been so near me and not have felt that my whole being was saying, 'I love you—I love you!' And when you gave me your hand, thanking me, did you not feel 'I love you' in the kiss I pressed upon it? I feel the touch of your cool fingers still against my lips—I shall feel them till I die."

He paused again, and I said, partly from pity for him, and partly because I wanted to remind him I was there:

"My poor boy—my poor boy!"

He came and stood by me.

"Why do you pity me?" he asked almost fiercely. "I want no man's sympathy, I am far more to be envied. She is the most beautiful woman on earth—the most beautiful woman that ever a man loved, and I have been fortunate enough to see her and love her; there is nothing for pity in that. If ever I felt any pity for myself—but I could not, I could not!—I should think of her clinging to me to-night, I should shut my eyes and clasp her in my arms; I should never feel unhappy while I could look back on that. How could I ever forget it? No, I shall never forget the smallest, lightest word I have heard her speak. I shall never forget a look or a movement of hers."

Then he turned away abruptly and went upstairs, but late on in the night I heard him pacing backwards and forwards above me, and very early he woke me going downstairs and out through the door.

I do not know what made me get up, dress as quickly as possible, and follow him out, though I could scarcely limp along with my stick. It was a sort of longing to be with him. I could not see him at first; he was climbing about the side of the hill with his butterfly-net. When I called to him, he came to me, and we went and walked slowly along the bank of the upper brook. We could not see the torrent below because of the trees and brushwood on the steep sides of the hill; but in a little time we came to a place where an old landslip had cleared out a peep into the bottom of the valley. We stood to look down. For some distance below us the rocky bank shelved outwards, covered with tufts of flowering things and ferns; then it broke away abruptly, and from the margin about a dozen feet below us you could drop a stone to the very bottom, where, beside the bed of the torrent, the grass grew up round the fallen rocks. I was glad to sit down and rest. Cyprien seemed quite himself again, and I hoped he had forgotten the wild words of the night before. "The water is not so high as it was last night," he said; but still it was a wonderful sight, as it raged foaming along. We stood watching for some time. Presently Cyprien called out: "Look, look! do you see that butterfly? That is the sort she wants." And, sure enough, hovering along close to us, was the beautiful insect. It was nearly black, with dashes of gold on its broad wings, which flashed in the sun. It lighted near-by, and he stole towards it with his net outspread. However, it rose again, and, what with his caution and the restless ways of such insects, I watched him go backwards and forwards after it for a good ten minutes, within a few yards of me. Then the butterfly flew downwards and settled on a clump of broom below us. Cyprien seized the trunk of a slender tree, and swung himself off the broad ledge on which we were standing to the rocky slope beneath.

"Don't," I cried, "it isn't worth the risk; and you'll never catch it there."

"I'm all right," he shouted back, "don't fear for me."

And certainly I knew him to be uncommonly sure-footed and agile. Nevertheless, I came forward and watched him nervously. He could not quite reach the butterfly from where he stood, so he stretched his foot to the next bit of jutting rock, and with one hand firmly holding by a shrub, he reached out his net again. Again the butterfly was too quick for him. He jumped another stride farther, and now he was sure of his booty.

"I have it!" he shouted, and at the same moment I heard a horrible crash, and a cry of dismay. I do not know whether his footing had given way, or if the plant he was holding to had come up, its roots being loosened by the rain; I only know that I saw him fall, struggling and clutching as he fell; for a second he held by a great fern, but his whole weight was on it, and before he could get a footing it broke.

I never can think of that moment without a cold sweat breaking over me, and my mouth parches up just as it did when I stood there, quite powerless to help him in that awful moment. I shrieked like a woman again and again, and then—I don't know how I did it with my lame foot, but this I did, and never seemed to feel that I was lame—I rushed back to our path, and was down at the foot of the rocks in no time, not heeding the rough going. He lay there motionless and bleeding, but not dead, for he was groaning fearfully. His head was knocked about and cut, and I cannot tell you what the rest of his injuries were. I did what I could for him, tearing my shirt in strips to bind up the cuts on his head.

At last he seemed to be coming to himself, for he opened his eyes, and tried to speak to me. I had to lean close down to him before I could hear what he said; it was, "Send for her." But there was no one to send for anything, and I could not leave him.

It may have been about an hour that I stayed there before I heard some of our men coming to work. Oh, how I shouted, and, at last, they heard me, and came to us. One of them—a Frenchman—I sent to Lantrac, giving him at the same time a line in pencil to Miss Lindsell. I wrote:

"Delbez has met with an accident, and is dying—he asks for you."

I was obliged to take the paper for this little note out of Cyprien's pocket-book, for I had nothing to write on; as I opened it to tear a leaf out, three dry daisies fluttered out and fell on his breast. I gathered them up and put them back, remembering how they had got there. The other men soon contrived a stretcher on which they carried the poor fellow up the hill to my house, and one of them helped me along. When I got in I found him lying on my bed on the ground-floor, seemingly unconscious, but groaning at intervals, and my wife busying herself attending to him. I sat down by the bed. I was quite overcome, body and mind, by what I had gone through, and the time slipped by as if I was in a dream. Every moment I seemed to see him falling, and clutching, and falling, and I heard the clatter of stones that fell before him into the precipice. The doctor came and went; he told us Cyprien might linger for a few hours, and that, as no skill could save him, he would not torment him by meddling with his injuries. At last I heard a step which I knew to be Miss Lindsell's. My wife went to meet her and brought her into the room. She looked very sad and pale as she went straight to the bed and stood beside it.

"M. Cyprien," she said, bending softly over him; "M. Cyprien, you sent for me, and I have come."

He opened his eyes languidly, and a faint smile seemed to come into them, and his fingers closed over hers. He drew her forwards—he was trying to say something. My wife went silently out of the room, but I was fixed in my place. No sound seemed to come from his lips, and Miss Lindsell stooped lower, that she might not lose any word he might whisper. Poor fellow! he tried again and again, but the power of speech had left him altogether. Then with one last despairing effort, he raised his arms, and flinging them round her, drew her close down to him, her face against his. She did not shrink from his passionate embrace, but laid her lips tenderly on his. I buried my face in my hands and tried not to sob aloud, while the tears fell through my fingers. There was a long silence; then the clinging arms loosed their hold, the head sank back, and I looked up to see Miss Lindsell gently freeing herself from his clasp. I watched her lay his hands crosswise on his lifeless breast, and then she turned and went away without a word, as if she forgot that there was anything but death left in Planche Torte.

The East Wind.

THE dim fog moves to greet the coming morn,
Then glideth gently towards the flushing west,
That folds it softly to its waking breast.
The shivering birds, 'mid nestlings newly born,
Quiver and shake; then rustling, all forlorn,
The pale-green leaves curl up, half closing, lest
They'd die at birth. Swift o'er the blue hills' crest
The sky grows clear, before the east wind's scorn,
The sun burns brightly, scorching with its power
The thin new buds until they open out,
And gaily blooms in haste each wee spring flower;
Till once more, with a weird, triumphant thrust,
The wild breeze blows, and rain-clouds sadly lower,
And cold and nipping frost lies white about.

"My Lord Conceit."

(A SERIAL STORY.)

By the Author of "FRAGOLETTA," "DAME DURDEN," Etc., Etc.

Book VI.

CHAPTER IV.

AMONG the passengers who landed at Gravesend from the "Orient" was a short, commonplace-looking man, with a shrunken yellow face and a pompous manner. He went to the best hotel, and gave autocratic orders, and generally comported himself as one accustomed to rule and dictate.

Obsequious waiters bowed before him, and conducted him to a private sitting-room already ordered, requested his instructions as to dinner, and presented offerings in the shape of newspapers and magazines to while away the time until that meal should be ready.

"I am expecting a visitor," said the pompous individual. "You will show him here directly he arrives."

The waiter bowed and assured him that his wishes should be attended to. The gentleman then wheeled the most comfortable chair he could find up to the fire, placed another for his feet, selected a newspaper for perusal, lit a cigar, in lordly defiance of rules, and prepared to pass the interval of waiting as agreeably as circumstances would permit.

His solitude was not of long continuance. A knock at the door was speedily followed by the appearance of his expected visitor.

For an instant the two men surveyed each other critically, as if taking mental notes of each other's capabilities.

Then the occupant of the chairs removed his cigar from his mouth, nodded carelessly, and remarked:

"Count Savona, I presume?"

"At your service, sir," said the stranger, with a polite bow that seemed to convey a rebuke against the boorishness of his reception.

"Take a chair," said the Englishman. "I'm John Marsden, as, no doubt, you guess. Now may I ask why you've thought proper to drag me over all these thousands of miles of sea and land? It nearly cost me my life, I assure you. Tiger-cats may be very pretty things to look at and play with, but they're the devil with their claws."

"So I presume," said the count with a quiet smile. "I am a wise man, Mr. Marsden, and leave such playthings to those who like scratches better than purring. However, since you are here, let us to business. You may be very sure I have not asked you to come to England for nothing. What would you say if I informed you that there was a nice little property with a comfortable rent-roll at your disposal—dependent only on a very simple condition?"

The sallow face flushed suddenly.

"What do you mean?" asked John Marsden.

"Just what I say. The property comes to your wife. I have taken the trouble to trace it out—no small trouble or difficulty, I assure you. It is fortunate that you did not come to open warfare, because you have an opportunity now for being magnanimous. She knows nothing yet. You have only to throw yourself at her feet, or let her throw herself at yours, to forget and forgive the past, and step into the position of an English landowner."

The cigar had dropped from John Marsden's lips. He looked stupefied.

"I—I can't believe it," he muttered.

The count shrugged his shoulders.

"Odd that people always find it harder to believe good fortune than bad. It's quite true, I assure you. I advised you to come home because it is better policy to make up your quarrel with your wife before she learns that she is an heiress. It looks so disinterested now. A month hence it won't."

"But—but," stammered John Marsden foolishly, "I don't think she will make it up. I've insulted her, quarrelled with her—I've never sent her a penny since you told me about her goings-on with that fellow Grant, and now how the deuce can I go to her, and expect her to be friends? She'll never come back."

"Ah," said the count with his chill smile, "there steps in the beauty of your English law. Madame the wife may quarrel as she pleases with monsieur the husband, but when monsieur the husband desires that she shall live under his roof, madame cannot help herself, unless— Well, your wife is not a woman to avail herself of that outlet, or she would have done it before now. Do you know how she has supported herself these three years?"

"No," said John Marsden sulkily.

"By writing. She is quite a celebrated authoress now. You don't know what a gold mine you have found."

"Where is she now?"

"At Vaux Abbey, with her friends the Dunbars. Oh, I assure you her conduct has been quite irreproachable. When your telegram came, refusing to receive her in India, she was with her father. After the first shock was over she recognised and accepted her position without a murmur, turned her wits to work, and took to writing; stuck to it, persevered at it, won recognition despite the difficulty, and has fairly floated herself now. She's a wonderful woman, my friend. I'm inclined to think you threw her away a little too easily."

"You seem to know a great deal about her," said John Marsden, looking at the count suspiciously.

"I do. You are not jealous, are you? I make it my business to know everything about any one in whom I am interested."

"And why has my wife the honour of arousing your interest?"

Savona smiled coldly.

"That is not the point at issue. We need not discuss it."

"And you are sure this fellow Grant was in love with her?"

"As sure as that I live."

"And she with him?"

"Certainly. But only virtuously, platonically in love. The sort of thing one reads of in novels—long blindness, sudden awaking, temptation, self-conquest, renunciation. It only depends on you to keep back the third volume from the inevitable happy issue."

"On me?"

"Certainly," said the count with an irrepressible sneer. "Take back your own property and guard it better in future. There are few men with a handsomer wife, none with a cleverer one. Ivor Grant knows her value better than you."

"Curse Ivor Grant!"

"With all my heart. He is very unfortunate—in war as well as in love. You know he volunteered in the Mexican service after he left England."

"You told me so. Is he not dead yet?"

"Severely wounded, I believe. Has a Quixotic attendant—a simple sort of fellow whom he rescued from starvation, or something. The said body-guard struck up a friendship with my man—also a beggar rescued from crime—my hold the strongest, you see, safety versus gratitude. Through my man I learn all about Grant's man. Simple but efficacious!"

"You seem to have a fancy for worming yourself into people's private affairs," said John Marsden suspiciously.

"Perhaps I have," said the count with his evil smile. "Everyone to his taste, my friend. Yours seems to run in the way of 'tiger-cats'; mine, family secrets. It is surprising what a number I've unearthed in my time. However, we are drifting away from the main point. You would like, no doubt, to hear about this strange windfall. It is quite a romance, I assure you."

"Will it take long? Because we might just as well dine, and discuss it afterwards."

"With all my heart. There are a lot of papers to be gone into. No doubt we shall feel more comfortable after dinner. You have ordered it, I suppose?"

"Yes; soup, fish, and cutlets. Will that suit you?"

"Admirably. I abhor the English fashion of heavy, solid meals. To order a dinner is as much an art as to write a poem. Unfortunately the 'orderers' seem as rare as the poets."

The entrance of the waiter at this juncture interrupted the conversation, and confined it to generalities.

Count Savona did ample justice to the repast, but Marsden looked anxious and disturbed, and ate but little.

"Have you seen my wife lately?" he asked, as the door closed at last on the waiter.

"No. Your wife is no great friend of mine," answered the count. "Captain Grant took care of that. Were I to present myself to her, she would not receive me. I am sorry for it. I admired her. She was an interesting study."

"She!" sneered John Marsden. "In what way?"

"In all. Perhaps, like most husbands, you resent the fact that your wife should be an object of interest to any other man. That is such an odd idea. The mere fact of marriage doesn't sink a woman's individuality, doesn't blind others to her beauty or her charm. Yet you husbands think it ought to. There are some women, my friend, easier to win than to hold."

"I never bothered my head about them," muttered John Marsden sulkily.

"You should about one," said the count; "she was worth it."

"She was just like the rest," he answered curtly. "Fussing about her children, and full of fads and fancies. She never could get on with the people I did, and I'm sure in India none of our set liked her."

"Doesn't say much for your set then," said Savona, slowly draining his glass. "As for her love for her children, be thankful, my friend, that she had children. I wouldn't give much for your chances now if she hadn't. Listen," and he set the glass down on the table, and leant forward in sudden earnestness. "A girl marries, knowing little or nothing of life, and with all the dreams and fancies of youth blossoming like flowers in the garden of her soul; so she goes to the man whom fate, or fancy, or expediency has chosen for her. So Beryl Foster went to you. When I met her—a woman—with the history of a past, and the coming struggle of a future, written in her face, I said to myself, 'She has suffered, but she has never loved. Yet she is a woman any man in this world might be proud to call his wife.'"

"May I ask the purport of all this?" asked John Marsden impatiently.

"The purport," said Savona, sinking his voice to deeper earnestness, "is that I want you to save her, not drive her to desperation. She is of the stuff that makes martyrs. Honour, and duty, and all that, are more to her than her own personal peace and happiness. Her children have been the loadstar of her life as yet. You are their father, and though she doesn't love you, yet that claim is the strongest of any you could put forward. You must put it forward, or you will lose her. She loved them better than anything on earth—better even than the man who would have died to give her an hour's happiness. Some women are so. We can't understand it, but it is well for us that they are. It is their way, and the one help and safeguard that keeps them pure and true, even to what is vile and base. You look surprised. You would not have thought me capable of sentiment? Ah, you are not the first man whom I have puzzled. I am telling you what your wife is, in order that you may win her back and make her happier. It won't be an easy matter, but you must promise me to do it."

"Why, may I ask?"

The softness, the sentiment, all vanished from Savona's face like a cloud swept aside. The old, hard, mocking devilry was in his eyes and in his voice as he threw himself back in his chair, and looked at his companion.

"Why—because if you are a man at all, revenge should be sweet to you! Why—because it lies in your power to deal your rival a worse blow than Fortune has done. Why—because to claim your wife and keep her under your authority, is the surest vengeance you can take on Ivor Grant—for she it is who is the holder of his lost possessions, and the mistress of Grantham Court!"

CHAPTER V. "ONE MUST THINK—SOMETIMES."

As those strange words fell from Beryl Marsden's lips, her friend turned very pale, and all that jesting manner fell from her like a cloak.

"What do you mean?" she asked breathlessly, and sank down on the floor beside her, and gazed at her face with wide and frightened eyes.

"I hardly know myself," said Beryl hurriedly, "save that it was not—fancy. I saw the figure in the north corridor."

"Good Heavens, Beryl! Are you sure?"

"Quite sure," she said calmly. "I wish I were not. I rushed up the stairs, but my foot slipped, and I fell down. When I got up again it had disappeared."

"And what was it like?" asked Madge fearfully. "You—you are sure you are not tricking me, Beryl?"

"My dear, do I look as if I were? Illusion or reality, or whatever it may be, I certainly saw the figure you described—that of a monk in monkish dress, crossing the corridor. The only thing—"

"What! do go on," cried Madge impatiently.

"The only thing that puzzles me," said Beryl, speaking very low and earnestly, "is that the figure looked too substantial, too real, to be a ghost, if such things as ghosts exist at all, and the eyes," she shuddered, and covered her own, as if to shut out some loathsome sight, "the eyes were so evil, so diabolical, I can't get them out of my mind. They seem to be looking at me wherever I turn."

"You are unnerved, unstrung," said Madge soothingly; "you work too hard, dear, and too long. I shall have to forbid your writing at night altogether. It is very bad for the nerves."

Beryl smiled faintly.

"I don't think I have any. I have never been troubled with that feminine complaint. But, Madge," she continued, laying her hand on her friend's arm, and speaking with strangely solemn voice, "I feel sure that something is going to happen to me—some great change, or sorrow."

"Not that, I hope," cried Madge with sudden energy. "Oh, Beryl, not that! You have had enough to last all your life. Surely there can be nothing more for you."

"Perhaps my cup isn't yet full," said Beryl sadly. "When troubles come they 'come not single spies,' you know. I can vouch for that. And—and why is John coming back?"

"Heaven knows!" cried Madge impetuously. "Not to worry you, I hope. Do you—shall you see him?"

"If he wishes it."

"But he has behaved so abominably," remonstrated her friend.

"Have I been faultless?" asked Beryl gently. "Oh, my dear, one's measure of duty must not be weighed by what one receives; the course lies plain and open enough. If it were not so hard," she added with a tired little sigh, "I should be quite certain it was not right. It is always so easy to do wrong, you know."

"Why, oh, why did you marry that man?" cried Madge Dunbar suddenly. "It was just throwing yourself away. You never could have cared for him."

"That is my punishment, I suppose," answered Beryl in the same low, restrained voice. "I allowed myself to be persuaded. I did not think seriously enough of what I was doing. Oh," she cried with a sudden sob, "if I had only known—if I had only known!"

Madge was silent, though her own tears were falling in sympathy with a grief too often bravely suppressed not to shock and surprise her now by its sudden outbreak.

"If the children had been left," continued Beryl, "it would not have been so hard. They always comforted me. At my saddest and weariest moments they seemed to give me hope, to beat back the waves of sorrow and regret. And they loved me so. What is like a child's love? You can't buy it, you can't change it, you can't mistrust it; it is yours—all yours, though you were ever so vile and shameful. Sometimes," she added with a recklessness born of sudden despair and sudden weakness, "I ask myself why I did not take the one chance of happiness left me. What is the world to me, or any human being in the world, save just the one man who loves me and the one man I love? I shouldn't care for poverty or misery, or anything else, with him by my side. Ah, Madge, there are so many things in the world, but there isn't much love! And, after all, what is the best life without it? Coldness, emptiness, bitterness—what mine is fast becoming!"

"Don't speak like that; it nearly breaks my heart," cried Madge, dashing the tears from her sunny eyes with brave effort, "and it is so unlike you. Years ago, when we were only girls, I looked up to you as something so brave, and strong, and true. And your trials have only proved it. It is terribly hard—it must be; and I can't help wondering often and often why you should be tried like this; but if you begin to give way now, Beryl, it won't make things any better, only very, very much worse."

"I know," she said hopelessly. "Few women, perhaps, have ever analysed themselves so mercilessly as I have done. I know where my weakness lies, and its origin and its cause. But now I seem to have reached a point beyond which I cannot go. My strength fails me there."

"And that is——"

"I cannot return to my husband. My whole heart, my whole nature, recoil from it. What he has been to me, or what he made of my life, touched only myself up to a certain point. But he tried me too hard when he threw at my life that hateful insult, when, without a word of extenuation, a shadow of proof, he cast me aside to sink or swim as best I might. I think the iron entered into my soul then, Madge, and it has gone deeper and deeper every day."

Madge Dunbar was silent. What could she say? What words could speak either sympathy or consolation in such a moment as this?

"But you said you would see him," she faltered at last; "and if he is sorry—if he wishes you to come back, what then?"

Beryl shuddered.

"Heaven help me then!" she moaned. "But he won't require so hard a thing from me. He will surely have a little mercy at last."

"I wish—oh, I wish I could help you," cried Madge desperately. "It is a hard case, indeed. I wonder why life is all thorns and briars for some people."

"That is just one of its puzzles," said Beryl with a sad little smile. "We can't solve it, try as we may."

"I can't understand why your husband is coming home now," continued Madge Dunbar perplexedly; "and after all that Indian scandal too. You will have some respite, though. He won't know where you are. If he goes to the rectory, no one can tell him, as you have never been there since your father's death."

Beryl sighed wearily.

"He will find me soon enough if he wants me," she said, rising and putting her hand to her head in a bewildered sort of way. "I am so tired, dear; I think I must go to bed now."

"You are sure you are not afraid to be alone?" enquired Madge, glancing timidly round the room. "I will sleep with you if you like."

"Afraid! My dear, no. I hardly suppose the ghost will forsake his own quarters to favour me with a visit. After all," she added with a little shiver, "no ghost could alarm me more than that ghost which haunts my lonely hours so often—the ghost of my own dead self. Oh, Madge, Madge, how long ago was it that I was a girl—a girl, loving and believing in life, and rejoicing in its every hour? It seems centuries!"

Madge put her arms round her tenderly. She did not speak. Perhaps some womanly sympathy told her that it was better not—that words could only jar on the trembling, unstrung creature, whom a moment of self-abandonment had left so weak.

"You are a happy woman," continued Beryl. "They say that all have our chance of happiness—once. You seized yours in time. I did not know when mine lay at my hand. Ah, what has come to me?" she added with sudden impatience, as she untwined the clinging arms, and moved over to the mantelpiece, pausing there to lean against it in her favourite attitude. "I grow foolish and weak, I think. After all—after all, life is a short thing at best. Why can't one live through it without—without breaking one's heart?"

A sob caught the words and stayed them, though there were no tears in the dark eyes that rested on the dancing firelight.

"I think imagination is the greatest foe to happiness," she went on presently. "It pictures things in false colours—it makes life look what it never is. When—when I was a girl I never believed in love—the love one reads of—the love that makes men cowards and women sinners. It always seemed to me as if one must be able to keep oneself under control if one only tried. As if a feeling could not be unreasoning, blind, mad, miserable, taking root in one's very soul and life; and now," the tears fell again hot and heavy on the clasped white hands on which the beautiful, proud head was bowed, "now what am I to myself—what must I seem to you? I have no strength, no self-respect, no power to be happy, even if I might. No, not even for an hour, one single little hour of all the many that come and go. Heaven help us women when we love! It is worse than madness. It is putting your whole life, and all your power and peace of mind, into the keeping of another; you can't reason with it, you can't alter it, you can only suffer for it; and I am so tired of suffering now."

"Oh, Beryl!" She could say no more. It was so new and pitiful a sight to see that calm, proud self-control broken like this.

"Don't pity me. It only makes me worse. And I suppose I deserve my punishment. Someone says that a woman always loves best the one human creature who gives her the greatest amount of suffering. Do you think that is so? Because, in that case, how I should love—John!”

“I think you should not dwell on it so much,” said Madge gently. “Meeting troubles halfway doesn’t help one through them.”

“I am not myself to-night,” said Beryl, lifting her white face, and pushing the thick, dusky hair from her brow. “I have been nervous, emotional, tragic—all the things I most detest.”

The shadow of a smile, at once sad and bitter, was about her lips. She put her hands on her friend’s shoulders, and looked down at the pretty, troubled face.

“Don’t think of what I have said. I shall be all right to-morrow when I have had a sleep. One always looks at things so differently in the morning light, you know. And now good-night. Cosmo will be wondering what has become of you.”

“You will try not to think any more,” urged Madge. “It can do no good, you know; it won’t alter anything that has been, it can’t avert anything that is to be.”

“Oh, wise philosopher,” said Beryl with sudden mockery, “I shall lay that counsel to heart.”

Was she laying it to heart, lying there in the desolate night with sleepless eyes that saw only the phantoms of past years; was she laying it to heart when, overcome with a passion of unreasoning anguish, she buried her face in her pillows to stifle the stormy sobs that could not be repressed?

“Life is so long,” she cried; “so long when one isn’t happy, and one must think—sometimes!”

CHAPTER VI. HUSBAND AND WIFE.

“SOMEONE to see me?” said Beryl Marsden in a bewildered way as she looked up from her writing. “What name, James?”

“The gentleman would not give his name, ma’am.”

Gentleman! Her heart gave a quick throb. One mad, wild hope seemed to start into life with its startled beating, and show her what a little thing might still make her glad.

But the hope did not last a second. She seemed to recognise how vain and valueless it was, and to push it aside and rise from her table just her ordinary calm, proud self. But her hand was trembling like a leaf.

“I will come,” she said, and it seemed to her that her voice sounded faint and faraway—almost as if someone else were speaking and she listening.

She never knew how she reached the library. Only in some strange, inexplicable fashion she was there, looking at her husband’s face, and wondering why he seemed so shamed and uncomfortable in her presence.

“You—you did not expect me,” he stammered. “Of course not. I did not let you know. It was a sudden thing, and I was not sure of my movements. I—”

He stopped abruptly. Before that calm, proud gaze, his eyes sank abashed. This was no penitent or erring woman, it seemed to him, but rather an accuser before whom all subterfuge and pleas looked pitiful, and poor, and mean as he himself.

Still she did not speak, and the silence made him nervous.

“Won’t you say anything? Hang it all, Beryl, there have been faults on both sides, and if I’m willing to forgive and forget, you might do the same. After all, you’re my wife—nothing can alter that, and though we haven’t hit it off very well hitherto, still we’re both older and wiser now; and—”

Her voice interrupted him.

“May I ask the drift of all these remarks?”

“The drift?” he muttered stupidly. “Well, can’t you see what I mean? I’m sorry I treated you as I did. You didn’t deserve it, I know, but I was in trouble at the time, and worried to death, and it’s not a pleasant thing for a man to hear that his wife is carrying on with some other fellow, and you can’t deny there was something more than friendship between you and Captain Grant, and—”

Again he paused. He had met her eyes, and their cold contempt, their scornful rejection of his excuses, silenced the words on his lips.

“I always thought,” she said, speaking slowly and distinctly, so that each word seemed to fall on his ear with cutting force; “I always thought that it was a husband’s duty to shield and protect his wife. You—you threw me heartlessly into the midst of temptation, and when I claimed your aid, cut me adrift as though I had been the vilest woman living. Do you think,” she went on, her voice losing its calmness, and vibrating with the intensity of passionate emotion; “do you think a woman’s heart can bear to be starved of love always? Do you think she can always be strong enough to beat back longings for sympathy, kindness, trust? What was my life after my children died, and—Heaven help me!—whom have I to thank for their death? If you had had a heart at all, you might have felt for me then; but you did not; you never cared for what I suffered, you only called it sentiment. And I had one friend, one true, brave, steadfast soul on whom I could rely. If he was weak enough to love me, at least it was a love that could not dishonour any woman, for he always placed me and my happiness above all thought of himself. And I struggled so to do right. I did not think you would even thank me for it, I did not think you would understand; but at least I thought you would believe. But you did nothing except throw me back on myself when I was most tried and most weak, nothing save hurl insult and shame at my life without hearing one word of defence. If I had done the worst, if I had gone to the ruin you bade me, you would only have had yourself to blame.”

“I know,” he said gloomily. “But you forget what I heard.”

“And who told you?” she cried with sudden fierceness. “A spy, a traitor—a mean cur who hates me, and is Ivor Grant’s bitterest foe. A man who was a stranger to yourself, and yet whom you chose to believe against your wife. You believed him, you cast me from you, and now, after three years, you come to ask my forgiveness. What is your object?”

The question was so unexpected that it took him off his guard. He began to bluster and fume as he had been wont to do when his wife had seemed to him only a superior form of slave, to rule, and thwart, and govern as the fancy seized him.

She listened with a smile of suppressed contempt.

“It is too late for that now, John,” she said calmly. “I used to obey you readily enough when I deemed it my duty. You forget that it was you who cast me off.”

“I had every right.”

“Then,” she said very quietly, “if you have deemed me guilty for three years, why are you suddenly convinced now of my innocence? I have brought no proofs. I stand before you now as I stood then. Forgive me if I say the change is too startling to appear altogether disinterested.”

His sallow face turned a sickly white.

“Hang it all!” he muttered to himself, “these clever women are the very deuce. They make one look such a fool. I—well, you may believe it or not, as you like,” he said sulkily, “I did want to be friends with you again, and I’m sick of India, and I thought we’d settle down in England, and let bygones be bygones, you know. You see you are my wife still—nothing can alter that.”

“No,” she said hopelessly, “nothing can alter that.”

“And being my wife,” he went on with a sort of malicious triumph, “why it’s only natural I should want to have you with me again. Not that I wish to force your inclinations,” he added hurriedly, remembering Savona’s warning. “But I know you’re a sensible woman, and if I’m willing to overlook the past, why shouldn’t you meet me halfway? Why,” he went on, warming to the subject, and feeling a glow of conscious rectitude that showed him the full magnanimity of his conduct in the present instance; “why, Beryl, there are not many husbands, take them all in all, who’d do as much. A man can’t feel exactly pleased when the woman who’s sworn to love and obey him—”

“You have left out—honour,” she interposed quietly. “Pray quote those marriage-vows correctly, as you are about it.”

“Honour and obey him, then,” he went on doggedly, “takes it into her head to carry on a flirtation with another man. She’s her husband’s property, and she’s bound to respect his wishes.”

“And you think I carried on a flirtation with Ivor Grant?”

“Of course I do. Come, you can’t deny it yourself.”

An odd little tuneless laugh escaped her lips.

A flirtation! She to be accused of “carrying on a flirtation” with this man whom she had revered and honoured with her whole soul, whose memory had been her safeguard in those desolate years, who had been so true and steadfast a friend, whose love for her shone beacon-like above all the storms and trials that beset her! She thought of the loyal heart, the brave and kindly nature; she thought of that long devotion, about her and around her, that had shown itself in a hundred self-controlled ways; she thought of all this, and looked into her heart also, and read its suffering, and its passion, and its woe, and then remembered that this was a “flirtation.”

No wonder she laughed aloud in very bitterness of soul. She knew, standing where she stood, and looking back at the past as she looked, that what to her was a tragedy deep and painful, was yet only to other eyes a common melodrama, a poor, ordinary, pitiful thing enough, at which they could scoff and mock, while her own heart was slowly breaking in the struggle.

The laugh died off her lips. She turned cold, and bitter, and contemptuous once again.

“And you are going to forgive me my ‘flirtation’? You have travelled all these miles to tell me so? How can I thank you?”

His dull eyes looked at her, amazed by this sudden change. He could not comprehend her. The woman who had been the slave of his caprices was very different to this calm, scornful, queenly creature whose eyes seemed to read the pitiful pretences of his narrow soul, to gauge the shallow depths of his nature, and see him for what he was, the weak tool of a stronger and more designing mind.

"Perhaps," she went on presently, "the same kind friend who informed you of my misdemeanours has also thought proper to inform you of my repentance—to suggest that it was a fitting opportunity for reconciliation. Am I right?"

"I don't know what you're driving at," he said sulkily. "Most women in your position would be glad enough to have a chance of reinstating themselves in the eyes of the world."

"Would they?" she said calmly. "But then, you see, the world is so little to me; the world of which you form a part, nothing."

"You are frank," he growled savagely. "The world ought always to be something to a woman, unless she's too bad to care for the opinion of her own sex, or the contempt of mine."

"The contempt of yours would be very hard to bear," she said with her quiet smile; "but it is quite possible to avoid it. I have not found it trouble me much these past three years."

"Oh, of course you think you're very clever and independent, and all that," he scoffed, with an ever-deepening sense of irritation. "But book-writing is no great matter; everyone does it nowadays, and you can't live by it."

"I think I can," she answered in the same quiet, level tone. "I have had to do it for some time past; you appear to forget that."

He looked rather shamefaced.

"Come, come, don't let us begin to quarrel again. I've not behaved well, but you must make allowances. Say you'll be friends, and we'll try and make a better thing of our lives in the future than we've done in the past."

He held out his hand, but involuntarily she shrank away. He saw the gesture, and his eyes grew evil and cruel.

"You must come," he said in a low, repressed voice, "if I wish."

She turned and looked at him as a stag brought to bay might look at its hunter.

"Don't say that," she cried almost fiercely. "Don't try me too far. Give me time—just a little time. I'm not strong, I'm not myself. I want to grow reconciled to the fact, to face it out as a duty, not as—a sin."

"A sin!" he echoed. "What do you mean?"

She shrank still farther away. All her self-command had gone. She was only a frightened, trembling, hunted thing fighting for shelter, for safety, for life—or something dearer still.

"I don't love you," she cried, holding out her hands as if to ward him off. "I never did. I cannot go back to you as your wife—I cannot. Oh, don't ask me—don't ask me!"

For a moment he stood gazing at her as if stunned. Then he laughed aloud.

"Upon my word," he said, "you ought to go upon the stage. It would suit you better than writing books."

The taunt roused her. She drew herself up, and leaning against the table, looked at him defiantly.

"You have never been pitiful or generous to me all my life," she said. "Why should I expect it now? I only ask for—for time."

"You used to have strong notions of duty once," he said with a sneer. "What has become of them all?"

"Perhaps you killed them—perhaps they lie in my children's grave," she said with a faint sob. "There seems such a gulf between what my life was then and what it is now."

"The sooner you get over all that sentiment and nonsense the better," he said brusquely. "It can't do you any good, and it can't alter facts. I only want you to live under my roof. You shall have liberty enough, I promise you, in every other way. It's surely better than sponging on the charity of other people."

What was the change that came over the white face and swaying figure? He could not tell. He could not even be quite sure that there had been a change, so quickly it passed, so impossible it was to define.

"You—you are sure that is all," she said. "No pretence at affection, or—interest; only duty—bare duty; that will content you?"

"Most certainly it will. I'm not a sentimental fool like you."

"Then," she said, laying her hand on her heart as if to stifle some pain that hurt her there, "I will do what you wish."

"That's a sensible woman at last," he said cheerfully. "You shall go your own way, and do just as you please, and act just as you like. Upon my soul, I think it's a far better arrangement than our first compact. We didn't hit it off at all well then."

"No," she said quietly.

Her lips were dry, it seemed hard to speak, and the pain in her breast grew sharper and sharper, like a living creature gnawing its way to her heart.

Something in her look frightened him, callous and selfish as he was.

"Are you ill?" he said. "Can I do anything?"

"No, no," she cried, sinking back on the sofa; "only leave me. I—I told you I was not strong. I can't bear so much as I used to do."

"Good-bye, then," he said, in a strained, bewildered sort of way; "I'm glad you've turned sensible at last. I'll write and let you know my arrangements."

The door closed. She was alone. Her cheek fell against the crimson cushion, and lay there as if carved in stone. Her eyes wandered over the room, noting familiar objects with a strange sense of unfamiliarity. The suffocating pressure at her breast seemed to throb like fire, and yet to weigh like lead. She half rose, and pressed her hands to her heart as if to keep down the pain. But it rose and rose; it was at her throat now, struggling with her breath, strangling her, fighting with her.

"Don't, don't," she moaned, "you hurt me. I can't give way—I daren't give way; I must bear it just as I have borne—the—rest."

She struggled to her feet now. Along the oaken hall came the sound of steps, the echo of voices. Children's steps, children's voices, such as had once made the music of her own life.

The look of agony in her eyes was terrible to see. Involuntarily she threw up her arms, and sank down on her knees by the couch.

"Don't come here," she whispered, shuddering from head to foot. "And oh, don't laugh—don't laugh; it will drive me mad!"

(To be continued.—Commenced in No. 141.)

Unchanging Love.

THE green leaves slowly change to brown,
Then comes a breeze and shakes them down.
The year is changing—do you fear
Lest I should change as does the year?

Life changes too; youth's springtime flies;
We look on life with other eyes;
Yet through the year shines on the sun,
And unchanged sees the swift months run.

And Love, the Sun of Life, lives on
When youth and manhood too are gone;
It fears not death, for it can brave
The unknown terrors of the grave.

Attempt to number every star,
To still the waves that leap the bar,
To drag the sun from out the sky—
Till then at least love will not die!

Our Family Portraits.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

COULD we but summon up the necessary moral courage, and banish from our homes all that is not either useful or beautiful; could we but steel our hearts and ruthlessly slay that worst enemy of the beautiful—association; what a fall there would be of uncouth household gods, unpleasing to our beauty-loving eyes, yet sacred to the conservative instincts of foolish, clinging hearts!

Why has Mrs. Jones ranged in severe order that half-circle of gloomy silhouettes, each mounted on an uncompromising square of staring white cardboard, over the mantelshelf in her bright little parlour? Even because that high nose and long chin, supported by a black "stock," represents a Jones of the past; no less a personage than "Grandpapa Jones." The tip-tilted nose and frills are intended to set forth the ancient charms of "Grandmamma Jones," and the nondescript noses, curved upper lips, and bob curls, recall to the retrospect minds of Mr. and Mrs. Jones, a series of tender maiden aunts.

"My dear grandmother," I have heard Jones say, "had the family picture-gallery hung in the order in which you at present see them above her parlour mantelshelf; they shall hang where they now are as long as Mrs. Jones and I live!" this with a defiant glance at his daughter Selina, who is "advanced."

On the hobs in Mrs. Brown's parlour stand a pair of grim cast-iron dogs, which are continually getting knocked off with harrowing din into the ash-pan.

"Why do you not do away with those ugly things?" I asked on one occasion, as the irate Brown was fishing up a black-leaded Cerberus with the tongue.

"How can I?" he replied savagely. "My mother-in-law would never forgive me; they were a present from her to Jemima on our wedding-day."

Mrs. Brown's hall is, moreover, made unlovely by the apparition of a stuffed crane with a wry neck, and of a pair of superannated gulls, but these mementoes Brown clings to; they were unfortunately shot by his uncle, and presented to him when a boy.

But how shall I attempt to enumerate the countless objects "to memory dear," yet offensive to the artistic eye, which destroy the otherwise harmonious furnishings of the homes I visit? There is the cushion which occupies the place of honour on the couch, its dingy lap-dog, with shadowless beady eye, reclining on a still more faded crimson stool; the alabaster vase, with group of imperishable wax flowers, protected by its glass shade; above all, the tapestry picture, representing Mary Queen of Scots ever meeting her doom, ruddy-cheeked and stolidly indifferent.

From my own hearthstone, however, I let my eyes rove with supreme satisfaction over my surroundings. From ceiling to floor the colour scheme has been successfully carried out: nothing jars upon the gratified senses, if I only keep my regard persistently turned away from the niches at each side of the bright, tastefully-tilled hearth. Here, if I gaze, a deep sense of gloom settles on my spirits, my contentment is ruefully disturbed, for those niches have been reluctantly dedicated to my husband's household gods, in the shape of life-sized portraits of his maternal grandfather and grandmother. I say "portraits," but I have always declined to accept them as such, preferring to believe them to be the cruel practical joke of some dyspeptic artist. Why should my husband's grandparents be so hopelessly plebeian in appearance, when he is a man of such distinguished appearance? And if, as he declares, his grandfather did not succumb to liver-complaint, why has the artist painted that broad, fat face with such a decided tinge of orange-chronie? Where was his artistic taste when he allowed that heavy old lady to sit for her portrait in a headdress like a night-cap, with that odious band of green ribbon tied in a formal bow on the crown, and a full-blown rose in her hand? I could bear these works of art better but for that rose and the old gentleman's horn snuff-box.

"But," you ask, "why have them hung in such conspicuous places in your sitting-room?"

Thereby hangs a tale, which, for the relief of my overcharged feelings, I will tell you.

When John and I were first engaged, and he took me to see his parents, I was only just seventeen. We were not married until I was twenty-one, and during the intervening time I frequently visited his home, and grew to love the dear old lady his mother, and many a long chat we used to have on the subjects we both liked best—our John's virtues and our future—as I sat at her feet in the snug little parlour overlooking the park. Immediately opposite the windows, in the full glare of the daylight, hung those dreadful portraits. I used to look at them furtively, and wonder, with a half-suspicion of the truth, whom they represented. To make enquiries, I felt would be injudicious, as surely the possession of such monstrosities could not be other than embarrassing to the possessor, until it chanced that John and I found ourselves alone in the parlour, with a gathering twilight casting an uncertain glamour over the family portraits.

"John," I whispered, laying a timid hand on his arm, and glancing shyly at the portraits, "were those relations of yours?"

"The oil paintings? Certainly, my love; they are my mother's parents."

"Were they really like that, John?" I asked again, somewhat anxiously.

"I cannot say, my dear; I never saw them in life, but my mother values the portraits. She must see a likeness."

"Oh!" I ejaculated, looking awfully at the cap with its oppressive green ribbons.

John laughed. "I am afraid you do not admire my ancestors?" he said.

I replied by a question: "Do you not think, John, that they would have looked better had they been done a few sizes smaller? And," I continued with hesitation, "I cannot say I like those things in their hands."

John burst into a roar of laughter, which I thought unkind, because I had not meant to say anything funny, and after that he often teased me about the family portraits.

A year after our marriage, John's father died, and the kind old lady only survived her husband a few months. Of course John, being an only child, came into everything, and we had a sale of the household furniture; but the old clock and the portraits had to come here.

Now the clock is a beautiful old thing, with a bell like music, and quite sets off the hall; but the presence of those portraits in my nice sitting-room made me positively wretched. After they were hung up, I sat down and had a good cry, and I know John felt for me.

"Just like the Yorkshire giants one sees painted outside penny shows," I sobbed.

"But what am I to do with them, Ella? You would not have me dispose of my ancestors?" he very justly argued. And I was not such a brute as to contradict him.

They had hung there like great blots upon the fair page of my early married life for about a couple of years, when John's only surviving aunt, a childless widow of considerable means, came to visit us. She had not been many minutes in the room before she exclaimed with rapture: "Oh, John, I see you have got the dear old portraits! How fortunate you are!" She went and stood before them, gazing at them pensively for some time.

My heart gave a great bound. A hope was dawning in my breast, but for the present I remained silent. That very night, when Aunt Jane had retired to rest, I opened the campaign I had been planning.

"John," I began, "Aunt Jane is very much attached to those portraits. Now you know, my love, that I never knew your grandparents, therefore I can have no regard for them personally, and they are not ornamental."

I paused, and looked at John to observe the effect of my remarks. He was covering his moustache with his hand, but I detected a twinkle in his eyes, though he studiously gazed into the fire. I took courage to proceed:

"If you were to make her a present of them, how delighted she would be! And you know, John, it is your duty to pay her some attention; she is our Johnnie's godmother, and—"

"Oh, Mrs. Caudle!" interrupted John, shaking his finger at me and laughing outright.

"Dear John, you will do it; I know you will!" I exclaimed joyfully.

"Do you really suppose that Aunt Jane would drag those cumbersome things all the way to Wales with her?" replied John.

"Try her—promise that you will try her!" I cried.

"Well, she may have them and welcome, as far as I am concerned," was John's rejoinder.

And the result was, that when Aunt Jane left us three weeks later, I had the supreme satisfaction of seeing a large packing-case, containing the family portraits, being hoisted on to the roof of the cab, and whirled out of sight amid the profuse thanks of the delighted old lady. When I went back to my sitting-room, I clasped my hands with a sigh of relief, and immediately hung up a pair of sweetly pretty brackets, placing on them artistic Grecian vases, and I was happy.

John and I were beginning to grow quite a staid married couple, and the family portraits were shades of the past, when we received the intelligence of Aunt Jane's death from sheer old age. We had always kept up friendly relations with her, exchanging occasional letters, and she had remembered Johnnie handsomely in her will. My husband was made executor, and, without a thought to the portraits, he entrusted a solicitor to realise, and his aunt's household furniture, along with some troublesome property, were put to the hammer.

We were not out of mourning for dear old Aunt Jane when John and I took a trip up to London. John had to go on business, and, as I required a change, he took me with him. This was actually my first visit to the great metropolis, so John took me about as much as he could.

One afternoon we wandered through Wardour Street, making the best use of our eyes, when I suddenly found myself blankly staring at a familiar object, which was suspended outside a broker's shop door. I involuntarily tightened my hold of John's arm, and he, following the direction of my eyes, halted abruptly with fascinated gaze. We were looking at the portrait of a heavy old lady, with a cap and green ribbons, a full-blown rose in her hand.

In a moment John had dashed into the shop, leaving me standing bewildered in the street. I followed. John had the Jew dealer by the collar.

"Where did you get that portrait?" he asked breathlessly, following up his question by a shake.

"The shentleman had better take his hand off my collar," replied the Jew, with a glint in his cunning eyes. "I have got it in lawful commershe, and there is the fellow to it."

We looked where his dirty finger indicated, and there, on the floor, amongst a strange variety of ancient lumber, stood my husband's grandfather, horn snuff-box in hand.

The wicked old knave of a Jew perceived at once his advantage. Here was a purchaser at any cost, and after much haggling, John paid down an exorbitant sum, and we left the shop, in possession of the portraits.

They were placed with their faces to the wall at the hotel until our holiday came to an end, and our luggage was augmented on our homeward journey by an immense flat packing-case.

The day after our return I mournfully took down my brackets, and without a word of complaint—for what is the use of struggling against fate?—I helped John to hang the portraits in their old place, and they have hung there ever since.

Aunt Clare's "Old Story."

(A STORY IN TWO WEEKLY PARTS.)

CHAPTER I.

WE thought it had been such a prosaic life; we, her grand nephews and nieces, had only known her an old woman, a quiet, most sweet old lady, just a woman whose placid exterior seemed to say that the vessel of her long life had been sailing over seas of naught but summer sailing.

We had made a mistake—one very often does in one's light judgment of our near-by neighbours of whom we feel so sure of certain knowledge.

"Her ladyship" was the dignified head of an old house, and her son was representing the county. All around the home of her adoption, and all around from the territory of Hayleigh Chase where her family had been known from time immemorial, people had come to swell the long state of her funeral train.

Her eldest son and I, her great-nephew, curate of Hayleigh, were co-executors under her will.

The matter of her will is naught here. To speak about its details would bring forward so many names and so many doings of late times, that I should only cause confusion to fall over her "story."

Some papers lay rolled up and stitched together in an old drawer, the one locked drawer of my aunt's bureau.

She called me her executor. I make myself her editor by untying the roll of papers and giving them to such as like to read. Thus the tale ran:

AN OLD STORY.

I have just tied my papers together and by a freak of childish humour put this title to them, and now I write this one sentence on top of the first page. To think that Clare Hayman should see fit to call her life a story!

My sixteenth birthday! I had looked forward to the day as to a day of much mark, and it was ending with just nothing at all to remember it by, beyond the fact that I could write myself down as one year nearer womanhood. Coveted womanhood! I did not know what was this glorious vision which I was stretching forward to grasp.

We lived in an out-of-the-way village place, but, as my father was Squire Hayman, a sort of local greatness belonged to us. I suppose it was from some ignorant over-importance of my childish notions on this status of ours, that my feminine imagination wandered out to vague and more splendid greatnesses of the world—the world to which I, in my womanhood, might be introduced.

But the world—London—was a long way off, for those were the days of stage-coaches, of a rare strange invention called "gas," by which candles were said to be outshone, of short waists to one's frocks, of sandalled shoon, of "crops" for girlish heads.

The clear, light May evening was lingering long over the far fields and the pale green swelling distances that we called "the hilla." Our woods were there, lifting their fresh greenness up to the daffodil sky that, cloudless and so light, seemed to tremble at the coy advances of the summer twilight.

I was by no means poetising, but rather was unromantically sitting on a stile, and swinging my feet.

I was sixteen, and I was scarcely satisfied, now that I had attained that long-wished-for culmination of maturity. However, if unsatisfied, I was not by nature or habit ill-tempered, and the swinging of my feet, begun in a sort of half-fretfulness, went on with a wild sort of increasing bravado.

"Better luck next time," said I aloud. There were only the evening birds and the open buds of snowy thorn-flowers about me, so what did it matter, if I did utter those four words aloud? If aunt had heard them, I should have been reprimanded for vulgarity. However, she did not hear—no one heard.

"Aunt" was a decided fact in my life; she took care of her brother, the squire, and of his two children, Miles and myself. A most exemplary woman she was; I always knew this, but—but—why did my mother die and leave me for Aunt Clare to shape into young-ladyhood?

Father had promised me a ball when I was sixteen, and—there! some tiresome cousin or other had died, and this, my birthday, was his funeral day. In my impetuous revolt I slapped with my open palm the thick band of the black silk sash that went round my waist.

Such a faraway melancholy was it, such a vanity of mourning was I in!—there had been to me that morning one moment of sweet content, as I stood and surveyed myself in aunt's cheval-glass. My new grey mousseline-de-laine frock was of the latest fashion, the waist so near to my armpits, my gigot sleeves so well bunched out, the small tucks and plaitings at the bottom of the skirt so exactly like a fashion-book. For five minutes I was quite glad; being obliged to go into mourning, I was also obliged to have this new frock.

Long before the sweet May evening had come I had forgotten my vain gladness, there was a very decided anger in the slap which I gave to the offending black sash. I was conscious of the sure fact that had it not been for this untimely-dying cousin, I should have been arrayed in snowy virgin-white, bowing my acceptances to the gay sprigs of the county gentry for stately minuet and—and—that new seraphic dance, which aunt insisted upon ignoring, the waltz.

And my swinging feet clapped together their polished sides of prunella in angry petulance of rebellion.

I jumped down from my stile and ran along by the hedgside. I had seen some half-dozen yards off the first pink-tipped bud among the hedge-rose bushes.

Alas! I was tall, but the bud, the scarlet cluster of buds, was taller, if one may so speak; an effort would be needed if I meant to attain to the gathering of their new young beauty.

An effort suited my humour. My hat—a gipsy-hat they called it—had got loose and hung round my neck. One second fixed it in its place upon my somewhat ruffled crop, and with very decided energy my fingers tied the broad white ribbon which went over its crown down beneath my chin. My arms were free, and I stretched aloft. No use stretching—not a bit of it; the tip of my longest finger was at least three inches off the lowest tip of pink bud.

To jump was the next thing, of course. Also of course, to jump, and to strain and stretch, meant that I was wantonly setting too heavy a trial upon delicate fabrics. I won the roses, but—my sandals! The dainty ribbon, which nurse was eternally renewing, burst with a little crack.

"Bother!" cried I aloud; "why cannot they invent something that won't break!"

Habits of life are all-powerful—which truism means that as the words and the tone flew out on to the soft spring air, I flushed red and hot as I always did when aunt reprimanded me for vulgarity.

Surely, I often thought, I must be innately vulgar, for I did and said so many things of which aunt's propriety disapproved.

I threw the bunch of rosebuds on to the grass, and kneeling, tried with hurried, impulsive, trembling fingers to push out of sight, within my shoe, those unhappy, helpless-looking, broken sandals.

"It was all bad—all horribly bad!" my heart was exclaiming. My heart and I were somewhat given to impulsiveness; I could easily laugh, perhaps I could easily cry; I know that some angry tears just then made my nose tickle.

I brushed my hand across my eyes, and in doing this, lifted my head.

Who was that?

From beneath the poke of my gipsy-hat I looked forth, and saw a gentleman in riding-dress upon the pathway which led across the field from the stile where I had just been sitting.

I knew everyone in the village—almost every man, woman, or child in the dozen or so of villages about us. This was a stranger.

In the moment when I made this decision he had come from the path towards me.

In those days even squires' daughters were behind the city for fashion, but I knew at once that this stranger was habited in the most correct, most courtly style. His cinnamon-coloured coat fitted like a skin, such a high-rolled collar was not to be seen in Hayleigh village—no, nor in Marling town. The multitudinous folds of his cravat, and the peep one got of the cambric of his shirt-frill, were of daintiest texture. High boots, soiled with dust, and a small-brimmed beaver hat, finished his apparelling.

He stood before me with the stock of his riding-whip held across him in his two hands.

"Are you hurt?" he asked. "You have met with some accident—your cry made me turn round. I did not see you until then."

Of course not, I was half in the hedge. However, that was not what I said. My tongue was sufficiently polite to say:

"Oh no. I am obliged. I am not hurt; it's only this horrid sandal broken."

"A small damage that; but—are you sure? I thought——"

I coloured fiery red. What business had he to think I was crying? My rude answer will show the sort of hot-headed being I was.

"You thought I was crying!" I burst out. "I was not doing anything of the kind. As if I should cry for such nonsense."

He shamed me utterly, for he never even smiled at my babyish outburst, and I rose and stood abashed before him. For a second or so no words were said. I think he was surprised to see me rise into so tall a measure of womanliness, when kneeling I had made so paltry and childish a show of temper.

However, as I learnt more surely afterwards, the stranger was a true gentleman, and his next words set me at my ease, for they entirely ignored me and my behaviour.

"I have lost my way," he began. "No; that is scarcely the exact truth, for I feel sure I am going in the right direction, though I may be at some distance yet from my destination. My horse fell lame at Bardene—Bardene was the first village out of Marling town, and six miles from us—and instead of going back to hire another, I am walking. Am I now far from Hayleigh—from Hayleigh Rectory?"

"No, not if you go the right way," laughed I. "You will be more than half an hour if you go as you were going, but the shortest way is down the lane and across the alder meadow and the spinney. Beyond that there is one field, and if you go out of it by the white gate there is Hayleigh Cross just exactly opposite you."

"Hayleigh Cross—does that mean also Hayleigh Rectory? I am an outside barbarian, remember."

"Very much a barbarian, I should say!" and again I laughed. "It does mean very much the same, seeing the cross is in the middle of the road and the church and the rectory face it."

His eyes were answering my laugh. It was very odd, but we seemed not at all strangers by this time. We were turning towards the stile, I to lead, he to be led.

"My roses!" I suddenly exclaimed.

The stranger looked enquiringly at me.

"Yes! Rosebuds, at least. The first, too! I cannot lose them. I suppose I let them fall when—when—"

"When the sun got into your eyes—when you had to push his beams out of them; when—when—you looked up and we had to be polite to each other?"

"Just so," I ran away, calling out: "If you are polite enough to wait while I find my rosebuds, I will show you the way. I am going home."

Then I went back to where I had stood but those few moments before, peering down into the long-growing grasses for my cluster of rosebuds. Looking for them, my mind was full of them, and the stranger fell out of my thoughts.

"Here they are!" said a voice at my elbow, and, turning, I saw them in the stranger's hands, he just in the act of rising from picking them up. "Now you will show me the way?" he asked.

We went on, over the stile and along the lane, together, he playing with my rosebuds and talking, I somehow not daring to ask him for them. It seemed childish to attach any importance to such slight things, for, as we talked, some odd chance led this new friend of mine to talk of rather grave things. He was not an old man—nay, he was young; but a man of, say, twenty-five seems to be in age far away from a girl who is on that very day but sixteen.

In my mind I remember quite well all the things he said, but I do not care to write them down—to remember is enough. I know that the low gables of The Chase (my home) were in sight; I know that the turn of the lane had been passed at which one came in sight of the gates with our "greyhound pursuivant" on each high supporting-post, and that still I walked along empty-handed, while he (the stranger) held my poor bunch of fading buds.

Perhaps we had ended one bend of our talk—somewhat carelessly he said:

"These are no good now, are they? Do you want them?"

I believe he had been leading me into gravity, now with inborn wilfulness I threw this gay, defiant sort of speech at him.

"Certainly not," I cried. "Do you think I want them now that you have twisted them out of all shape? Look! they are as limp as—"

"Limp? Just so, we'll throw them away."

"No, you won't," I retorted. "Roses are roses, and these are the first. You were moralising just now about we country-folks being less superficial than city-folks, you think we are perforce 'naturally elevated into habits of more sincerity.'" I was quoting himself. "I liked my roses ten minutes ago, and I like them now. Give them to me, will you?" I was laughing, but yet at the same time I felt myself grow tall and even stately as I took upon myself to utter this wish like a command.

"Suppose I say 'no'? Will you weep an intensity of woe? Will you dash the sunbeams again out of your eyes?"

This last came with a look of laughter in what I had thought very grave brown eyes, with a sudden stop in his leisurely, summer-evening tread.

"Not exactly," said I proudly. "Do you wish to see that folly over again?"

"No, no; and yet, yes. Rainy sunshine is beautiful—more beautiful than a torrid glare."

"I do not understand," I interrupted, not quite truthfully. "Please to understand that I am not given to crying for rubbish like that!"

"Methinks," he answered after a moment, musingly, "it is for rubbish that tears lightly come. So at least I have heard. Women bear great woes and have no tears for them."

"Was that to me? or spoken over my youthful head?" I answered glibly, being so young and so wishful to vaunt my growth out of that youth. "I believe that quite certainly," I declared; "I am sure I—women—do hide great sorrows."

He looked quietly at me.

"What do you know? What can—"

"I know a great deal," I cried with babyish impetuosity. "I have to bear a great deal; there's aunt every day, and to-day worse than ever, and—and—everything just horrid to-day! If I cried from morning till night it would make no difference!"

And I trod firmly on some steps in advance of him.

"What is wrong?" said he.

"Nothing."

But still, before we parted and I went by myself up the curving drive of The Chase, I had actually made this stranger aware of the great fact of my being sixteen that day, and of the accompanying great fact of the ball which was to have been, and which was not.

The drive up to my home was long. Under the soft evening, I, well-ruled Clare Hayman, took surely into my mind the consciousness that I had overstepped aunt's laws of maidenly propriety.

However, concealment was not in my nature, and if this guiding of a stranger was a peccadillo, I could not alter what was over and done. I told aunt at once, and had my reprimand well over before my father came home.

He was driving post, and would be at The Chase by midnight.

CHAPTER II.

I DID not see my father that night—was it to be expected that aunt would allow me to be out of bed at midnight?

I never could understand how he and she should be so unmistakably alike in outward appearance, and yet so utterly dissimilar. On the following morning the file of servants had to break rank for me to enter the dining-room. Aunt's face, as she stood with folded hands, tall and precise, at the head of the breakfast-table, expressed lofty disapproval of me and my tardiness; my father stood also, like her, tall, lean, grey-headed, quite as erect, quite as stately, but carrying that in his dear old face which prompted me to nod a "good-morning" to him as I skimmed past the maids and men, and took my seat.

Prayers were over, and father and I began a race with the same object. I slipped one hand within his arm, and began:

"Have you heard the adventure? I want to know—tell me who—"

"Clare, my daughter," his kind tones running alongside of my hurry, "there is to be a court-martial, I am to be judge. What possessed you, my dear?"

"Possessed me!" repeated I; "that is just it, father. I know everything there is to say, aunt said it last night."

Aunt put on her spectacles and looked at me with those encrusted white bunchy curls of hers flanking the gold-rimmed glasses. The look spoke volumes, no need for words. Mine was a barely perceptible pause. I went on:

"I confess everything, I confessed everything last night; but—what else could I do? If some creature asks another creature the way, is it polite to turn dumb? Father, you would have done the same yourself. I should have been a heathen not to show him the way!" And herewith I drew up my father's chair to his special corner of the table.

"That's true, child. But," he cleared his throat, "young ladies must not—"

"Miles, you have brought it on yourself. You would keep her at home instead of sending her to school. Look at Lady Basset's daughters! are they like Clare? Girls are certain to be ruined if they ride across country like their fathers and brothers—now you see! A pretty story to be told at the rectory!"

"Well, I shall see the rector this morning, and I shall hear," answered he, doing his best to pacify aunt. "The doctor cannot keep a secret, and I shall hear all about his visitor. He was not expected, I know, for Barlowe only on Tuesday laughed with me over the scarcity of news and doings."

A letter was a letter in those days, and newspapers were small and few.

"That is certainly Dr. Barlowe's own fault then," Aunt Clare incisively put in, "for there might be an unlimited number of franks at his disposal if he chose. His own brother and his wife's brother both members, and yet 'no news!' Give me Dr. Barlowe's opportunities!"

Aunt majestically swayed her head, and the tea by this time having been "drawing" for the number of minutes she specified as requisite, she lifted the teapot and began her morning's duty. A glance from her keen eyes into mine, and a moving of her glance from me to my plate at the side of the table, conveyed her command that I was to begin breakfast.

"Did you see Miles, father?" I asked presently. Miles was my only brother, and was in London, at Charterhouse.

"Yes, I made a point of it, and went to a City inn so that he might run in to me. He breakfasted with me yesterday morning. Really the lad is a fine lad—more like his mother than thou art, Clare, but with the Hayman strength too. We'll hope so, we'll hope so."

"H'm—ha!" jerked aunt, swallowing nearly the whole of a cup of tea at once. "Clare at school, and Miles getting strength in the air of his own fields, might have been a better ordering than—"

"Tush, tush, Clare!" said my father testily. "I'll have no boy of mine tied to a woman's apron-strings. I was at Charterhouse, and my father was there before me—Miles has cut his name in the bench below his grandfather's and mine. The lad's doing well!—well!"

"I am glad to hear it—very glad. I wish I could be as confident about his sister. I am thankful now that the ball had to be put off. I should be ashamed to have the county go away from The Chase with the idea that any Mistress Hayman could be a hoyden!"

"Come, come; my little girl is no hoyden; at least, if she is so, a 'hoyden' may be a very good thing. Clare, my maid, put on thy muffle and come round the croft with me; the May wind is tricky." He went towards the door, but spoke to aunt as he turned the shining brass handle. "Have a cover laid, in case I bring Barlowe back with me. I suppose the larder will stand a visitor?" His eyes twinkled, and he ran his fingers up through his shining, thick, white hair.

"Visitors will always find Squire Hayman's table in fit order; his sister is not superficial in her ruling of his house." This lofty-mannered answer was decorously and imposingly uttered by Aunt Clare, as she gave herself her customary final half-cup of tea. "Go with your father, Clare. I wish no politeness which is not voluntary."

It was not convenient to either father or me to hear this grandiose humility, and we left aunt to herself.

Dr. Barlowe and my father were busy with magisterial duties that day at Harling. I had my hours and half-hours of study—liking this by no means half-heartedly, for I think it was in my nature to love anything which led to a grasp of the world's doings. I was like Aunt Clare in that. I wonder whether she had been like me in her girlhood?

She bade me walk with her into the village, for it was her visiting day. She never visited the cottages at haphazard times, but had a rule for that, as she had for most other things. This part of my day was, I am afraid, not so pleasant to me as the part wherein I was free amongst my books, for I liked to talk to the village wives, and could scarcely make an interest when I only stood by and heard them talked to.

But all this was over by four o'clock, and aunt and I went home to dress and be ready for my father when he should come home. Dinner was always at five o'clock. Aunt kept her brother's house up to all points of propriety and etiquette, and to dine at five was then the mode. So she and I sat, in the chintz parlour, with a fire in the grate and the window open, for all the summer sunshine and May warmth to come in to us.

Aunt worked at her frame assiduously; I, with my gay embroidery, did not get on so fast. One cannot work much when the summer is so gay and young. I am afraid I looked out over the garden and as far down the long avenue of elms as I could. Father might come in that way—the front way, or else, if he brought Dr. Barlowe home, he would come in at another gate.

The clock struck five.

Aunt pushed aside her work, and folding her mittened hands, waited. No one should wait for her.

Waiting was not the question, for there came immediately the sound of my father's genial, hospitable voice, and the quick passing of certainly more than one pair of feet over the stone hall.

The door opened, and Dr. Barlowe, short, stout, rather rubicund, came in, with his easy, not to say shambling gait.

"This young ignoramus is for apologising for our riding-dress, madam," said he; "but the town does not know the ways of the country—eh? Magistrates who toil for their country's good are allowed to ignore the fantasies of the toilet. But I must introduce this Signor Punctilio. He goes by the name of Peter Farre, my sister's son. Nephew, be acquainted with these ladies, Mistress Hayman and her niece."

Aunt made a severe curtsy; I made my best, which "best" was, I fear, far from good. I was, in truth, a bit discomfited, for this stranger was my stranger. An instinctive horror possessed me at the idea of Sir Peter Farre's son looking upon me as a "hoyden."

However, the next fact brought me back to self-possession, for—he had gravely gone through the same ceremony with aunt—I found the tips of my fingers lightly held by the new visitor, while his closely-curling brown head was bowed low over the linked hands. For a second I felt the sweep of a soft moustache over my fingertips, then, as I drew back with coy propriety, he too drawing back with a courtly deference, our eyes met.

Neither laughed. I think, nevertheless, a laugh was singing about our hearts.

How lightly, how easily, did this new comer rule the situation.

"Madam," said he, speaking through aunt to me, "fortune is indeed kind to me to-day. I not only make new friends, but I am able to acknowledge a debt I incurred last night. Your niece rendered me a most kindly service—you will have heard?"

"I did hear—yes. We are fortunate in my niece's forwardness having met with so gallant a construction as you honour her by putting upon it." Aunt's stateliness was gracious.

Never did I so worship Baines before. Baines was butler. He opened the door at this most opportune moment.

"Uncle," said Mr. Farre, "I shall ignore your cloth in our relationship, and claim the stranger guest's privilege. May I lead you to dinner, madam?" With the studied courtesy of those days he again bowed before aunt.

The rector and I followed.

"A sad dog, Miss Clare—a sad dog, this nephew of mine. Too much of a courtier for us village folks—eh?"

"Aunt would not agree with you, Dr. Barlowe," answered I.

"Ah, we must talk; we old men must talk. What else are we good for except we look on and talk?"

It was Dr. Barlowe's way to make a show of shallowness.

"Suppose you were to be taken at your word, and allowed to do nothing but talk," I ran on heedlessly, "how would you like it?"

"Vastly well—vastly well, young madam. Eh, squire, what say you? It's time we old ones took our ease and let the young ones work. The stupidity, the arrant knavery of those yokels to-day wasting three hours over their litigious madness, and then, after all, going in for some stuff they call arbitration! I, like a man who'll fight out his cause like a man! I'll give it up. Let them get new blood on the bench, something fit to comprehend these new notions. A British farmer arbitrate when it's a question of trespass!—arbitrate, indeed!"

Then some hot soup came temptingly under the good doctor's nose, and he subsided. In consequence, other subjects came forward, and aunt and I—yes, even I, though I was but what aunt was pleased to call a "chit"—found ourselves not only listening but making remarks upon such matters as came to interest us. Yes, I am sure I had quite as much to say as she had.

(To be continued.)

The Editor's Note Book.

AMONG the other bad fashions—and there are a good many of them—which have grown up in Parliament of late years is that of framing a policy to accord with, or to take the sting from, some telling epigram. Thus when Sir Wilfrid Lawson said that the Government policy in the Soudan ought to be "rescue and retire," Mr. Gladstone jumped at it with eagerness, and declared that that was what he had meant all along. Now Mr. Labouchere, with equal brilliancy, flouts the Government with the assertion that what the Government means is to "ravage and remain."

It is to be hoped that the sensitiveness of the Premier's mind will not, in deprecation of this epigram, again dissolve any coherent plan which the collective wisdom of the Cabinet may be slowly crystallising. Governments, and, for the matter of that, Oppositions, which have intelligible policies and decided views about carrying them into effect, need not trouble themselves about epigrams even as electioneering weapons.

WHATEVER may be thought of the desirability of keeping open the road from Suakin to Berber, or of marching a force for the relief of Khartoum, it is more than probable that the climate will very soon relieve the Government from the necessity of coming to a definite decision on the subject. Campaigning in the deserts of the Soudan during the summer is out of the question, and it is even doubtful whether it would be possible to keep European soldiers, except for a very brief space of time, in Suakin itself.

THE House of Lords, by a majority of six in a thin house, has decided that the Wellington statue is not to be re-erected in the neighbourhood of Hyde Park Corner, and, as at present decided, that thing of beauty is to be a joy for ever to the soldiers at Aldershot. Why the Dukes of Buccleuch and Rutland should be supposed to take any special interest in the matter I do not know, but Lord Dorchester, in the course of the discussion, expressed himself as being extremely anxious that this important matter should not be settled in the absence of those noble lords.

THE authorities in America appear to have just discovered, what has been well known to the rest of the world for a long time, that a vast quantity of abominable stuff, purporting to be butter and cheese, is produced by the ingenuity of manufacturers in the States. Americans were very angry some little time ago because the importation of certain forms of pig meat was prohibited in Germany, but recent revelations as to the conduct of the American provision trade show clearly that the Government of the Emperor knew very well what it was about.

AN occasional correspondent, writing to the Times, gives a description of the foreign cattle market at Deptford, which will be read with interest by housekeepers, though I do not think that many of them will agree with the writer when he says, "As to the effect that the closing of Deptford would bring about in the price of meat, I doubt if the opinion of a farmer could be implicitly relied upon. I should prefer to take the opinion of a London butcher." Possibly nobody would be inclined to rely implicitly upon the opinion of the representative of any one of the interests concerned, but, bearing in mind the extraordinary difference in the prices at which the farmer sells to the butcher and the butcher to the public, the butcher's evidence would, undoubtedly, be received with considerable suspicion.

LORD SHAFTESBURY has taken up the question of over-pressure in elementary schools, and there can be no reasonable doubt, if only from the sort of apology which his lordship found it necessary to make for Mr. Mundella, that the remarks which I made a week or two ago in regard to that Right Honourable gentleman's attitude in the matter were by no means too strong.

LORD SHAFTESBURY'S speech was backed up by the direct evidence of people of experience such as Dr. Forbes Winslow; Mr. C. J. Dawson, the President of the National Union of Elementary Teachers; Sir E. H. Currie and Miss Muller now, and Mrs. Surr, late, of the London School Board. It is impossible to doubt that a case has been made out which calls for a much more serious answer than can be contained in the usual glib official commonplaces, or irrelevant references to "the Registrar's reports of the last fifteen years."

MR. LAWES has applied to the Court of Bankruptcy to relieve him, so far as it may be done under the new Act, of the liabilities he has incurred in the course of his extensive experiences of the Law Courts, but threatens, through Messrs. Lewis and Lewis, to continue the conflict to its last stage.

AS matters stand now Mr. Belt will get neither damages or costs, and is probably reflecting on the injustice of a system which allows a man to be dragged from court to court by an impecunious opponent, and then to have the pleasure of paying the whole of his costs out of his own pocket. Surely it would not be a very great hardship if appellants were required to give security for costs.

FROM the point of view of "artistic merit," Mr. Lawes's tactics may be perfectly correct. Looked at in any other light they seem to leave a good deal to be desired.

IT is stated in the Times that the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill is not to be proceeded with this session, but that it is intended to submit a resolution "affirming the principles of the Bill." Such a course seems to be absurd, as well as a cruel waste of time. The principles of the Bill have been affirmed over and over again, and, if the question is to come before Parliament at all, it ought to be brought in as a matter of business, and not as an abstract resolution which will certainly be carried, and will, as certainly, have no effect upon the position of the matter one way or the other.

THE principal objection to Mr. Warton's proposed Patent Medicine Bill was that it tarred with the same brush good and bad alike. No doubt a number of patent medicines are simply rubbish, while a few are even deleterious; but many are distinctly useful and beneficial, and are not unfrequently prescribed by medical men. Nor does it seem reasonable to ask that a medicine which contains perhaps an infinitesimal and harmless amount of poison, should be labelled as poisonous, and so be practically put out of the market.

MORE to the purpose is the complaint that ignorant people are apt to look upon the Government stamp, not merely as a tax, but as an absolute State guarantee of the virtues of the medicine which it accompanies. It is of course impossible altogether to provide against the stupidity of some people, but it might be well to add to the stamp something equivalent to the French Sans garantie du Gouvernement.

THE Postmaster General tells us that intemperance and betting are responsible for almost everything that goes wrong with the Post Office staff, and that these two evils are absolutely the cause of the cases of breach of discipline which lead either to dismissal or prosecution. Mr. Fawcett says that in making this statement he does not exaggerate, but it is obvious that he does. Intemperance and betting are no doubt fruitful sources of ruin and misery, but there are a good many other easy roads by which weak human nature can travel to perdition, and I for one do not think that the millennium might be confidently expected even if racing of all sorts were to be abolished to-morrow, and we were all to take to drinking lemonade the day after.

BESIDES, what about the very large number of young women who are now employed by the Post Office? Do none of them ever commit breaches of discipline which lead to dismissal? And if they do, are we to assume that the culprits have been guilty of drinking and gambling, both vices which are not common among young women?

IN this connection, note may be made of a couple of sentences in an excellent leading article in the Times of March 27th on the drink question. The writer said: "The crimes ascribed to drink are frequently due to the badness of the drink. The fluids retailed to the poor are in too many cases concoctions which madden the brain and ruin the digestion, even when taken in quantities which would be perfectly harmless were the liquor genuine." It is a great pity that Sir Wilfrid Lawson and his friends will not recognise this simple truth. More real practical good would be done by the passing of a well-considered and stringent Adulteration Act than by the declamation of any number of teetotalers, Blue Ribbons and all.

A NUMBER of the old wooden houses in Wych Street, Strand, have been pulled down during the last week or so, and it is stated that mercantile offices are to be erected on the site thus cleared. This simply means that more compensation will have to be paid when the long-required improvement is made which will sweep away all the buildings between the north side of Wych Street and the south side of the Strand, and the longer the business is postponed the worse it will be for the ratepayers.

THAT Coroners' juries do not always pay strict attention to the laws of evidence in framing their verdicts is notorious, and a Wandsworth jury last week afforded as good an illustration of this truth as has been given for some time. A man was seen to shoot himself on Clapham Common, and, as he was not identified, it was impossible for anybody to tell the Coroner's jury anything about his antecedents, his circumstances, or the state of his mind. Nevertheless, the jury, arguing, it may be supposed, from first principles, found that the unfortunate suicide had put an end to his life "whilst temporarily insane."

C. D.

Careless Work.

IF the writer lays down his pen or pencil in a different place every time, and inadvertently covers it with a sheet of paper, or puts it mechanically where it may not be seen, he may suffer ten times more in the composition of a single letter than if for the three or four seconds necessary he put his whole mind in laying that pen in one particular place. He will reach for it just when he desires to chain a new thought to the paper. He does not find it. He is annoyed, impatient, fretful. He searches for it, trying, meanwhile, to keep the coveted newly-born expression in mind. He finds the missing article at last; but his calmness, so necessary for the freest flow of thought, has gone, and the thread of his idea is broken. The work may be imperfect and marred in consequence. He has lost a certain portion both of time and strength. There may be in the course of the day a great deal so lost from the habit of despising this particular moment of small things, and the result foots up a formidable column. There is reason to believe that loss ensues from the doing of any act mechanically, no matter how trivial. Perhaps any so-called trivial deed should have the full force of mind brought to bear upon it. It may even be worth one's while to put the whole mind, though but for an almost unappreciable length of time, on the placing of a tool in its proper place. This done, and in a short time the mental habit regulates itself into a certainty. As in one thing so in all. The profit, besides, lies in the fact that where mental force is so concentrated, the effort ceases to become irksome. A sense of pleasure comes from the exercise of any act done with precision, accuracy, and minute attention to detail. One may realise pleasure in the proper formation of the letters in the handwriting. The scrawl is an irksome task to the scrawler and the reader of the scrawl. The letter dashed off in such haste and impatience that it is deciphered with doubt and difficulty, brought pain to the writer in the act, and it brings unnecessary pain, fatigue, and loss of time to its reader. Does it not profit to act up to the old adage, "Whatever is worth doing at all, is worth doing well?"

The Family Doctor

REST.

ONE of Nature's most potent remedial agencies is rest. It is a matter of universal experience that a certain amount of rest is necessary—as necessary as food—to ensure a healthy state of mind or body. But in disease, rest must be often specially provided for, in order to preserve the strength of the individual, and so give nature an opportunity of restoring the lost balance. We shall first consider the subject as it applies to our ordinary life, and then pass on to its application in cases of actual disease.

A WORD on sleep. No definite rules can be laid down as to the number of hours of sleep requisite for health. This depends on the individual's age, constitution, and occupation. We all know the rough old adage, "Six hours sleep for a man, seven for a woman, and eight for a fool." But, as a matter of fact, those whose brains are in active exercise, whose nervous systems are delicate and excitable, need as much sleep as they can possibly get, and in these cases, the deferring of this possibility often involves such grave issues, as peace or perturbation, good or bad work, even sanity or insanity. In reading the lives of distinguished people, one is constantly struck with their power of sleep. Not that they invariably sleep long, but they are in such perfect poise, that sleep comes when and where it is required. When they can do nothing else they can sleep. Probably with high-strung temperaments, it is often this happy adjustment which saves them from nervous exhaustion and confirmed invalidism.

EVERYBODY must discover for himself whether or not supper suits him, and if so, what supper is most wholesome for his constitution. As a general rule, this meal should be simple and light. But what suits some, is decidedly objectionable to others. For instance, after coffee, some people cannot sleep a wink; on others it has no effect; on others, again, an absolutely opposite one. Let each observe his own feelings in the matter, and be guided by what he finds wholesome for himself, rather than by mere fashion or fancy. These details require forethought and self-denial. It may often seem easier to get a prescription and take medicine than to attend to these homely precautions. But prevention must ever remain preferable to cure.

MENTAL work up to the very last moment before going to bed is not good. It may banish sleep, or at least disturb it. Before retiring, a short interval may be advantageously spent in reading of a soothing and cheering influence, but which demands no intellectual strain. Pleasant ideas should be brought forward and dwelt upon. If it is good "to sleep upon" our troubles and determinations, then we must not spoil our sleep by turning them over.

A SLEEPING apartment should be not only airy, but quiet. While light should not be excluded, the room should still be shady.

IN the morning, we should rise the moment we wake. Happy indeed are those whose early training and wholesome habits enable them to wake when they should rise, and so spare themselves and others the irritation of "knocking up." We may notice that young children always wake betimes, and the terrible sluggishness which seems so common in later life, is often due to the self-indulgence of mothers and nurses, who think to spare themselves trouble by leaving the little ones a while longer in the safe confinement of bed.

To half-awaken, and then allow oneself to doze off again, with a conviction of sin in one's very dreams, is about the worst beginning of a day's work that could be invented. It wastes all the benefit that might have been derived from a good night's rest. It is enervating and demoralising. He who lies on after he has once been awakened, nearly always finally "gets out of bed on the wrong side." He has no time for sufficient bathing; he snatches a hasty breakfast; he hurries off to catch the next train after the one which he should have caught; he is cross with everybody and everybody is cross with him; his bedroom either has to lie in disorder, confusing the domestic decencies of the whole household, or else it is hastily made up without due airing or cleansing, and he has certainly done his utmost to secure for himself, and everybody else, as much discomfort as possible for the whole day.

AN afternoon nap or siesta appears to be beneficial to many, and almost necessary to some. It need not waste much time, and indeed no time can be wasted by anything which helps to secure calmness of nerve and evenness of temper. Yet too many middle-aged women, at that period of life when their position at the head of a family numbers them among those "whose work is never done," shrink from this relief and battle strongly against nature's inclination towards it, as if it signified laziness, or perhaps what they may dread more, the suspicion of the advance of age and infirmity. And yet some of those who think they economise time by this mistaken defiance of nature's hints, seem to imagine that they utilise it by sitting, half-awake, through weary "calls," or inane "afternoon-teas."

It is a somewhat debated question whether it is good to sleep soon after a full meal. Animals certainly do so; but man is an animal plus something more. In many cases, sleeping seems to retard digestion, so that the wakening is accompanied by a disagreeable taste in the mouth and a slight headache. Light reading, or very slight handicraft, seems to give fairly satisfactory after-meal rest. At many hydropathic establishments a twenty-minutes' rest is enjoined after dinner, during which time both books and work are prohibited, and the visitors are thrown upon their conversational resources. A few minutes' rest before meals is beneficial. This puts the mental faculties into quiescence, and gives the digestive organs fair play.

ONE day in seven should be set aside as "a day of rest." This should mean neither a day of idleness nor a day of gloom, but a day of absolute cessation from the toil, and care, and labour of the preceding six days. Of course, the rule, "On the seventh day thou shalt rest," has no value for those who have not obeyed the command, "Six days shalt thou labour." In relaxing some of the Sabbath restrictions of the past, great care must be taken that more actual labour is not thrown upon some classes, and those the most helpless, for the sake of the enjoyment of others. It is possible, too, that some of the Sabbath observances of the past were rather allowed to settle down on a wrong foundation, than were really wrong in themselves. There is nothing meritorious in eating cold dinner on Sunday, but it may be an act of true charity to give one's cook a respite from her daily toil. One may smile at an old-fashioned Scotch peasant's arrangements for blacking the family's boots and fetching in the family's water on Saturday evening, but it gave the household the dignity of one day of calm and perfect leisure, and was a periodic cleansing of the mind from the "noughts and crosses" of corroding little cares and duties. The true Sabbath blessing is rest, with all its possibilities of worship, of family union, and of hospitality to the solitary and to strangers. Nobody who has not been forced to hard work on a Sunday can fully realise how heavily and wearily the following week passes, compared with that following a bright and restful Sunday.

If for a moment we take a glance at rest as a curative agent, we shall see how fully we are indebted to it in our treatment of disease.

If a leg be broken, it must be fixed as immovably as possible in splints, and kept at "rest." Nature will then unite the two ends of the bone. If the injured limb is not allowed this rest, it will become useless: the bone will not unite. The same principle runs through all disease, though it is not always so manifest to the senses. In some diseases of the joints weeks and months of "rest" have to be given to the infirm member, to give Nature time to repair herself. It is often very difficult to persuade the sufferer and the sufferer's friends, that such rest is the only chance of cure.

DURING fevers and other exhausting diseases rest is essential. And what is more, after apparent recovery rest is still needful. After typhoid-fever, the digestive organs must have prolonged rest. After scarlet-fever, the skin must not be hastily expected to perform its functions in varying atmospheres.

AND how much could be said of "brain rest!" It is a mistake to suppose that it is only "brain-workers" who suffer from exhaustion of nerve-force, and who require relaxation of the mental faculties. The brains of such people are often somewhat like the limbs of athletes—they can do easily what would damage others, though, of course, they require to know their own individual limitations, and not to be too proud and persistent in their strength. Everybody who thinks, or feels, and is liable to be worried, will suffer more or less from brain and nerve exhaustion. But, of course, it is in those who, like authors, poets, and musicians, must give out in tangible form the product of their thoughts and the result of their emotions, that brain-exhaustion is most keenly felt. A sore foot may be endured by a person at ease, but what if he is on the march? And the class of people we have named are on the intellectual march, and at times have to perform forced marches.

IN all cases of brain exhaustion, change of scene gives the greatest rest. We have heard a sufferer crave "to be sent to some place which I never saw before." Where the danger is only imminent, or at least not far advanced, it is wonderful how readily the brain takes rest and refreshment. We have seen a single day's outing, in quiet rural scenery or by the seaside, work what seemed like a miracle. A visit to a theatre, one being selected where there is not overcrowding or excitement, and where the play is of a natural and gently humorous character, will do wonders. Cheerful and firm companionship is indispensable in such cases. Causes of annoyance and irritation should be avoided, because irritability is an unfailing accompaniment of such cases, and, though in the sweeter-dispositioned this seldom shows itself by aggression, it is unfortunately only too eager to take umbrage and offence from incidents or words which would have passed unheeded at other times, or have been resolved from discords into accords. Those having the care of such sufferers would do well to look carefully round to see whether their condition is aggravated by the presence of any injudicious or ill-natured person.

ATTENTION to these matters and avoidance of over-work are the means which lead to cure. It is often said that over-work cannot be avoided. Is it not truer economy and wisdom rather to reduce the family expenditure than to deprive it speedily of its bread-winner? Let what would have to be done then in grief and misery, begin at once in hope and determination. Besides, even when work cannot be minimised, much which is not work, but which leads to the "overworked condition," may be put away altogether. Troublesome callers, interrupting chains of thought, and chasing away time, afterwards to be overtaken by a deadly race, may be set aside altogether. Entertainments, involving elaborate toilets, and strained efforts at conventional politeness, may be abandoned. Sundry responsibilities may be laid down; for nobody should be asked to do himself a permanent injury that others may not suffer a temporary discomfort or hardship. Something may even be done by abandoning the favourite chess, or the "strict game" of whist, and replacing them by a romp with the children. Resort during leisure to some handicraft which has been already perfectly mastered, is often a great boon. More than one woman of genius has acknowledged her obligations to "white seam."

BUT woe! woe! if help is sought from stimulants and narcotics. The delusive rest they give at first is soon followed by a condition in which no rest can be obtained except by semi-poisonous doses of the same deadly comforters.

LASTLY, we must give a few remarks on a rather large class of cases, well-known to all physicians, who are vainly seeking rest and finding none, because they never do honest work to earn it. To them the

Something accomplished, something done,
Which earns a night's repose, remains an unproved fact. Like "Lady Clara Vere de Vere," they are ever "sickening of a vague disease," whose plain name is "idleness." Every doctor can bear testimony that there is no class more intractable. He may even frankly tell such a patient that "she would be all right if she were a cottar's daughter," but she will not take the hint. Each day makes such cases more hopeless, for the powers of mind and body, which, if exerted, would save them, daily grow weaker and more difficult to rouse. Such people dabble dangerously in amateur philanthropic work, in anything which will excite their feelings and while away their time without claiming them in a straightforward, simple way of duty. Mere bodily exercise undoubtedly benefits them—a great French doctor cured many such by making them polish the floors—and lawn-tennis, etc., is now constantly recommended. But the root of the evil is not reached by such treatment, and it will soon crop up again. What is really needed is firm household discipline, which will insist that rest is earned, not by weariness merely after one's own pleasure, but by honest work which benefits the whole home-circle, and lightens the toil of others by relieving them from over-work. For it must ever remain true, even in this present life, that it is only the weary—weary through hard work and brave struggle with ignorance, folly, and sin—who can enter into "rest."

Born to Bad Luck.

THE Windsor Journal gives the following history of an unlucky Vermonter:

He was a lad of seven years of age, and, doubtless without the knowledge of his parents, packed his skates under his arm and skipped over to the pond for an hour's sport. He broke through, and drifted some distance under the ice. Before he was extinct, however, he caught hold of an alder-bush in the water, bumped himself up through the ice, and escaped a watery grave.

At sixteen he enlisted in the army, and was shot at the very first skirmish. He came home, recovered, and went back into the service. At the battle of Malvern Hill a shell from the enemy's works landed between his feet and burst, blowing off his left hip and heel, and tearing to pieces his right leg, so that it had to be amputated, besides imbedding two bullets in his left foot, which remain there to this day. When the wounded were picked up the next day, this unfortunate was left on the field for dead, but while his comrades were pitching him into the trench with hundreds of others on that bloody field, they discovered that his corpse was alive, and carried him to the hospital, where he recovered.

On his return home he entered the medical department of one of the colleges, where he graduated, and soon afterwards located as a practising physician not far from Corinth, Vermont. One day, while riding out to see a patient, his horse took fright, throwing the doctor out of the buggy, stringing him all along the road for several rods. On calling together his scattered frame, he found three fingers on his right hand broken.

Not long after, while workmen were repairing his barn, a rafter came down endwise, striking the doctor on his hat. This caused uneasiness for several days.

The last exploit was in company with a friend making a professional call. He took his pipe out of his mouth, and put it in his overcoat-pocket. Passing a house on the way, the doctor remarked:

"Guess they are burning compost here."

Half a mile more, and another house and another remark: "They seem to be burning compost here, too."

The silence of another half-mile was broken by the doctor exclaiming: "I swow, I believe they are burning compost all along the road!"

Upon which he suddenly gave a jump, landing by the roadside in two feet of snow, while what was left of him seemed to be paying strict attention to his pipe-pocket.

Teaching at Home.

ENGLISH LITERATURE. PART I.

MANY people look upon the study of English literature as a subject which can be delayed till the pupil has reached a somewhat advanced age, and has made considerable progress in what are considered to be the more important branches of education. Such persons overlook the fact, that the pupils are not always inclined to await the teacher's pleasure in this matter. As soon as a child can read to amuse himself, he generally tries to get something to read, and just as M. Jourdain discovered he had been speaking prose all his life without knowing it, so the child begins to study literature with like unconsciousness; and it often seems left to chance, whether such literature shall be good, bad, or indifferent. It is as well to recognise the fact, that a child begins his acquaintance with English literature when he first reads, or is read to, and that a good deal depends on the direction given to these earliest studies.

ENGLISH teachers have an immense advantage over those of other countries in two respects. In the first place, no other language has such admirable children's books, and in no other tongue have so many eminent men thought it worth their while to write for children. Walter Scott has written a child's history of Scotland, and Dickens a child's history of England. Charles and Mary Lamb, Nathaniel Hawthorne, Charles Kingsley, and George MacDonald, have all written charming stories for children; and two masterpieces in their respective lines, which, if not written for children, have at least been completely adopted by them, are the works of Englishmen. I refer to "Robinson Crusoe," and "Pilgrim's Progress." So great, indeed, is the popularity of that last work, that not only has it been introduced into all the main languages of Europe, but a Roman Catholic edition of it has been arranged, where giant "Pope" is omitted, and replaced by giant "Heresy."

A STILL greater advantage to the young reader is the singular purity of the best English literature; you may read through a whole volume of Scott or Dickens to a party of boys and girls, without wishing to omit a single line. Anyone who has studied French and German fiction—is familiar, for instance, with Goethe and Victor Hugo—will understand how fortunate English children are in this respect.

It seems to me a great mistake to make the study of literature a lesson; it should be part of a child's life. It should be made the means of cultivating his taste, stimulating his imagination, and enlarging his sympathies. In our very artificial state of life, there is so much that we can only know through books, that a person who has no enjoyment from reading is almost like a person deprived of one of his senses. It is so natural, under our present circumstances, for people to take pleasure in books, that I think it is generally due to mismanagement or neglect, where we find them cut off from this source of enjoyment. For instance, how many people look with something almost like disgust on anything in the shape of poetry, and yet I never knew a little child—and I have known a great many—who was not fond of nursery rhymes.

FROM these beginnings the child passes on to the familiar English ballads; "Chevy Chase," "The Babes in the Wood," and "Barbara Allen," are all favourites with children. I have known little things of four and five pass away a wet afternoon in acting "Lord Lovel," and "Lady Nancy." Coventry Patmore's selection of poetry, "The Children's Garland," is a very good one, and some of its easier contents are suitable at this age, if a selection of poetry is used. But where it is possible, I think it is better to read the pieces from volumes containing the works of single authors. For instance, one evening you can take down a volume of Cowper from the bookcase, and read "John Gilpin," and "Boadicea," and "The Loss of the Royal George." Another time it may be Scott, and you pick out "Allan-a-Dale," or "Young Lochinvar," for your little audience; or Campbell, or Gay—of the fables—or Goldsmith, supplies the entertainment. The child gets accustomed to the look of the volumes, and feels there is something for him inside them. His ear gets accustomed to following and understanding poems written in various metres, and he will not hereafter find a difficulty in reading anything, because it happens to be in verse.

A FAVOURITE book with little children, is the one first-rate nursery classic which Germany has produced; I refer, of course, to the immortal "Struwwelpeter." The English translation is very well done, in fact quite equals the original; and the broadly comic pictures and verses help to rouse the child's sense of humour, a sense which is abundantly worth cultivating, especially in girls, who are too often deficient in it.

As a rule, children enjoy poetry much more when read aloud to them; sometimes the rhythm of a piece will please them, when you feel sure they can but very partially understand the meaning. I knew a child of nine, who learnt Milton's sonnet on the massacres in Piedmont, on account of the pleasure she derived from the sound of the words, in their magnificent roll. It may be made a great pleasure to a family of children if a short time in each day is set apart for reading aloud, especially if the time chosen is towards the end of the day, when they no longer want to run about, and are most inclined to sentiment.

It is a pity to keep a child to one type of fairy tale, as it is very interesting to notice the different folk-lore of the different nations. I was not long ago amused at hearing three children of about ten or twelve discussing a book new to them, "Old Deccan Days," and comparing these Indian fairy-tales with the German ones they already knew. It was surprising how many points of resemblance they found out, though they certainly had not read Max Müller, or heard of comparative mythology. Grimm's fairy-tales are the easiest to read of any, except Dasent's "Tales from the Norse," a most charming book, but, unluckily, rather a difficult one to get. These and Hans Andersen's delightful stories give a good idea of the northern fairy tales, while Cox's "Greek Fairy Tales," and Nathaniel Hawthorne's "Wonder Book," with its sequel of "Tanglewood Tales," give the best classical stories. Hawthorne's versions of the Greek legends form one of the prettiest children's books in existence. Hard, indeed, must the child be to please who does not appreciate the "Golden Touch" and the "Chimæra." Church's "Stories from Homer," particularly those from the Odyssey, can be thoroughly enjoyed by children of six and eight years old, and Kingsley's "Heroes" is also a favourite book; and I suppose no one will forget the great Oriental story-book, the "Arabian Nights." Of course it is not proposed to read all these books straight off to the same children, but they may be gradually introduced to them, a new set of fairy-tales always making a most acceptable present for birthdays or Christmas-time.

IN choosing books for children I think it a mistake selecting chiefly stories about other children, and especially about children leading the ordinary nursery and schoolroom life. It is a subject with which the young readers are already sufficiently acquainted; such books therefore do nothing towards enlarging their ideas, and are apt to foster self-consciousness, and a feeling in the children that they play a more important part in the world than is actually the case. Besides, the most charming characteristics of childhood, innocence and simplicity, cannot be appreciated by children, who, themselves innocent and simple, have happily had no sad experience of the lack of those qualities. I remember a lady who was much struck with the pathos of Wordsworth's "We Are Seven," and read the poem to her little daughter, expecting her to share her admiration. The child listened attentively, and, when her mother came to the end, remarked of Wordsworth's heroine, "She was a very obstinate little girl."

STORIES of children in foreign countries or other times, are well worth reading; such books as Miss Martineau's "Peasant and the Prince," Miss Yonge's "Little Duke," and "Little Lucy's Wonderful Globe," Captain Marryat's "Masterman Ready," and "Children of the New Forest," all bring fresh scenes and ways of living before a child, and help to give great reality to what he learns in his history or geography lessons. "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland," and its sequel, are universal favourites, and help to brighten up the nursery conversation amazingly, affording a perfect storehouse for quotation on all possible subjects. "Dear me!" I once heard a little six-year-old exclaim, who was reading about the Wars of the Roses to her aunt, "how dreadfully fond they were of cutting off people's heads in those days!" It's just like Alice in Wonderland, where the queen went stamping about the croquet-ground, and shouting out, "Off with his head!"

It may be objected that I have recommended a frivolous style of reading, and have not paid sufficient regard to "instructive" books. But children have as strong a desire for fiction to read as they have for sweet things to eat, and in both cases we shall do better, instead of denying them the food they crave, to see that the supply they get is a wholesome one.

If you come across anything interesting to children in your own reading, anecdotes of animals, curious national customs, or instances of personal bravery, it is an excellent plan to note the passage and read it out at the first opportunity. Also, wherever there is a family of children it is well, if possible, to take in an illustrated weekly paper. The sixpence a week spent on a Graphic, or Illustrated London News is an excellent educational investment, and it is no drawback if the paper is got at a reduced rate, from reading-room or club, a week or two after publication. With events happening all over the world, children get the opportunity of seeing pictures of all sorts of places, and pick up a much better notion of geography than they get from the regular text-books. They also learn something of what is going on around them, and are enabled to take an intelligent interest in the subjects which they hear discussed among their elders. Poetry, fairy-tales, anecdotes, and a good illustrated paper, will give sufficient reading for the average child, up to about ten years of age, or till he passes into that more advanced stage where we no longer talk so much about "children," but begin to distinguish them as "boys" and "girls."

Dr. Jackson.

MANY stories, for the veracity of which, however, we do not vouch, are told of Dr. Jackson, the retiring Bishop of Chester. He has always been remarkable for his genial temper, and Bishop Wilberforce said when first he met him, that "although he had often heard of the milk of human kindness he had never before seen the cow."

Nothing has ever induced Dr. Jackson to say an unkind word of anybody, and, as the following instances will show, he has a happy way of meeting every difficulty.

A new appointment had been made to a well-known Chester church, and at a dinner-party shortly afterwards the "new man" was the subject of conversation. The bishop said not a word until directly appealed to by a lady present.

"What do you think of the new vicar, my lord?"

"I think," replied his lordship, "that he is a middle-aged man."

Another story of a similar kind took its rise when the cathedral nave was re-opened. A certain dean, whose party leanings were a little undecided just then, was one of the special preachers. After service, two dignitaries were engaged in a little friendly criticism of the sermon in the chapter-house.

Said the first: "It struck me as being rather Low."

"How curious, now," said the other, "I thought it rather High;" and appealing to the bishop, who was present: "What did you think, my lord?"

"Why," replied his lordship, with a roguish sparkle in his eye, "I considered it rather long."

It is related that Archdeacon Denison once met him in "Tom Quad," and asked him what he thought of a well-known, but ephemeral High Church journal in which the pugnacious archdeacon was supposed to have a personal interest. "I think it is about the best-printed periodical I know," was the cautious but urbane reply of the wary Regius Professor, and this, so runs the legend, was about the nearest approach to a definite opinion on matters of current controversy that he was ever known to give.

A Lion Story.

THE strength and courage of the lion is so great that, although he is seldom four feet in height, he is more than a match for fierce animals of three or four times his size, such as the buffalo. He will even attack a rhinoceros or an elephant, if provoked. He possesses such extraordinary muscular power, that he has been known to kill, and carry off in his mouth, a heifer of two years old, and after being pursued by herdsmen on horseback for five hours, it has been found that he scarcely ever allowed the body of the heifer to touch the ground during the whole distance. But here is an instance of strength in a man—a different sort of strength—which surpasses all we ever heard related of a lion:

Three officers in the East Indies—Captain Woodhouse, Lieutenant Delamain, and Lieutenant Laing—being informed that two lions had made their appearance in a jungle at some twenty miles distance from their cantonment, rode off in that direction to seek an engagement. They soon found the "lordly strangers," and killed one of the lions by their first fire, while the other retreated across the country. The officers pursued, until the lion, making an abrupt curve, returned to his jungle. They then mounted an elephant, and went in to search for him. They soon found him, standing under a bush, and looking directly towards them. He sought no conflict, but seeing them approach, he at once accepted the challenge, and sprang at the elephant's head, where he hung on. The officers fired; in the excitement of the onset their aim was defeated, and the lion was only wounded. The elephant, meanwhile, had shaken him off, and, not liking such an antagonist, refused to face him again. The lion did not follow, but stood waiting. At length the elephant was persuaded to advance once more; seeing which the lion became furious, and rushed to the contest. The elephant turned to retreat, and the lion sprang upon him from behind, grappled his flesh with teeth and claws, and again hung on. The officers again fired, while the elephant kicked with all his might; but, though the lion was dislodged he was still without mortal wound, and retired into the thicket, apparently content with what he had done in return for the assault. By this time the officers had become too excited to desist; and in the fever of the moment, as the elephant now directly refused to have anything more to do with the business, Captain Woodhouse resolved to dismount, and go on foot into the jungle. Lieutenant Delamain and Lieutenant Laing dismounted also, and all three followed in the direction the lion had taken. They presently got sight of him, and Captain Woodhouse fired, but, seemingly, without doing him serious injury, as they saw the "mighty lord of the woods" retire deeper into the thicket "with the utmost composure."

They proceeded. Lieutenant Delamain got a shot at the lion. This was not to be longer endured, and forth came the lion, dashing right through the bushes that intervened, so that he was close upon them in no time. The two lieutenants were just able to escape out of the jungle to re-load, but Captain Woodhouse could only stand quietly on one side, hoping the animal would pass him unobserved. But this was too much to expect after all he had done. The lion darted upon him, and in an instant, "as though by a stroke of lightning," the rifle was broken and knocked out of his hand, and he found himself in the grip of the irresistible enemy whom he had challenged to mortal combat. Lieutenant Delamain fired at the lion, but without killing him, and then again retreated to re-load. Meantime, Captain Woodhouse and the lion were both lying wounded on the ground, the lion crunching his arm. In this dreadful position, Captain Woodhouse had the presence of mind, and the great fortitude, in the horrible pain he was enduring, to lie perfectly still—knowing that if he made any resistance, he would be torn to pieces. Finding all motion had ceased, the lion let the arm drop from his mouth, and quietly crouched down with his paws on the thigh of his prostrate antagonist. Presently Captain Woodhouse, finding his head in a painful position, unthinkingly raised one hand to support it, whereupon the lion again seized his arm, and crunched it higher up. Once more, notwithstanding the intense agony, and yet more intense apprehension of momentary destruction, Captain Woodhouse had the strength of will and self-command to lie perfectly still. He remained thus, until his friends, discovering his situation, were hastening up, but upon the wrong side, for it was possible that their balls might pass through the lion, and hit him. Without moving, or manifesting any hasty excitement, he was heard to say in a low voice, "To the other side! To the other side!" They hurried round. Next moment the magnanimous lion lay dead by the side of a yet stronger nature than his own.

Household Gardening.

As the easiest of all methods of raising a number of plants for furnishing gardens attractively in the summer is by obtaining them from seed, and as this is the very best season for sowing, we may usefully point out a few of the most suitable annuals for different purposes of decoration. Not a few persons are prejudiced against annuals, because they are under the impression that the flowers cannot be used for vase decoration nor bouquets. Several of them are not suitable for those purposes, but others are, as we will endeavour to show in our brief selection.

ANNUALS FOR CUTTING.

Annuals, as a rule, while exceedingly pretty when seen growing in masses, are not considered valuable for affording flowers that can be cut and arranged in bouquets and vases with advantage. Of some kinds the flowers are individually small, yet so numerous as to be highly effective as seen on the plant, whereas, severed from it, they do not compel admiration; others, though large enough to show to advantage singly, soon lose their freshness when placed in a bouquet or even in a glass containing water; still there are a few, apart from the indispensable Sweet Peas and Mignonette, that are well adapted for the purpose in question.

CENTAUREAS.

These constitute a very large and varied genus of plants. The name is a classical one, applied to a plant fabled by Ovid to have cured a wound in the foot of Chiron, one of the Centaurs or wild horse breakers of Thessaly, but it is only to one of the species of these plants that our remarks will be directed, namely, to Centaurea cyanus, commonly known as the Cornflower or Bluebottle.

This plant grows about two feet high, and produces single flowers about the size of a halfpenny, the petals more or less crimped or fringed, and of a clear, lovely blue colour. So prized are they for room and table decoration, that they are grown by the acre and sold by the cartload in penny bunches during the season in the flower-markets of London and other large cities and towns, yet any one who has a plot of ground in a fairly open situation may grow a few plants of this easily grown and popular annual.

A packet of seed can be had for a few pence, and it only needs to be sown in patches or drills, as previously described, and the plants are sure to appear in two or three weeks. As soon as they can be handled they must, if close together—be thinned out so that they remain about three inches apart; they will then grow strongly and afford a supply of flowers for cutting for many weeks.

CHRYSANTHEMUM SEGETUM.

As a clear yellow companion to the above plant this is one of the best that can be grown. It is perfectly hardy, indeed a wild plant in some districts, where it is occasionally found growing in moist positions in corn-fields, hence its popular name of Corn Marigold; yet the flower is very unlike that of a Marigold, and has still less resemblance to those grand double Chrysanthemums that are so striking in the autumn.

Chrysanthemum Segetum, or the Corn Marigold, bears single, flat, and quite round flowers from one to two inches in diameter, and they have been exceedingly fashionable during the past two or three years for using in a cut state.

The plants are of the easiest possible culture, the seed only requiring to be sown in rich soil in the open garden, and the seedlings thinned out to six inches apart to grow sturdily and flower abundantly. The colour of the flower is clear spotless yellow, and they are borne on the summit of the stems that attain a height of about two feet. A packet of seed can be obtained for sixpence, and the present is the time of sowing.

TRICOLOR CHRYSANTHEMUMS.

Similar in form to the above, yet abundantly distinct and very beautiful, are a few annual garden varieties now to be noticed. The term tricolor is applied to them because the flowers of the original species has three colours, white, crimson, and yellow in concentric rings.

The varieties now offered are represented in two or three colours, and they are very rich and striking. To the great flower-seed growers, Messrs. Carters and Co., of High Holborn, the credit is due of improving these plants and raising new sorts at their flower-farms in Essex.

A trio of the newer kinds that are richly coloured is formed of W. E. Gladstone, rich crimson; Lord Beaconsfield, crimson and gold, and the Sultan, maroon and yellow; the older variety, Burridgeanum, white, crimson, and yellow, is also well worth growing. The plants grow from two to three feet high, and like rich soil and copious supplies of water in the summer. Sow the seed as soon as possible, covering it half an inch deep, and thin out the plants as above recommended.

DWARF CONVULVULUSES.

Few annuals produce flowers that are more effective than these when tastefully arranged in vases or glasses containing water; they are trumpet-shaped, two inches in diameter, and vary in colour from rosy-white to the richest violet-purple imaginable. Although the individual flowers do not last long when cut, yet others expand when the stalks are kept in water. The different varieties can be had in a mixed packet; but the sort known as Splendens is perhaps the richest, and a packet of that is well worth purchasing separately.

The plants grow a foot high, are of a slightly trailing habit, and require no sticks to support them. The seed being rather large, needs only to be sown thinly, as, if the plants are six inches apart, they will quite cover the ground; but allowance must be made for accidents, as every seed may not vegetate, while slugs will, perhaps, want a taste of some of the plants; they, however, attack these less voraciously than they do many others, which is an advantage in gardens in which these pests abound.

These seeds should be sown now, and covered an inch deep, the sowing of the beautiful Climbing Convolvulus being better deferred for three weeks unless placed in pots in a frame.

ESCHSCHOLTZIAS.

The bright, funnel-shaped flowers of this old favourite plant have been in great demand for room decoration recently, their peculiar form and bright colour rendering them conspicuous. The colour of the best known variety, Crocea, is rich orange, the newer sort, Mandarin, being of a bronzy-scarlet hue; there are also white and rose-coloured kinds, very chaste and pretty; but the brighter colours are the more popular. The seeds, being very small, must not be covered a quarter of an inch deep, and they are best sown in the open ground, where the plants are desired to flower, thinning them out to prevent overcrowding, as advised for Centaureas.

CANDYTUFTS.

Precisely similar treatment will be suitable for these, which grow and flower freely in any ordinarily fertile soil, and produce their trusses abundantly, these being admirably adapted for either bouquets or vases. The plants are of dwarf compact growth and cover themselves with lilac, purplish crimson, and white flowers, according to the sort that may be grown; the two last-named being perhaps the most effective and worthy of a place in all borders of mixed flowers.

VENUS'S LOOKING-GLASS.

This is very attractive in habit, in height about a foot, similar to the preceding, the flowers, which are yielded in profusion, being of a deep glossy blue colour, not exceeded in richness by those of any other annual. The plants are exceedingly pretty amongst others in the front of a flower border next a path or lawn. The seeds being small should be sown as advised for Eschscholtzias, and the plants thinned out, leaving them three inches apart.

PRUNING ROSES.

All roses that need pruning must be attended to at once. The long shoots have pushed fresh growths several inches in length, but below these, towards the base of the branches, will be found some dormant buds. To these the shoots may be shortened, and the sleeping buds will awake at once, push strong growths rapidly, and as these will probably escape injury by late frosts, will, in due time, produce beautiful blooms, assuming that the plants are healthy, and are well-supported with liquid manure if the soil is not rich, the Rose rejoicing in liberal fare.

Odds and Ends.

A LONG list might be made of men who have owed their advancement in life to a smart answer given at the right moment. One of Napoleon's veterans, who survived his master many years, was wont to recount with great glee how he had once picked up the Emperor's cocked hat at a review, when the latter, not noticing that he was a private, said carelessly: "Thank you, captain." "In what regiment, sire?" instantly asked the ready-witted soldier. Napoleon, perceiving his mistake, answered with a smile: "In my Guard, for I see you know how to be prompt." The newly-made officer received his commission next morning. A somewhat similar anecdote is related of Marshal Souvarof, who, when receiving a despatch from the hands of a Russian sergeant who had greatly distinguished himself on the Danube, attempted to confuse the messenger by a series of whimsical questions, but found him fully equal to the occasion: "How many fish are there in the sea?" asked Souvarof. "All that are not caught yet," was the answer. "How far is it to the moon?" "Two of your excellency's forced marches." "What would you do if you saw your men giving way in battle?" "I'd tell them that there was a wagon-load of whisky just behind the enemy's line." Baffled at all points, the marshal ended with: "What is the difference between your colonel and myself?" "My colonel cannot make me a lieutenant, but your excellency has only to say the word." "I say it now, then," answered Souvarof; "and a right good officer you'll be."

AN Irishman is often an "original" in arriving at a result. A jolly set of Irishmen, boon companions and sworn brothers, had made up their minds to wend their way to America. There were five in number—two Patricks, one Murphy, one Dennis, and one Teague. It so happened that the vessel they were to go in could only carry four of them. At length honest Teague exclaimed: "I have it. We'll cast lots to see who shall remain." But one of them declared that it was anything but genteel to do that sort of thing. "You know, Teague," he said, "that I am an arithmetician, and I can work it out by subtraction, which is a great deal better. But you must all agree to abide by the figures." All having pledged themselves to do so, Pat proceeded: "Well, then, Pat from Pat you can't, that's very certain. But take Dennis from Murphy is easy enough, and you will find that Teague remains. Teague, my jewel, and it's you that'll have to stay behind." Poor Teague was therefore bound to acquiesce in this remarkably novel decision.

FRIDAY is regarded by a great many people as unlucky. But see what America has to thank this day for. Friday, Columbus sailed on his voyage of discovery. Friday, ten weeks after, he discovered America. Friday, Henry III. of England gave John Cabot his commission, which led to the discovery of North America. Friday, St. Augustine, the oldest town in the United States, was founded. Friday, the Mayflower, with the pilgrims, arrived at Plymouth; and on Friday they signed that august compact, the forerunner of the constitution. Friday, George Washington was born. Friday, Bunker Hill was seized and fortified. Friday, the surrender of Saratoga was made. Friday, Cornwallis surrendered Yorktown, and on Friday the motion was made in Congress that the united colonies were, and by right ought to be, free and independent.

MR. DUMLEY was making an evening call, and Bobby, who was allowed to sit up a little later than usual, put to him the following question: "Mr. Dumley, do you want to make five pounds in ten minutes?" "Do I want to make five pounds in ten minutes?" laughed the young man. "Certainly I do. But how can I make five pounds in ten minutes, Bobby?" "Mamma will give it to you. She told papa that she would give five pounds to see you hold your tongue for ten minutes."

DURING Her Majesty's sojourn in the vicinity of Loch Vennachar, some years ago, the Princess Louise had occasion to drive into Callender to match some velvet. She procured it at the shop of a draper in the place, but on rising to leave was annoyed to find she had not her purse with her, and, begging the draper's pardon, told him she would send him the money next day. "Dinna fash yersel, mem," said the imperturbable tradesman. "Yer mither has an account here."

A MARRIED man falling into misfortune is more apt to retrieve his situation in the world than a single one, chiefly because his spirits are soothed and relieved by domestic endearments, and self-respect kept alive by finding that, although abroad be darkness and humiliation, yet there is still a little world of love at home, of which he is monarch. Whereas a single man is apt to run to waste and self-neglect—to fall to ruins like some deserted mansions, for want of inhabitants.

DURING the Reign of Terror the mob got hold of the Abbé Maury, and resolved to hang him. "To the lamp-post with him!" was the universal cry. The abbé was in a bad fix with a mob for his judges—the tender mercies of a mob! With the utmost coolness the abbé said to those who were dragging him along: "Well, if you hang me to the lamp-post, will you see any clearer for it?" This bright sally tickled his would-be executioners and saved his life.

A SOLDIER boasted to Julius Caesar of the many wounds he had received in the face. Caesar, knowing him to be a coward, said to him: "The next time you run away, you had better take care how you look behind you."

WHEN a book raises your spirits and inspires you with noble and courageous feelings, seek no other rule to judge the book by. It is good, and made by a good workman.

A FIRM faith is the best divinity; a good life the best philosophy; a clear conscience the best law; honesty the best policy; and temperance the best physic.

PHILOSOPHY easily triumphs over the misfortunes that are past, and over those that are to come; but the trials of the present triumph over her.

WHETHER happiness may come or not, one should try and prepare one's self to do without it.

THE truest mark of being born with great qualities is being born without envy.

No man flatters the woman he truly loves.

"FATHER," said a youth of tender years and sympathetic nature, as he paused for a moment before dipping into the bread pudding which formed the dessert of his dinner yesterday, "father, I wish the cook wouldn't use the bread to make it up into puddings; why don't she crumble it up and throw it out to the poor birds?" "But," responded his more practical sire, "that would prevent you from having any bread-pudding, which you like so much." "But the poor birds," said the tender-hearted boy; "I am afraid they will starve." "Yes," returned the parent, "but if you have no pudding you may starve yourself. If you should throw away your food to the birds, and then find that you were hungry yourself, what would you do?" The boy was silent for a moment, then his face brightened, a touch of his father's practicality illumined his eye: "Why, then," he said softly, "couldn't we go out and kill the birds?"

THE most practical lover has been discovered at Bristol. In one of his letters to his sweetheart he wrote: "I wish, my darling, that you would not write me such long letters. If you were to bring an action for breach of promise against me, the lawyers would copy the correspondence between us, and charge fourpence for every folio of seventy-two words. The shorter the letters, the more we save from the lawyers." And yet he was not a lawyer.

It is recorded of a rich old farmer that in giving instructions for his will he directed a legacy of one hundred pounds to be given to his wife. Being informed that some distinction was usually made in case the widow married again, he doubled the sum, and, when told that this was quite contrary to custom, he said, with heartfelt sympathy for his possible successor: "Aye, but him as gets her'll deserve it."

"ALL this hard wood you export," the English tourist asked the Indiana lumberman, "all this maple and beech, you know, where does it go?" And the man told him that most of it went direct to Scotland, where it was worked up into boxes, and churns, and paper folders from the rafters of Burns's cottage and the home of Sir Walter Scott. And the tourist said "Haw," and wrote something in his note-book.

BARON VON S., who was addicted to the use of spirituous liquor, labelled his hunting-flask with the word "Poison" in large letters to keep off intruders. One day he detected the groom in the act of taking a vigorous pull at the said flask. "Fellow," he exclaimed, "can't you read? Don't you see that it is poison?" "Yes, but I—I—I couldn't bear the thought of outliving your honour."

"THAT poor fellow," said a temperance orator, pointing to a cripple, "owes his dilapidated condition to whisky." "You are wrong," said a bystander. "That man is paralysed, and I am certain he never drank." "Oh, that really makes no difference in my argument," rejoined the orator, "for if he had been addicted to drink he would have been paralysed sooner."

AT one of Mr. Henry George's recent lectures, that worthy had his watch snatched as he neared the door of the hall. The lecturer on progress, poverty, the rights of the people, etc., etc., was thunderstruck at the liberty taken with his property, and shouted: "Somebody has stolen my watch." "Say, rather, nationalised it," said the voice of a wag in the crowd.

"JAMES," said a national schoolmaster to his pupil, "what is an average?" "A thing, sir," answered the scholar promptly, "that liens lay eggs upon." "Why do you say that, you silly boy?" asked the pedagogue. "Because, sir," said the youth, "I heard a gentleman say the other day as a hen would lay, on an average, a hundred and twenty eggs a year."

"NEPHEW," said a farmer to a lop-sided youth, who had been quartered on him for the last six weeks, and resisted all gentle hints that his stay had been prolonged quite sufficiently, "I am afraid you'll never come to see me again." "Why, uncle, how can you say so? Don't I come to see you every winter?" "Yes, but I'm afraid you'll never go away!"

MAGISTRATE: "You assert that you each have an occupation. State them." First Vagrant: I am a renovator of secondhand toothpicks, your honour. Second Vagrant: "And I am engaged in the business of smoking glass for the observation of eclipses, which in some measure accounts for my frequent periods of prolonged leisure."

AN Irish lawyer having addressed the Court as "gentlemen" instead of "yer honours," after he had concluded, a brother of the bar reminded him of his error. He immediately rose and apologised thus: "May it please the Court, in the haste of debate I called yer honours gentlemen. I made a mistake, yer honours." The speaker then sat down.

AN old Dutch tavern-keeper, who had his third wife, thus expressed his views of matrimony: "Vell, you see, de first time I married for love; dat vas goot; then I married for beauty; dat was goot too, about as do first; dis time I married for money, and dis is petter as poth."

A FORLORN-LOOKING man said: "I've tried everything I could turn my hand to, but couldn't make anything answer; and now I have decided to go up among the hills where they say there's a wonderful echo, to see if I can make that answer."

A NOTED wag in a college, one morning read a theme of unusual merit. The president being suspicious, asked pointedly if it was original. "Why, yes, sir," was the reply. "It had 'original' over it in the paper I copied it from."

"How is the earth divided?" asked a pompous examiner, who had already worn out the patience of the class. "By earthquakes," replied one boy, after which the examiner found that he had had enough of that class.

A JEWELLER, being sent to prison, said to the turnkey: "If you let me out, I'll sell your watch for you to good advantage." "No, no," responded the turnkey; "instead of letting you sell my watch, I'll watch your cell."

ENGLISH nobleman to Highland gillie somewhat deficient in English, and whose father had been a weaver: "What occupation did your father follow, Mac?" Gillie: "My father was a spider, my lort, he was."

"Do you know a good way of curing hams?" asked a man of his neighbour. "Oh yes," was the reply; "but the trouble with me is, I have no way of procuring them."

Correspondence.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Enquiries will be attended to as quickly as possible, but, as we have to go to press several days before publication, some delay is inevitable. In no case can questions be answered "next week," as some of our friends demand.

We have received several very unreasonable complaints of delay in attending to letters, which have been addressed to us by Correspondents who have paid no regard to the instructions which are given every week in this Journal.

The Editor is therefore compelled to give notice:

1. That all letters containing postage-stamps for copies of this Journal, or on similar business, must be addressed to the PUBLISHER.
2. That all letters containing enquiries for the Correspondence Column, or on literary business, must be addressed to the EDITOR.
3. That Correspondents are urgently requested to adopt distinctive pseudonyms, and not to use such vague signatures as "A Constant Reader," etc.
4. That Correspondents wishing to write on two or more subjects—say to send in an answer to a Correspondent, and to enclose stamps for a copy of the Journal—must send each communication in a separate envelope, properly addressed as above indicated.
5. That NO ATTENTION can be paid to any Correspondents who do not observe these rules.

QUESTIONS.

ALASELEY will be glad to know where he can find a poem entitled "Archie Dean."

ALVERSTOCKE writes: "Can anyone tell me the remaining verses of the hymn which begins the first verse:

"Saviour and Lord accept the vow
I offer in Thy presence now;
With thoughtful heart and trembling fear,
My contrite spirit ventures near."

H. J. writes: "Could you tell me where the following may be found, and by whom written?

"When Fate has bid our drama stop,
And Life's last scene is o'er,
And Death has let the curtain drop,
And we can play no more:
Then who played king, and who Played peasant, will not be the test;
The only question then will be,
Who played his part the best?"

ANSWERS.

E. A. F.—We are not able to name the flower from the crushed scrap sent. A hint as to whether it is hardy or tender, dwarf or tall, might possibly have led to its identification, and then the treatment the plant needs could have been given.

HILDA C.—1. To give a list of things in season for each month in the year would occupy too much space in this column, and you can get it in almost any cookery-book. "Little Dinners," by Mary Hooper (Paul, Trench, and Co.), 2s. 6d., has menus for every month. 2. The following is Gouffé's recipe for "Epigrammes of Lamb," with Asparagus Peas. It is an excellent dish and not difficult to do. "Take two necks of lamb; saw off the breasts, and trim and cut the cutlets; remove the tendons of the two breasts; tie the latter together, and braize them in some general stock with an onion (with two cloves stuck in it), and a faggot added. When the meat is done, drain and take out all the bones; keep as many as there are cutlets, to add to the breasts when trimmed; sprinkle the meat with salt, and press it between two dishes till cold; then cut both the breasts of lamb in pieces, the size and shape of the cutlets; spread some reduced Allemande-sauce over these pieces, and bread-crumbs them; then egg and bread-crumbs them again. Cut the bones kept for that purpose, to a point at one end, and stick one in each piece of breast so as to represent a cutlet. Fry them in hot fat and drain them. Dip the neck cutlets in clarified butter; set them in a saucepan; pour on a little more clarified butter, and fry them till they are done. Dish the cutlets and the breast cutlets, alternately, round a croustade filled with asparagus peas, and serve with a boat of Béchamel-sauce." In the event of its not being convenient to follow the recipe and prepare a croustade, or fried bread-case, the cutlets can be dished with the asparagus peas in a little heap in the middle.

JOSÉ.—1. No such enquiry as that you refer to in your letter has reached us previously. An answer shall be given next week. 2. The following is a well-tried recipe for Lemon Paste, which, if stored in a cool, dry place, will keep for twelve months: A pound of finely powdered sugar, four ounces of butter, six eggs, four lemons. Put the butter into a clean bright stewpan, melt, but do not oil it, stir in the sugar, then add the strained juice of the lemons and the grated peel, and when the sugar is dissolved add the eggs, beaten for two minutes and strained. Stir the paste over a slow fire until it becomes as thick as honey, and when done put it into small jam-pots, cover down, and set aside for future use. The paste can, of course, if required, be used as soon as made.

LONDON FANCIER.—1. You cannot do better than get "Notes on Cage Birds," edited by W. T. Green, M.D., published by L. Upcott Gill. 2. It is very likely that it is the fusty seed which has disagreed with your birds. Good seed never smells musty, and is known by the pearly appearance of the husk, freedom from dust, which often induces lung complaints, weight, and sweetness when a few grains are chewed in the mouth. Maw, or white poppy, seed contains a considerable quantity of oil; is consequently fattening, and must be given sparingly; it is more suitable for winter than summer feeding. 3. We have used the following recipe for German-paste for many years, and always found it answer well: One pint of pea-meal, two ounces of maw-seed, a quarter of a pint of bruised hemp-seed, one ounce of coarse sugar, with two ounces of treacle, and two ounces of lard made hot and poured hot over the other ingredients. Mix well together, and when cold put the paste into a jar.

LONDON SPARROW.—"Gladys," to whom we are much obliged, writes that you will find the quotation in Tennyson's "Geraint and Enid" ("Idylls of the King"):

Oh, purblind race of miserable men,
How many among us at this very hour

Do forge a lifelong trouble for ourselves,
By taking true for false, or false for true!
Here, through the feeble twilight of this world,
Groping, how many, until we pass and reach
That other, where we see as we are seen.

PERPLEXED.—1. It is pronounced both "Káy-pel," accent on first syllable, and "Kép-pel," accent also on first syllable; the first pronunciation holds good in "Capel-cure" and "Capel Molyneux," which are "Káy-pel"—the second in "Capel-Curig," which is "Kép-pel Kerry." 2. Pronounced "Weston-super-Mary." 3. Pronounce it "Hugh-en-den," accent on first syllable. 4. There is practically no difference now; but originally the rector received the large tithes, and might be a layman. 5. The vicar received the small tithes, and was perforce in holy orders. 6. A perpetual curate was incumbent of a benefice without being either rector or vicar, but an Act passed some years ago made most perpetual curates vicars or rectors. 7. We are not aware that the name is pronounced so in any other case. 8. We believe the word means much the same, with perhaps a reference more especially to the higher classes.

Q IN A CORNER.—What in England is called a bun, would in Scotland be described as a cookie. From the frequent appearance of these articles at tea-parties, the latter are irreverently spoken of as "cookie shimes."

Q. Y.—No one who is acquainted with the laws of optics can entertain the question of objective vision being possible without any light at all. We say that cats, owls, and other animals see in the dark, the fact being that their organs of sight are so constructed as to allow of their discerning feebly in a very trifling amount of illumination, objects which, to human eyes, would be invisible. But let any nocturnal animal be absolutely deprived of all light whatever, and its faculty of vision is at once totally suspended. "No light, no sight," is an axiom which admits of no dispute.

R. P.—The best known type-writer is the Remington, and, great as are its merits, it is both bulky and expensive; it cannot be easily carried from place to place, and it costs twenty guineas. Messrs. Witherby, of 325A, High Holborn, may claim the credit of having introduced from America a new type-writer, which is both cheap and portable. This is known as "the Hall," and we believe that it has already attained considerable popularity in the United States. The principle of this beautiful little machine is that the letters are all arranged on a small plate, not more than two inches square, which is struck by a kind of finger, working on a complex lever. The whole machine, with its case, weighs under eight pounds, and it may be used in any position, on a desk or in a railway-carriage, and the cost is £8 8s. The speed is inferior to that of the Remington machine, but a practised hand can achieve from thirty to forty words a minute, which is a good deal faster than most people can write. The plate is fitted with capitals and small letters, stops, numerals, etc.; and the manner in which the machine is finished seems to leave nothing to be desired.

TIMID SOUL.—It may be dangerous, but it cannot be unlucky, to walk under a ladder. Probably the idea took its rise in the structures and formalities of the old gallows at Tyburn, where there was no platform, but to which the culprit ascended by a ladder, which was afterwards withdrawn. The application of what was rather a coarse joke than a superstition being lost, people still go on doing what their fathers did before them.

VÉRITÉ.—Apply to Messrs. Colnaghi, Pall Mall East.

WONDER WHY.—There was formerly some little contempt felt for a marine by a sailor, who used to say he was a "Gulpin," that is, a person who will swallow anything; hence probably the saying, "Tell that to the marines." An empty bottle was unkindly styled a marine. It is related that King William the Fourth once said at table, "Take that marine away." A marine officer who was present asked for an explanation. "Sir," replied the King, getting ingeniously out of the difficulty, "it has done its duty, and is willing to do it again."

NOTICE.

NOW READY, PRICE SIXPENCE,

PART XXXV. OF HOUSEHOLD WORDS,

Containing Serial Story, entitled "My Lord Concelt;" "A Family Feud," a Story in Five Weekly Parts; and numerous Short Stories.

The Editor's Note-Book on Current Topics. Interesting Articles on Cookery, Gardening, The Family Doctor, Fashions, Music, etc.

AND SOMETHING SUITABLE FOR EVERY MEMBER OF THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

NOTICE.

The Fifth Volume of HOUSEHOLD WORDS, containing Nos. 106 to 131, bound in cloth, uniform with Vols. 1, 2, 3, and 4, can now be had, price 4s. 6d. Also Binding Cases (including Title and Index), price 1s. 6d. Title and Index may also be obtained separately, price 1d.

All back Numbers, Parts, Quarterly Divisions and Volumes, also the Extra Numbers, are in print; and may be had by ordering from any Bookseller, Newsagent, or Railway Bookstall, or should any difficulty be found in procuring from an Agent, enclose stamps for the amount, adding price of postage, addressed to the Publisher of HOUSEHOLD WORDS, 24, Great New Street, E.C., when the copies will be sent per return.

The Publishers of HOUSEHOLD WORDS will send Copies direct, post-free, to any address in the United Kingdom or the Continent, upon receipt of P.O.O. made payable at the Fleet Street Office, to Messrs. CHARLES DICKENS & EVANS, at the following rates:

Weekly.			Monthly.
	s.	d.		s.	d.
Three Months .. ..	1	8	Three Months .. ..	2	0
Six Months .. ..	3	3	Six Months .. ..	4	0
Twelve Months .. ..	6	6	Twelve Months .. ..	8	0

New Volumes commence the first week in May and November respectively.

All applications for Advertisements to be addressed to Mr. Joseph Smith, 24, Great New Street, E.C.

FAMILIAR IN THEIR MOUTHS AS HOUSEHOLD WORDS.—Shakespeare.

HOUSEHOLD WORDS,

No. 155.]

SATURDAY, APRIL 12, 1884.

[VOL. VI.]

Drifted to Harbour.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

CHAPTER I.

A STILL, calm Sabbath evening. The placid waters of the bay touched by the red sunlight. The rugged cliffs, crowned by dark firs, sharply defined against the mellow sky. An uneven sweep of sand and shingles, where flocks of geese and wild ducks congregate. A row of fishing-boats pulled up high and dry, others lying almost motionless in the shallow water, some distance from the shore. Far beyond, on the horizon, the faint green outline of the island of Nargon.

Borne on the silent air, came the tones of a woman's voice, at first vague, now dying on the ear, now rising and swelling, until the melody of the old Lutheran hymn could be distinguished:

A tower of strength my God art thou.

The singer was at first hidden from view, as she descended the dry, stony bed, which the fury of many storms had torn in their descent to the sea. Then she emerged, sending her song before her, clothed in the soft melodious language of Estonia.

Her tall, girlish form was clad in the short homespun petticoat and white cotton blouse worn by the Estonian peasant-women; her only adornment was the silver chain, with curiously-wrought amulet, round her neck. Her feet and head were bare, yet she walked swiftly over the rough shingles, like one accustomed, whilst her nimble fingers were employed on a large, coarse stocking. Her quick blue eyes seemed to take in sea, and sky, and fir-clad heights, yet her whole soul was in her song. There was glad young life in the lithe, upright figure, the glowing cheek, and coral lip, and she was as fair as the sloe-blossom which lends its grace to her native land. She wore her flaxen hair in a thick plait, reaching below her waist, and tied with a knot of blue ribbon.

At the edge of the water she paused, and watched a diver swoop down and plunge below the surface; then she looked about for a seat amongst the bleached stones. Suddenly a bright idea flashed up into her eyes as she gathered up her skirt, and began wading towards a boat lying far out in the bay.

The tiny fish darted away in shoals at every step. A light breeze swept by and rocked the boat, making it drift to the length of the cable, with which it was attached to one of the many jagged rocks cropping up out of the water, and this made her show a row of pearly teeth. Soon it was gained, and nestling down amongst the dry nets, Brida Rasik gave herself up to the luxury of idleness.

Out burst a hymn again, full and sweet, then the voice ceased. A solemn stillness fell on earth and sea. The sun glowed out in one last departing blush, and silently dipped into the sea. The girl had turned her sweet young face towards the west; her head was pillowed on the nets. Her ears were full of slumberous sounds: the whirr of wings, the soft, low lisps of the water, the hum of innumerable insects above in the air. And as the brighter lights died slowly from the sky, Brida's drowsy eyelids quivered and fell, Dimmer and fainter grew sight and sound, and she slept.

CHAPTER II.

DARKNESS had fallen. With the sunset a breeze had arisen; it rocked the boat in which the unconscious girl lay. Higher it rose. The boat shivered and creaked as if impatient of restraint. A lull and a sudden jerk, and it was slowly drifting with trailing cable into the night.

Time sped upon swift wings. It must have been midnight when Brida awoke. With a start, and a sudden wave of terror, she sat up and gazed around her. Nothing met her view but black water, and, above, the stars.

In a moment the truth flashed upon her—she was drifting! Perhaps out to sea to meet exposure, starvation, and awful death! Oh, it was terrible!

The wind swept past her with a moan, and now fresh terrors took possession of her. If a storm should arise? It was rising, and she was lost!

She sank back and covered her face with her hands. To die all alone! Not even to sleep in the quiet churchyard beside her mother, but somewhere, far down, where the sun never shone, beneath the dark, angry waters. They would never know what had become of her. She looked up at the sky. The stars returned her gaze with a thousand glittering eyes; they looked cruel and cold. There was no hope there.

Oh, if it were only day! She would rather die in the sunlight. The stars glittered, but they gave no light. She shut her eyes and tried to say her prayers, but the words would not come, and she could only repeat: "Oh, dear Heaven, do not let me die! do not let me die!"

How long the fearful night was! Would the morning never dawn? It was so cold! She shivered in her thin cotton blouse. Far, far away the hooting of an owl reached her ear; the sound brought with it a little comfort. She was still in the bay. If the day would come they would surely miss the boat, and come in search of it, and save her; but she would have to wait and tremble, long, long. She lay back, trying to shut out thought, and wait with patience.

Suddenly the wind rose, and shrieked like a human being in distress, and the waters whispered mysteriously. Was it the spirits of the drowned fishermen come to whisper to her their dread secrets? Poor Brida's heart died within her. They were rising out of the water. They were closing round her, and bearing her down. A rushing noise as of many waves clapping together, then all was blank.

CHAPTER III.

HIGH up on the shore of the island of Nargon stands a long, low house against a dark-green background of firs. It is strongly built of logs, with thatched roof and overhanging gables, where the swallows brood. To the right a bridle-path leads into the wood, on the outskirts of which a rough arbour has been reared with benches and a table. Swings dangle from the branches of the neighbouring trees, and close to the house stand a couple of spring-boards. The grass, which shows sparingly amongst the sand, is much trodden down, for this is the school-house.

The autumn day was just breaking when the door opened, and a young man stepped over the threshold. From his dress, he might have been an Estonian farmer, with his suit of grey homespun, broad-brimmed felt hat, and high water-boots; yet his pale, thoughtful face and white hands belied this. A casual observer would have called the rough-hewn features plain, but those who knew the schoolmaster of Nargon, and had seen his face light up and glow with intelligence and sagacity, might have pronounced him handsome. There was gentleness in the depth of his quiet grey eyes, and a firmness of mouth which spoke of culture and self-discipline. It was a face, whether handsome or plain, on which the eye dwelt with pleasure.

Quickly he descended the beach to take his morning dip in the sea, drawing in deep draughts of the powerful resinous odour as he went. He unfastened his boat from its moorings, and pushed from shore. Pulling lustily at his oars, he let his eyes stray with untiring pleasure from the pleasant land, smiling in the morning sunrise, to the dancing wavelets around him. Presently his observation was attracted by a dark object lying close in under the overhanging banks, farther up the coast.

It was an empty boat, he concluded. Who could have landed there? was his next thought. No one, he at once decided. The shore at that part of the island had been undermined by the constant wash of the tide, making it impossible for anyone to have landed there.

The boat must have drifted there without a guide. Some poor fellows had found a watery grave. Such things were of frequent occurrence. He rowed towards it with thoughtful face, and was soon alongside, and there—his eyes could scarcely credit it—there, stretched on the nets at the bottom of the boat, lay a young girl, to all appearances, dead. Her long flaxen hair, moist with the sea breeze, lay like a tangled mass of silken threads. Her eyes were closed.

To fasten the boats together and row to the landing was the work of a few minutes. No time must be lost. Life might not be extinct, and, as he looked at the pale fair face, an intense longing seized him to snatch this one young life from the jaws of death.

Up the beach he carried the lifeless burden with swift steps. No use to seek assistance; the nearest homestead was a mile distant, so he bore her straight to his home, and laying her on his bed, fell to work with terrible energy, chafing the numbed hands and feet, and forcing brandy between the frozen lips.

In vain. The marble face remained cold and still. Then she was dead, this sweet young thing! So young and beautiful, she had passed the grim portals of the unknown. They would come and take away the fair body, and put it down into the black earth. He could not bear the thought. The tears rushed to his eyes as he bent over her with yearning regret.

Was it fancy? Surely the eyelids quivered?

He fell on his knees and gazed with bated breath and fast beating heart. All was still; the long lashes rested as before on the marble cheeks—motionless. He covered his eyes with his hands. "Thy will be done!" he murmured, and—he could not help it—though she was nothing to him, the tears of bitter disappointment fell thick and fast through his fingers. He would have fain restored this tender blossom. She was so young and beautiful to die.

Was that a sigh? It could not be. He must have been again deceived, yet he listened with straining ear. He dared not look, but knelt on with covered eyes. He was not wrong this time. She had moved, he felt it. He looked up quickly, straight into a pair of startled, wide-open, blue eyes. In a moment he was on his feet, the blood rushing to his face, dyeing it to the roots of his tawny hair. Self-conscious, awkward, embarrassed, he stood, without uttering a word, waiting for her to speak.

At first Brida looked about her with perplexed gaze. Where was she? It came upon her with a rush.

The boat drifting on under the pitiless stars, through long hours of terror. Then unconsciousness.

"How did I come here?" she said at length. "Where did you find me? Where am I?" She attempted to rise, but a sudden faintness made her sink back and close her eyes.

This brought the schoolmaster to himself at once.

"You need food," he said. "Do not attempt to rise until I have made you some warm tea."

Brida was too much exhausted to do other than obey, and when the young man entered shortly with steaming tea and a large slice of black bread and sweet butter, he found his charge in a profound sleep.

"I will not disturb her," he muttered. "Sleep will do her good."

He drew forward a small table, and placed the food upon it where she would see it when she awoke. Then for a moment he allowed his eyes to rest on the sleeping girl.

How fair she was! He had never seen anything so perfectly lovely. Surely the look was pardonable?

But he suddenly started like one caught trespassing; his face burned and glowed like a woman's, as he hastily left the room.

Half an hour later he was standing in the long, low schoolroom, amongst his boys. They stood in rows before him, shock-headed, heavy-featured, with sunburnt faces, dressed to a boy in grey homespun, and smelling of peat and tanned leather.

An hour passed amid the droning of voices, the schoolmaster mechanically chalking figures on a blackboard, explaining, correcting, listening.

At the close of the lesson there was a pause of five minutes. He stole out to the door of the room in which the young girl lay. There was not a sound, so he went softly back again to his work.

Another hour of application. The room had grown insupportably hot. He threw open the casement and let the cool sea-breeze blow on his heated temples. His eyes rested on the landscape without, but he saw as in a dream, and everywhere blue eyes looked out at him from beneath long flaxen locks.

The boys had burst from the house, and the schoolmaster was alone. Now he must indeed go and see whether his guest slept. If awake, she would have questions to ask. She would want to go home. At this thought a pang shot through his heart. She had a home, and friends of whom he knew nothing. She would soon be gone to them, and he would see her no more. He did not even know her name. What a fool he was! He would bring it to an end at once. And with compressed lips he put his hand upon the latch.

A woman's voice arrested him, singing softly within. Again that pang which almost took his breath away, and without allowing thought the mastery, he entered quickly.

CHAPTER IV.

THE room was full of sunshine. His room had never looked so bright and habitable before. The varnished chairs were neatly arranged, the painted floor was clean swept, and the plants he had brought in the previous evening and left in a litter on the table, were carefully laid together in a little heap. The bedroom in which he had left Brida sleeping was within this sitting-room, and the door, which he had closed behind him, now stood half-open. He advanced and stood spellbound on the threshold.

With her back towards him, her upper skirt turned up, and a long brush in her hand, stood the girl for whom, only a few hours ago, he had grieved as for one dead. She was sweeping with a will, and singing a soft accompaniment.

Too confounded to articulate, the schoolmaster stood and watched, until, turning, she perceived him. In a moment she had laid aside her brush, and showing a row of dazzling teeth, stepped swiftly up to him.

"Thank you, schoolmaster, for your hospitality," she exclaimed merrily with a twinkle in her bright eye. "I know all about it—I have guessed. This is the land-tongue of Nargon, and you are the new schoolmaster. When old Yahn Curri had the school, father used to row me over the bay to the school-house, but they have pulled down the rickety old barrack and built you a house fit for the Czar." And she looked about her, still showing her pretty teeth. There was a pause, during which the bewildered young man sought in vain for something to reply, but Brida began again before he had brought out a word. "You found me in father's boat." Her face grew grave, and she shivered. "Oh, it was terrible all through the long night to be alone and think of death! But tell me," she added quickly, looking up into his face, "where did you pick me up? I can remember nothing but lying in the boat with the cruel stars looking at me. Then darkness."

The schoolmaster was obliged to rouse himself.

"The boat was lying close to land, and you were in it. I thought you were dead, so I brought you here." He glanced around him as he spoke. "I fear things were not very tidy," he added diffidently with a short, nervous laugh. "I am sorry it is not comfortable; I am used to it, and do not mind."

Brida laughed.

"Oh, you men get into a nice muddle if you are left to yourselves," she replied. "A bachelor's house is easily recognised." Then, resuming her brush, she continued: "I thought the least I could do was to tidy a little in return for your kindness."

And she cast on him a grateful look.

"You are too kind," he said, "and I do not deserve your gratitude. I only did for you what any one would have done in my place. Surely no one would see a fellow-creature die without trying to save him; and I brought you back to life without even personal risk."

He moved to the window and took a seat. The soft plash of the waves came in through the open casement, mingling with the distant shouts of the boys at play, but he heard it not; he was watching the swift, lithe movements of his companion, as she converted his little den into order and neatness, and an undefined feeling of sadness stole over him.

A pile of books lay in a confused heap in a corner.

"May I sort these?" she asked, looking up at him from her knees on the floor.

"If you will be so kind."

She opened one, and looked into it.

"Ah, if I could only read it," she sighed. "How clever you must be to know all those books!"

The schoolmaster could not help smiling at the simple words and perplexed face.

When the books had been ranged according to their size, on the top of the chest of drawers, Brida regarded them with her head on one side.

"There, that looks better," she said. "You can come at them better when they are in a row; besides, it looks neat."

"You are right," he replied; "you have indeed made my poor house look, as you said, fit for the Czar." Suddenly he pulled out a large quaint watch, and started to his feet. "Time is up!" he exclaimed.

"Wait," interposed Brida; "you must not go yet. Can I have a boat? I must be home with all speed now. Poor father does not know where I am; perhaps he thinks me dead."

The young man looked thoughtful. At length he said:

"You shall go at once; I will row you across myself."

"But the boys—your school?" broke in Brida. "You need not fear to trust me, I can row like any man."

"I will take you," he replied decisively, and going to the door he summoned the boys with a bell. "Lads," he said, when they had gathered, "I must row over to the mainland on business; you may go home. I give you a half-holiday."

In less than a minute the boys had dispersed, and the master returned to the house. Brida was already at his side, and he silently led the way to the beach. Here and there a clump of heather cropped up through the sandy soil. Brida stooped and gathered a few sprays, casting as she did so a long and steadfast look back at the house.

Seated in the boat she chatted lightly, whilst the schoolmaster sat opposite to her plying his oars. He furtively watched the changes in her pure young face, and his heart went out to her. He could not trust himself to reply to her innocent remarks, for his soul was heavy and sorrowful. Every stroke brought the parting nearer. Then he would see her no more. Was it possible that he had lived twenty-six years without her sweet companionship, and had found life tolerably happy?

Meanwhile, she too grew grave, chilled by his silence. He was annoyed, she thought, by her foolish chatter. He was so clever, so far above her in everything. She wished he had been less learned. So she sat quite silent, looking wistfully back at the receding point of Nargon, with its solitary house on the green slope. Soon the mainland began to grow on the sight, and Brida could discern figures on the shore. A group of fishermen sat mending their nets, but she looked in vain for her father amongst them. At length they became aware of the approaching boat, with the empty one in tow. She rose to her feet, and waved her handkerchief. In an instant every cap was off and waving a response. Brida forgot her companion. Her eyes filled with joyful tears. They were her own people.

Before their boat was in shallow water the fishermen were wading knee-deep to meet it. A dozen pair of hard hands seized the boat to help it ashore, and rough voices were mingled in eager question. The schoolmaster had to stand aside as they lifted her from the boat. No one heeded him.

Her first words were: "Father! where is he?"

He had gone to the town to seek her at her aunt's, they said. The boat had never been missed. No one had thought of it. Then followed question and answer, whilst the unnoticed stranger stood by, moody and silent, until Brida arrived at that part of her story where he had found her, and brought her back to life.

All eyes were turned on him now, and his hand was shaken until the sinews cracked again. But he steadfastly declined the cordial invitations to join in a keg of beer at the inn. He wished to be gone and forget. Not even when Brida begged him with beseeching eyes to stay and see her father did he yield.

And the girl stood and watched the receding boat with sorrow, not unmixed with anger. "He might have remained," she thought. "But he is proud, and looks down on poor fisher-folk. Let him go then, he is nothing to me!" And yet as she hurried away to meet her father, she could have wept with vexation.

CHAPTER V.

THE schoolmaster rowed away with mighty strokes, his sole aim to widen the distance between himself and the being who had robbed him of his peace of mind. He was angry with himself, angry with fate, angry with the whole world. He did not once turn his eyes to the spot where Brida stood, but looked persistently away, though he felt that she was watching him, expecting, perhaps, some farewell sign. Gradually the bodily exertion quieted his spirit. "Tomorrow," he thought, "will bring the daily routine of duties. I will begin to study hard, and life will flow on as it has done before. In a week the whole adventure will be forgotten." And yet, through all the calm reasoning, his heart ached with a dull pain which would not be stilled, and his honest face was clouded with a grief before unknown. On sped the boat, until his own well-known homestead rose to view. Often had he greeted it with quiet satisfaction, but now it looked dreary and deserted. No smoke arose from its chimneys, no voice would welcome his return. It had always been so, but he had never felt it until now.

In the house her presence met him everywhere. There lay the weeds her thoughtful hands had arranged. He took them up reverently, and returned them to the place where they had lain before. He wandered into the inner room. Here, too, her presence followed him. There stood the row of books; he took the one down he had seen her open, and mechanically fingered the leaves.

The stillness of the house oppressed him; he could not bear it, and his pent-up feelings burst forth. He pressed his hands to his burning eyes. No tears fell, but his heart wept. At length he rushed forth into the darkening wood. It was long past midnight when he returned, with pallid face and exhausted frame, to throw himself upon his bed and fall into the sleep of utter prostration.

A week had passed, in close application during the day, and long lonely rambles in the still, autumn evenings. It was the Sabbath evening once more. The schoolmaster sat at his door and smoked. During the past week he had been teaching himself to forget, and since that outbreak of feeling he had sedulously put from him each rising thought relating to that episode in his life which had so seriously threatened his peace of mind. To a certain extent he had succeeded. Work and a strong will are wonderful preventives of unwelcome thought. But in the quiet and inactivity of the day of rest the struggle had been great, and rebellious memory had striven to assert itself. He had fought manfully against it—had walked miles to the Estonian service, then, after his solitary meal, had wandered hours in the silent, dreamy woods. Now he sat resting, looking out over the bay, as the swallows swept past with a constant whirr and scream, to skim the water in endless circles. How now to banish thought? It came upon him with redoubled force. Just across there lay Tischer. She might be sitting on that very shore of which he could see the dim outline, and be gazing towards him over the shining waters. Had she forgotten him? But why should she remember? He was a fool! That boat which had been growing on his sight was certainly making for the island. He began to be interested in it, and soon was watching eagerly. Yes, it was steering for the point.

His heart bounded wildly, he knew not why, and the vivid colour mounted to his cheek. He laid aside his pipe and walked down to the landing. Now he could make out the single occupant, a broad-shouldered, middle-aged man, who plied his oars like a practised seaman. He was a stranger, but as he leaped on shore he sent his blithe voice before him like an old friend.

"Terrä, terrä, Cooli Maes" ("Good-day, schoolmaster"). Then with outstretched hand: "I am Mattæas Rasik, the father of the maiden you picked up last week, and I thank you."

How the young man despised himself for his tingling cheeks as he shook the proffered hand! But it would have been impossible to feel ill at ease for long with Rasik the fisherman, and half an hour later, as the two men sat in the arbour over steaming coffee, sending up volumes of smoke through the interlacing branches, they were like old friends. Rasik was a man of many words, the schoolmaster a good listener, and the evening was far advanced when the former rose to go.

"You will come and see us next Sabbath?" cried Rasik as he pulled from shore. "Brida, too, will be glad to see you."

"I will come."

CHAPTER VI.

AGAIN it is the Sabbath, but the face of Nature is changed. No longer do the heather-bells deck moor and woodland with their delicate beauty. The pines still stand clad in their dark green robes, but the fairy birches have scattered golden leaves over the brown earth, where here and there the yellow star of the tormentil peeps bright-eyed out of scarlet leaves. The clear metallic light of late autumn lies on the landscape, making the rocky cliffs stand out in bold relief, and the motionless water reflect like a sea of glass, save where glittering drops fall tinkling from the upraised oars of the solitary rower, who is nearing the shores of Tischer.

A young man, tawny-haired and grey-eyed, springs from the boat to the shingle, and turns to ascend the steep path leading to the heights which overlook the little fisher-village on the one side, and the bay with its dotted islands on the other.

On the top he pauses and draws a long breath. Not a sound is heard, for the song of birds is long since silent in the copse. All Nature is silent as if at prayers. He feels the subtle spell of perfect peace which lies on all, and his spirit is lulled and soothed by it. Presently he is startled by a slight rustle amongst the hazel-bushes close by. Some busy squirrel, doubtless, is still seeking for stray nuts. It stirs again, accompanied by the snapping of dry twigs, and the branches are parted by a plump arm, disclosing the blushing, wondering face of Brida Rasik, amidst a shower of golden leaves.

"Schoolmaster! You here?"

The surprise is unfeigned, it is not a rendezvous. She approaches and holds out a timid hand.

There is a change in Brida since we saw her last; there is a shy, confused light in her eyes which quickly shun his; her manner is subdued and shrinking now, where before she was lively and loquacious. He, too, is changed. He no longer turns his gaze aside, but allows his eyes to rest on her fair young face with undisguised passion. He has taken her hand, and still holds it in his, and for a moment there is silence. Brida's lip is beginning to quiver, and she tries to withdraw her hand, but he holds it in a firm grasp as he says in trembling accents:

"You must not, you shall not go, Brida. I must speak, even though you send me from you for ever. Brida, I love you more than my life—you know I love you."

He pauses, overcome by emotion, as the burning tears well up in his eyes. Brida does not reply, but turns away her face from his burning gaze, and he resumes with bitterness, mistaking her silence:

"You have robbed me of my peace of mind. You have come between me and my work. Oh, if I did not love you to madness, maiden, I would hate you as only he who has loved can hate. But I will go," flinging her hand from him with passionate vehemence; "I will leave this wretched place, and you shall be troubled with my presence no more. Surely the world is wide enough to separate us!"

Another pause. Brida feels as if she were turned to stone. She longs to speak, but her lips refuse utterance. He watches her with a gleam of hope even through his despair. Her averted face and persistent silence deceive him again. "She dislikes me," he thinks, "but cannot say so. My presence is hateful to her. Yes, I must go!"

When he speaks again it is with forced calm. He will not terrify her with his passion.

"Forgive me, maiden; I am cruel to frighten you. Think no more of me. I am half mad. But oh, my darling, if it could only have been! But it cannot, and I do not blame you. I was a presumptuous fool to suppose that such happiness could ever be mine. There, do not cry, I am not worth such tears. Farewell."

He takes her hand once more, for the last time, and presses it to his lips, then turns from her with faltering steps. A low, piteous wail as of a child in distress arrests him. Brida has sunk down on the grass and buried her face in her hands. Her long-suppressed feelings burst forth, and she sobs as if her heart would break. He was gone. She had let him go without a word. Oh, how could she bear it?

"Brida, my love, say I have been wrong!"

The schoolmaster is kneeling by her side. He throws his strong arm round her.

"Do not go, do not go," she sobs. "Oh, I am so miserable!"

"And I," he cries exultingly, "am so happy!"

The brighter lights had faded in the west, and the stars were growing and deepening in the heavens, when two figures were slowly wending their way down the steep path towards the village of Tischer. Is that our awkward, shy schoolmaster who is looking with undaunted confidence into the beaming face of that bright creature by his side? He is actually leading her by the hand. And that is Brida's merry laugh which rings out on the still air as she exclaims in a happy, saucy voice:

"You are but a simple fellow, schoolmaster, not to have seen long since that I cared only for your foolish self. You go poking about the woods, observing the ways of every beast that crosses your path, and there's not a poor little weed that can hide itself from you; but the thing nearest to you, that you cannot see."

His only reply is to draw his love to his joyous heart and close her sweet lips with a kiss.

Youth.—A Sonnet.

THERE is no gift like youth; once was I young,
And held the jewel in unheeding hands,
While spring-tide walked the slowly wakening lands,
And made me promises with silvery tongue,
Re-echoed in their thousand songs low sung
By free, wild birds. Then on the bright brown sands,
The pearl-hued sea danced smiling; fairy bands
Swung all the flower-beds that gaily rang,
To welcome me to life.

I paused awhile,
And waited for the future that should rise
To crown my manhood. So did hope beguile,
Till something passed across my noon-tide skies,
And e'er I knew youth lived so brief a while,
Age took my hands in his, claiming his prize.

"My Lord Conceit."

(A SERIAL STORY.)

By the Author of "FRAGOLETTA," "DAMN DURDEN," Etc., Etc.

Book VI.

CHAPTER VII. A WOMAN'S MOODS.

HALF an hour after, and she was sitting in her own study at her writing-table.

"I need not trouble myself to write any more," she said in a strange, dazed sort of way, listlessly turning over sheet after sheet of MS. "No one wants it; no one will care; no one knows what has been in my life and my heart; no one dreads what may still be."

It seemed to her as if years had passed since she left that room, to come back weighted with a fresh burden, to stand face to face with a harder duty.

When the door opened, and Madge Dunbar crept in, pale and frightened, she did not move; she only looked up once, but her look said more than any spoken words.

"You have been beaten; you are going back to him?" said Madge, sharply, fearfully, smitten to the heart by the revelation of pain and woe that one look had brought to light. "Oh, my dear, my dear, how could you?"

Beryl rose from her seat and pushed aside the papers, and went over to the chair by the fire where she had sat the evening before, listening to the story of the monk.

"Yes," she said, "I am going back. Since he has come all this way to assure me he has forgiven me, you would not have me—ungrateful?"

"Forgiven! What has he to forgive?" cried Madge passionately. She threw herself on the rug and caught the cold and trembling hands that lay tight-clasped in Beryl Marsden's lap.

"He is wonderfully magnanimous all of a sudden after three years; after absence, silence, insult—after leaving you to starve or go to wreck and ruin had you been so disposed, he turns round like this! There's something behind it all, Beryl—take my word for it!"

"What can there be?" she said wearily. "I don't suppose my beauty impressed him very powerfully—it didn't seem to—and he wants nothing but just my presence under his roof—no affection, no wifely interest, only just appearances."

Madge looked and felt bewildered.

"It is most extraordinary," she said. "Did he say anything about—Ivor Grant?"

"A good deal," answered Beryl quietly. "It was only natural he should; but it suits his purpose to believe I was only a little thoughtless and carried on a flirtation."

"How worn and ill you look!" cried Madge tenderly. "I wish you would lie down and rest. You look just like you did before you had that terrible illness."

"Do I?" said Beryl wearily. "Perhaps I am going to be ill again. Oh, I wish I were—I wish I were going to die. I think it would be easier—at least it would be rest. Oh, Madge, you don't know what it is to long and long for rest, and it never comes—it never comes."

"It will come, it must; oh, try and believe that, dear. You can't be always tried like this; and perhaps he is changed, he may be kinder—better. Did he seem sorry?"

"Sorry!" that dreary little laugh fell tuneless and mocking on her ear. "He sorry? What has he to be sorry for? He always thought himself immaculate. Now he is doubly so; receiving a sinner back into favour is such a pleasant and self-satisfying emotion."

"Don't," cried Madge hurriedly. "Whatever you do, don't get into that mocking, bitter way of speaking. It is not safe for a woman like you to harden herself."

"No," said Beryl drearily, as she glanced down at her hands clasping and unclasping each other in nervous restlessness. "It is not safe."

"If I could do anything," implored Madge tearfully.

"No one can do anything for me," said Beryl, in the same cold, restrained voice. "I am very unfortunate. I thought these three past years had been hard and sad enough, but they look like happiness now beside this."

"Why did you promise?" cried Madge passionately. "It is too hard—too cruel. You can't bear it. You haven't strength."

"Yes," she said quietly, "I think I have."

"And when do you go?" asked Madge at last after a pause, during which her tears had been rapidly falling.

"He is to write and let me know his arrangements. I think that was what he said. 'Arrangements!' It sounds calm, and business-like, and satisfactory—doesn't it?"

"Yes," said Madge, "it does. And you think you can fall in with them? Do you remember what you said to me last night?"

"Last night," said Beryl with a weary sigh, "was—last night. I dare say I said many foolish things. The sight of the ghost unstrung me. Most emotions are not so much a matter of feeling with women, as of nerves."

"What has come to you?" cried Madge sorrowfully. "You are only acting; you are not true to yourself. You will suffer for it afterwards."

"Shall I?" she echoed faintly, and rested her head in a strange, tired fashion against the chair-back. "Perhaps you are right. I always seem to suffer for things afterwards."

Madge Dunbar was silent. She was puzzled and she was distressed beyond measure, and she could not understand Beryl in this mood. Tears, laments, complaints—these might be soothed or answered; but this cold, hard, cynical way of treating trouble pained and perplexed her all in one. Yet some instinct told her that the reaction would be terrible when it came.

"He is very much changed," continued Beryl presently. "So old, and worn-looking, and wizened. I thought I felt a little sorry for him—once. After all," she added with a swift change of mood that swept the calm and coldness from her in a sudden passion of sorrowful despair, "after all, facts are facts. He is my husband; I am his wife. I must do my duty if—he claims it; and he has done so. It is simpler to look the truth in the face, and the truth is only this: that to nourish any feeling of sentiment for a man not your husband is wrong and shameful. It must be beaten out, trampled out, killed out of one! There lies my task in the future."

"And when it is done?" said Madge Dunbar involuntarily.

"There will be peace, perhaps. Can you fancy the utter nothingness one would feel—passion, bitterness, sorrow, remorse, pain, all ended? Ah, how quiet life would be!"

For the first time her self-command left her, and tears were dangerously near her eyes. She steadied herself with an effort.

"I don't want to be pathetic," she said. "I have reached a stage where pity is dangerous. I feel calm now, calmer than I have done for long. I must try and keep myself so. It is so weak to cry, and tears don't do any good."

"They are better than this hardness that you call calm," said Madge. "You frighten me, Beryl, when you talk so. It is so unlike you—so horribly unlike you."

"I want to be hard," said Beryl fiercely. "Hard as iron, cold as steel. I will not let myself think, dream, remember. It is dangerous, it is unwise, it is killing me! What did John say? 'Sentiment destroys women.' Of course it does, of course it must. And what have I to do with sentiment, I at my years, with my life half lived?"

She stopped abruptly, her hands clenched hard and close. Something she saw in Madge Dunbar's face smote her to the heart as a child's grief might have done.

"I am tired," she said, faltering; "let me be by myself. I shall be better then."

"Very well," said Madge gently, "and think of your children, dear; that will soften you. Any tears, any grief, would be better than this."

"I have cried so much," moaned Beryl, covering her eyes with her hands, as if to shut out that pitying face. "Oh, the nights, the dreadful, dark, long nights, when will they end? when shall I be at peace again?"

Madge Dunbar stood still and looked at that cowering figure with a strange, unfamiliar sensation. The tragedy and pathos of this life she loved came home to her then as they had never done before, and with it that sense of utter helplessness which comes to most onlookers, as the full sense of grief or suffering meets them face to face.

"If she would only cry—it would be so much better for her if she would only cry!" she thought.

But tears were far enough away from the dry and burning eyes that looked up at her own. Madge turned away, and drew up the couch near the fire and arranged the cushions more comfortably.

"Come and lie down," she said with gentle authority, and laid her hand on Beryl's arm.

Without a word she rose and laid her head down on the cushions, and closed her eyes in very weariness.

"That is right," said Madge softly, covering the slight figure with a rug. "Now you are not to speak any more. I want you just to listen to me for a moment. Perhaps you think I don't understand unhappiness, because I have always seemed such a frivolous little butterfly. But I know what sorrow is, all the same. Oh, Beryl, as I said before, don't let it harden you, that is the worst thing that could happen. I know what hurts you most. It is the knowledge that you let your heart go out of your keeping. But you could not tell, and he—I know he was too brave and honourable to breathe a thought of wrong. Think of him as the friend who stood between you and sorrow; think of him beside your children's dying bed; think of him, in his great pity and longing for you, stifling pain so bravely, and comforting you, as you have told me he did comfort you. What is there of shame in all this? What is there that a man like John Marsden should cavil at? He who left you lonely, grief-stricken, unprotected, at the mercy of strangers in your hour of greatest need. Few men or women could have come out of such an ordeal as you and Ivor Grant have come. And now—oh, my dear!—you are not going to break down now. Not going to let yourself be spoilt, and hardened, and embittered."

A gesture from that shivering figure stayed her.

"Don't speak of him," cried Beryl faintly. "I mustn't think of him; it makes me weak—so weak, and I want to be strong. I—I must be strong."

"No," said Madge gently, "not strong like this; not hard, and cold, and unnatural. You can't deny yourself, you can't choke out the tenderness that is in you—the tenderness that made you little Jack's mother more than John Marsden's wife."

There were tears now, painful tears—tears that fell like drops of scalding lead upon the clasped white hands, but tears that rejoiced Madge Dunbar's heart, knowing as she knew that unless that strained and cruel tension was relieved, the aching brain must suffer for the tired and aching heart.

"That is right," she said gently. "It may hurt you, but it is good for you. God sent women tears, perhaps just as he sent them children. They comfort and ease them when the fight is hardest. You have come to the worst part of your fight to-day, and you must come out conqueror."

"No," she said with a sob; "I am beaten. Sorrow is too much for me. There seems nothing more to do except just endure pain."

"It won't be pain always; it will get soothed, and lulled, and die away."

"If I could think so!" she moaned; "if I could only think so! But I can't forget, Madge! It isn't in me."

"There is no need that you should forget," said Madge gently. "One doesn't forget one's dead; only one thinks of them lovingly, regretfully, tenderly, as things waiting for a better life, and a happier one than this. And that is how you should try to think of Ivor Grant."

"You are right," said Beryl. The tears were falling freely now, the coldness and hardness had fled. "He has passed from my life, and I from his. It seems impossible such pain can live and last, and end in—nothing; and it is not easy to believe it just at first. But I must. Tell me I must. Don't stop telling me. Oh, Madge, Madge! No, don't look like that—I am only faint."

CHAPTER VIII. A WOMAN AND THE LAW.

"IN effect," said Count Savona, "you can't persuade her."

"In effect, my good friend, I cannot. She is indignant, she is passionate, she is incredulous; but above all she is obstinate—obstinate as a mule."

"And the lawyers cannot move any further without her?"

"No, so they say; because she has the one paper they want."

"I knew that long ago," muttered the count with a dark frown. "Can't it be got from her?" he added aloud. "Where's your authority as a husband?"

"Nowhere, just at present. I confess I'm beaten. She's very ill, you know, and I can't be violent."

"Violent, with a woman like that! What a mistake!" exclaimed Savona. "That is your worst policy, my friend."

"You are always talking of 'policy.' I should like to see some of yours exercised. Just you try your hand at persuading Beryl to do a thing she doesn't want to do. I doubt if you'd succeed any better than myself."

"Probably not," said the count coolly. "You see I labour under the slight disadvantage of not being her husband."

"Husband! Fiddlesticks! After the way I've behaved to Beryl, that plea doesn't serve me for much. She just looks at me with those calm, grand eyes as though to say, 'What of those three years?' and—and well, 'pon my honour, count, I can't help feeling small and mean."

"That's a pity; you should have contrived to make her feel she's in the wrong. A man can do anything, you know. A married man, especially, can indulge in any little escapade short of actual desertion, and even then your beautiful English law steps in, I believe. There's some clause, isn't there, about six years and three hundred and sixty-four days eleven hours; turn up before the twelfth hour, and you're all right? I have a great admiration for your English law. It is a grand institution."

"I wish English law would knock this sentimental tomfoolery out of Beryl's head," muttered John Marsden sulkily. "And to get ill now, of all times! It's enough to try a saint."

"You see your return was rather a surprise," said the count with a sneer, "and her sudden accession to the Court awoke old sentiments. I suppose she thinks it sacrilege to accept what her lover has lost?"

"Don't call him that," blustered John Marsden; "you forget whom you are speaking to."

"Oh no, I don't. I only imagined you had no 'fine' feelings on that point."

"There you're wrong. A precious lot of bother she's going to give us, though," he went on gloomily. "All this family business has to be investigated. It's the oddest tangle I ever heard of. The idea of her mother being connected with the Grants, and she never knowing it!"

"I found that out long ago," said the count, rolling a cigarette in an airy, graceful fashion peculiar to himself.

"You find everything out," John Marsden remarked with a sort of sulkily admiration.

"Yes, when it suits my purpose. I have traced a murder out before now."

"A murder!" echoed John Marsden.

He shivered involuntarily, and glanced round the room—a somewhat gloomy room—one of a set of chambers that he had taken in the vicinity of Lincoln's Inn Fields, the better to watch the case and hurry on the lawyers, so he had said.

"Don't speak of horrors to-night," he went on nervously. "This place is bad enough, when one lives in it alone, and one's system isn't as brisk as it might be. I—I wish sometimes I hadn't come. Those dark staircases and cupboards and places give me the horrors."

The count looked at him keenly.

"Queer things, nerves," he remarked; "play the deuce with a man, though. There have been times when I could have sworn I've seen a face looking at me from out of some nook or corner of a room. And the more you try not to see it, the more certain you are that it's there. Now that cupboard, for instance, over there—"

"Don't!" cried John Marsden fiercely. "I won't have it—I tell you, I won't have it! That cupboard's just the one I always fancy some one might hide in."

"So they might," said the count airily. "It's roomy enough. But we're not afraid; oh no, we're not afraid. We don't live in a land of traitors, brigands, assassins. No fear of a secret foe creeping out from thence with stealthy step. Can't you fancy it, my friend—creeping on in the darkness and the shadows, dark and relentless as an avenger, with bated breath, and shining steel held firm in a ruthless grasp; with—"

"Be silent!" screamed John Marsden shrilly, as he sprang to his feet. "I tell you I won't listen—I won't!"

"You needn't listen," said the count, looking at him as if he were some curious study he was analysing. "I thought 'twas only conscience made cowards of us. Do you still possess one?"

"I don't know," stammered his companion, sinking back into his chair, and passing his hand over his damp brow. "I—I'm not in good health. Liver, you know, and all that. And living alone tells on a man. I think I'll give up these rooms."

"I should," said Savona quietly, "and go and live at the Court; possession is nine points of the law, you know. Another of your admirable English maxims."

"I could not do that, could I?" cried John Marsden eagerly. "Beryl wouldn't hear of it, and—"

"Beryl, always Beryl," sneered Savona. "Must you consider her? What is the wife's, that is also the husband's, is it not?"

"But she won't allow that it is hers. How can I help that?"

"You must get possession of that paper," said the count, looking at him steadily.

"Easier said than done. She's watched and guarded by that little Dunbar woman like a prisoner. There's no getting at her."

"But you might get at the paper."

"How?"

The count took his cigarette from his mouth, knocked off some loose ash, balanced it carefully in his fingers, then threw it aside.

"How?" he said with an earnestness he had not yet shown.

"By stratagem. Where does she keep her papers?"

"How do I know? I suppose in a desk or cabinet; most women do."

"She is not like most women, and she does not keep them in any desk or cabinet. Of that I am sure."

"You?" cried John Marsden, looking at him bewildered. "How on earth could you know?"

A strange look came over the Italian's face.

"I have stayed at Vaux Abbey," he said. "Whether as a guest or not doesn't signify. The papers we seek are not in Mrs. Marsden's desk."

John Marsden shrank back and looked at him with a sort of horror not unmixed with fear.

"You—you dared!" he stammered.

"Oh yes; why not?" said the count tranquilly. "I dare anything when I'm put to it. You forget that I hate Ivor Grant, and I'm a good hater. He won't be the first who's discovered that. Those papers are necessary for my vengeance. I thought your wife possessed them. I think so still. But, as I said before, their hiding-place baffles me. I didn't find any love-letters either," he went on mockingly, "or I would have brought them to you—a proof of my disinterestedness. They are very exemplary, these platonic lovers, and they don't trust even platronics to paper. They are wise."

"Come, come, you know," blustered John Marsden. "A man can't stand this sort of thing, however badly his wife has behaved. You've no right to play the spy on her. Of course, with me it's a different matter. I can do what I choose, and I've every right to do it; but you—"

He paused abruptly. Something in that sinister face, in the lightning-like flash of the dark eyes, struck to his heart with a sense of sudden fear.

Savona merely leant his elbows on the table at which they were sitting, and resting his chin on the palms of his hands, looked full in the face of his companion.

"My friend," he said calmly, "you're a fool!"

"Thank you for the information," said John Marsden, with a praiseworthy attempt at indifference. "You will excuse my saying that I've always heard foreigners were remarkable for politeness."

"Have you?" said the count with a sneer. "Perhaps they are—when it suits their purpose."

"I may infer then it doesn't suit yours; yet it strikes me I've most cause to complain. You've brought me over to England on a wild-goose—chase at the peril, too, of my life," he gave an uneasy glance again at those shadowy corners of the room, "and it strikes me I may be months—years, even—here, before those lawyers can settle anything. They talk of throwing it into Chancery now. You know what that means?"

"Yes," said the count with a meaning smile, "another of your English institutions—not quite so admirable as the laws for husband and wife."

"Admirable! It means everything going into lawyers' pockets, and nothing to those who have right on their side; it means weighting hope with a living curse, and life with a burden worse than poverty; it means being badgered, and worried, and tortured till one hasn't a moment's peace. No, thank you, my friend, I'd sooner go back to India than wait the issue of a Chancery suit."

"Ah," said the count dryly, "I think I've heard something of the same sort before. Well, the point at issue resolves itself into this: by fair means—or otherwise—you must get those papers from your wife within a week's time. If I were in your place, my good John Marsden, I think I should succeed."

He rose as he spoke and began to button his overcoat. Marsden looked at him appealingly.

"You—you're not going yet?"

"With the deepest assurances of my regret," said the count mockingly, "I am going—now, this moment."

"It's so hatefully lonely here," muttered John Marsden. "I wish I'd never come to the place. And I've had a touch of fever to-day. I—— You might stay till I go to bed, count."

"True," said Savona placidly, as if he were agreeing to a self-evident proposition, "I might, my good friend, but I don't intend to."

John Marsden muttered something under his breath not exactly complimentary, but the count gave no sign of hearing it. He nodded and went over to the door, opened it, then paused on the threshold, and looked back at the gloomy face and wizened figure by the table.

"The Indian mail is in," he said quietly. "I suppose you know that?"

John Marsden started perceptibly. His yellow face took a grey and frightened look.

"What of it?" he said with an effort at calmness.

"As yet, nothing," said the count imperturbably. "But she brings passengers, you know. Are you not expecting a consignment of—tiger-claws?"

And with a mocking laugh he closed the door.

It seemed to John Marsden as if long hours had passed since the sound of that mocking laugh and closing door had ceased to echo in his ears.

He sat there in the same attitude, staring moodily at the fire in the grate, full of bitter and revengeful thoughts.

"I wish I could understand that man," he said to himself. "Why has he mixed himself up in this business? Why did he write to me about Beryl, and how has he wormed his way into secrets unknown even to members of her own family?"

He only puzzled himself to no purpose, as many others had done before him. If there was a mystery about this count and his countship, it was a mystery as yet unfathomed. Gossip and ill-report were about him in plenty, but no authentic basis had as yet been discovered on which to rest the suspicions he aroused. That convenient "they say" was all any one could bring to bear upon the stories of which he was the hero. He had a method all his own of drawing people slowly and helplessly into his toils. Once in them they very rarely found escape possible, save by that one gate which despair opens to the broken-hearted and the desperate, and which even the powerful will of Count Savona could not close.

After leaving John Marsden, the count walked leisurely through the streets. His face was not good to look upon, it was so darkly set, it bore so cruel and so merciless a determination.

"How the affair drags," he muttered, as his teeth closed viciously on the cigarette he had just lighted; "and only a woman between me and five thousand pounds. I must have those papers. Where can she have put them? Perhaps the good folks at Vaux Abbey will find the Abbey ghost pursuing his nocturnal rambles once again."

(To be continued.—Commenced in No. 141.)

Aunt Clare's "Old Story."

(A STORY IN TWO WEEKLY PARTS.)

CHAPTER III.

THERE never was such a May as that one. One other May-time there was which was as good, but then the good was gravely mingled with serious, tender thoughts. Then I was sailing away for life on the measureless ocean of a woman's responsibilities—responsibilities which are joys, but yet which incline one to give little heed to the gay notes of every sunbeam.

Now, in this first May-time existence was a very sunbeam.

Sir Peter Farre's son coming down to the rectory made an excuse for some country junketing, as the weather settled into regular summer warmth. Of course I was in all this, for the rectory boys and girls were as much like brothers and sisters to me as people not actually bound by kinship could be.

Oddly enough, Mrs. Barlowe began one day to talk to me about her nephew.

"It is a great trouble," said she. "Peter is very unsatisfactory—very unsatisfactory."

She was tearing a quantity of list off flannel in readiness for winter needs. A soft screech of tearing wool followed her remark. She looked at me as if for an answer.

"Is he?" said I carelessly. I could not endorse her assertion as a fact.

"Very. You have been brought up in a practical school, Clare. Is a man to idle away his time doing nothing like this for week after week?"

"He will have to fight."

Mr. Farre was, it may be stated, a lieutenant in His Majesty's Guards, now on leave.

"Might have had to. Have you not heard the last? He talks of selling out."

I had heard that.

"Shall I sell out?" one day Mr. Farre had said to me; "sell out and take a home civil appointment, and then——"

"And be scouted for a coward, because they say the war will last, and even the Guards must go."

This had been my answer in one of my hot impulses.

There had been nothing more—nothing more that I care to write down. So I felt inclined to taciturnity when Mrs. Barlowe sought to talk.

"He ought to be at the Horseguards now, volunteering, pushing, doing anything and everything to get sent to the front. These are the times for a man to make a name."

I could not refrain.

"Make a name!" repeated I; "a name just big enough to be sent home in a despatch as 'killed.'"

My face was hot, and my fingers twisted within each other. How could I utter such mean words? I would sooner be annihilated altogether than have a man, a friend of mine too, even seem to dream of acting as my words apparently desired.

Mrs. Barlowe's black eyes transfixed me. Her mouth was open as if to speak, but she did not speak; something seemed to have struck her with surprise; she even ceased tearing the list from the flannel.

"Well-a-day!" said she as slowly as an exclamation could be made to come.

At that moment one of her maids called her away, and I was free to go likewise.

I was rising from my seat, when a shadow came between me and the midday sun. Peter Farre was coming through the open window; he was wearing the cinnamon coat in which I had first seen him—he was a stranger then, not a stranger now.

"Where are you going?" asked I. That cinnamon coat generally meant riding off for some long hours; besides, he had the unmistakable, alert, somewhat restless air of a journey upon him. "Not Bardene again?"

"No; the horse is well enough—well enough for some good stiff work to-day. Here's a letter forwarded by my father by special messenger. I got it half an hour ago."

"Well!" He stood silent, so I forced out that one word.

"It is an order to join at once. I must post up to London. Clare, you have saved me from acting like a poltroon. I should have never dared look you in the face if I had sold out; now I shall dare—I shall hope."

"I never was so glad, Peter," burst in Mrs. Barlowe. "The doctor has just told me. Really, I beg your pardon, my boy, for I was just saying to Clare that you were 'unsatisfactory.' 'Unsatisfactory,' indeed. I really don't suppose I ever meant it. Everyone says this will be a glorious campaign. We shall all be quite proud. Clare, say we shall all be proud."

But I did not say it; for that matter I did not say anything, but just stood still and let everyone else talk, for the doctor and all came pouring in, and they made much fuss of saying, "good-bye." We all went to see Peter Farre mount and ride away.

After that the May was soon ended, and the sunshine grew hotter, and the flowers were every day more and more plentiful. I was past sixteen too, and naturally with that fell out of many of my childish ways. Aunt really once told me she "had hopes of me."

We all—that is, all our acquaintances in and about Hayleigh—fell into our customary ways, and the merrymakings which had been got up in honour of the rectory visitor were all over, with no like gaieties giving promise of imitating them.

There came war news from time to time, and I, we all, naturally were on the qui vive to learn what was done and what was not done. This interest in national fighting had, of course, existed just as hotly before, but I suppose it was from my childishness that I had not until then looked upon the realities of war as being actual events which must touch so many hundreds living in their country homes at ease.

We at Hayleigh were all "at ease," but now all at once it became to my older eyes, or rather older heart, quite a different, nay, a much more real matter.

One day there came word of an expected battle. It was rumour which brought the news, and, like many other similar rumours, it was fading away through the circumstance of our far distance from the metropolis, when aunt got a letter, franked by her cousin, Sir Owen Burke.

The rumour was true—there had been a great battle, a momentous victory. And Hayleigh bells clanged forth, and bonfires were lit wherever men could get together litter and stuff that would burn.

When that loud clang of the church-bells began, I ran out of the house and away to the woods upon the low hills. I had one good cry for a minute—it was only a little thing, and Peter Farre and I had agreed that women may cry for "little" things.

Days and days went by, and the country was glad. We heard of one and another village home that was not glad, seeing that one and another lad was lost by the war to Hayleigh.

Days and days—how long they were! A time came when—when one of us would have given a whole life to have lengthened that weary tarrying.

An official despatch was sent by Sir Peter Farre to the rectory. One read therein, "Peter Hillyard Farre, captain, killed."

How many names came before and after his! Ah me, war is dreadful!

Mrs. Barlowe had wished that he should make a name. Here was the making!

CHAPTER IV.

AFTER that, we at Hayleigh again seemed to drift out of much care for public affairs. Something, too, seemed to spoil what was left of the summer. At The Chase we had certainly plenty to think of which kept our thoughts occupied and our hearts careful enough.

Miles came home from Charterhouse. He was just a year older than I was, and a fine tall stripling. He burst upon us full of brilliancy, of ardour, of sure and perfect success. He broke up our monotony; father had fallen into some strange dulness, and pained me by treating me tenderly, instead of as the daughter of good fellowship I always had been to him. Miles was like new life; the good old times seemed to come back with him.

He was crowned with honours, too. He would be the head Carthusian when he should go back. One year more, and then—it was as we four sat over dessert on the first night of his coming home that he fairly broached the subject of what he wished to make of his future.

"You'll like a year or two at college. I had it myself, though I'm afraid Greek and Latin would soon cry havoc over me now. But you are finer stuff than I am, my boy. You'll do more than I did," so began my father.

Miles was the apple of Aunt Clare's eye.

"I do not see, brother," said she, "that you need fall into such a habit of depreciating yourself. Miles can stand on his own good advantages, and yet you be worthy enough. Times alter, and Miles will go with the times." She straightened her tall figure, and throwing back her head slightly, as spectacled folk do, looked with prophetic satisfaction at Miles.

"I hope he will not go with the new-fangled notions of the times, and play ducks and drakes with the land, that is all I have to say," cheerily remonstrated father. "The place is no worse now than my father left it to me. I've stuck to the old plans."

"Why, father, you've drained the whole of the Holt Farm, and," I nodded sideways to him, "what about those cottages?"

"They were unnecessary—hem, yes. But what was I to do? Miles won't blame me for letting the creatures have a whole roof over their heads. Less for him to do when he comes to it—eh, lad? As for the Holt, it's worth a pretty penny more now than it was."

"And Miles is to have the odium of raising the rent," put in aunt, with an eye to business, and yet to popularity for Miles.

"You say nothing, Miles," I burst in. "What are you dreaming of? I believe you like Latin better than land. Confess now."

The lad looked up with that quiet expression of his. It was the look that made him so much more like our mother than I could be.

"Miles will have interests beyond agriculture," loftily answered aunt for him. "A landowner may have in the future many responsibilities beyond his own acres. Why should he not go up to Parliament? Why should he not?"

"You are talking as I remember they talked about me," said my father, "but I never did any more than just manage to be squire. A pretty handful, too."

"I am afraid I shall disappoint you, Aunt Clare," Miles began in his bright, pleasant way ; " I do not feel the least ambition towards political life."

" And why not ? Have you ambition at all ? I doubt it. You must not drop into—" For a second she hesitated. " You must—"

" Shall I say what is my great wish ?" Miles stopped her. " I have thought it over, father, for I would be sure of myself, and I always come to the same ending. You will send me to college," the boy spoke meditatively, and yet with the pink flush of excited hope on his cheek that for all its manly down was so fair, " that I know. But you send me there to make me an educated squire," a merry twinkle came into his frank eyes ; " I am for going beyond that. I wish to take orders—to be a clergyman."

" Eh, ha ! what's that ? Haymans never went beyond squires."

" Beyond, indeed !" retorted aunt. " Miles might go as far ' beyond ' as ever he chooses. He'll not go far if his notion is to be rector of Hayleigh and squire all in one."

Aunt Clare was strict even to the narrowness of extreme conventionalism in her going to church, but we never looked upon her as a religious woman beyond the formal religiousness of Sunday. Father was different ; had he not married our mother, a rector's daughter ? Now, aunt's tone of voice showed that her ambition for Miles was feeling itself sorely disappointed by his desire.

She took off her spectacles, wiped them, set them on her nose again, and looked at him enquiringly.

" And why that ?" she asked.

Miles's face flushed red with dislike at speaking his innermost thoughts. Then suddenly with a plunge and with the hot hurry of his young enthusiasm he cried :

" Is it not the highest a man can do ? I cannot say when I first began to wish it, it is a part of me—my calling, I suppose," his voice fell as if in reverence. " You do not ask me to give it up, father ?"

Father gulped down his port wine hurriedly, and grew somewhat redder in the face.

" Can't say, can't say," he nervously said ; " comes by nature, I suppose—eh, lad ? You bring your birthright before me sharply. She, your mother—she had almost died for you, lad—said, ' Should we not give him to the Lord ? ' We'll see, we'll see. Come and talk it over in the garden, children ; we don't want any more of this," looking over the polished table with the desert upon it.

So we three went off to the garden, and we talked ; but things came about us in the time that closely followed which seemed as if, however much all the world might agree with Miles in his lofty and holy desire, that desire was not to find its fulfilment.

After all, Miles was still but a boy, and one day, having their holidays together, he and the rectory boys went boating on the River Nene. They upset their boat, and Miles came very near drowning. However, of this last we knew nothing until the following day, when he was taken with intense shivering, which only ceased to become a raging fever.

He was leeches and was tended night and day by Aunt Clare and nurse. I did the little they would permit ; but for weeks we all supposed that ambition of either the worldly or heavenly sort was over for him on this earth.

It was autumn before he could be said to be well, and even then strength was gone from him so far that, though we never hinted so much to each other, we each felt and feared that he inherited more than our mother's delicacy of constitution.

However, by waiting things grew better and mended so far that he began to think again of the future and of study.

He could never go back to Charterhouse, but he could have a tutor at home. Therefore, as soon as Christmas was passed, this tutor came, and made another in our household at The Chase.

It was a very good Christmas. You see, we had been anxious and weighed down for so long about Miles's health, that the season's gaiety came like a tonic into our spirits seeing that he too could be gay with us.

The country, too, had peace, and so many of the country houses were rejoicing in the home-coming of such brothers and cousins who were soldiers, that an unusual number of entertainments were given.

It was a mixed gladness, however, when one saw, as I did, at the county ball, so many bright uniforms flit past me. I could not help thinking of—of my friend.

However, any thoughts of that sort had to remain thoughts, and I had to go out like the rest. I may as well say it, for I do not think overmuch vanity lurks behind the truth—that Squire Hayman's daughter, even I, the " hoyden," as aunt had once called me, was not the last of the girls to be sought in these gay doings.

I was not blind, and truly I did my best to push it away from me, but I seemed altogether weak and powerless. I said my sharpest things, and I put on my most careless ways. I even tried to be haughty, and distant, and cool ; it was all of no use. I suppose I could not alter myself, and that I had not altogether lost a sort of childishness, though I was far on past sixteen—nearly seventeen,

The end came one morning.

The hounds met on our lawn. Colonel Bolsover had ridden over to breakfast with us. I do not know how the opportunity came—he asked me to marry him.

Ah me ! I was covered with shame and confusion of face. Love ! how could I love ?

I do not remember what I said, or how I said it ; he was kindly, and a true man, he left me to myself.

But it could not end so.

My father was told, and aunt was told, and the Colonel came again. Came many times, but he could not win me ; how could he ?

That was the difficulty. I could give no reason. I had no story to tell, no dream to put into words. Had not my dream been quenched in death ?

In those days the guardians of young girls were wont to be harder than they are nowadays, and for a girl to rebel and unreasonably to refuse marriage with so noble and eligible a man as was Colonel Bolsover was to merit domestic discipline.

Poor father did not know it. Miles was busy with his books. I had no mother, there was only aunt ; and aunt saw fit that I should become Mistress Bolsover—nay, I believe she thought in her heart that the good Colonel's two brothers would die, and would leave him with an earldom. No one knew, as I have said, but nevertheless, it came to be true that I was kept in durance vile. Locked in my room, apportioned only some limited and plain food, set to sewing-tasks which my soul abhorred.

Aunt did it thinking it was for my good ; it only strengthened my poor faded dream into new life. I grew—sitting up in my room at work, or with my hands folded before me as the daylight faded—to imagine all sorts of impossible hopes out of the chances of war.

Folly ! folly ! Could a man be lying on the battlefield all these long months ? Could there still be a prisoner held back when all were exchanged ?

But at night and morning father saw me, and petted me, and pinched my white cheeks, and, I know, wished often enough that he had his " hoyden " Clare back again. For I was very proud, and sooner than condescend to complain of my daily imprisonment and toil, would not mind how pinched and pale I became.

Every day I said the same to myself—I could not change ; I could not marry. Marry ! with no love in my heart ! The thought was a shame.

But it was weary living—weary to sit and sew all day alone ; weary never to go out over the crisp fields and gardens, to have no books, to know nothing all day but the four walls of my room.

At last, one day, I cried, and the show of tears was on my face when father saw me at dinner.

CHAPTER V.

WHEN dinner was over, he carried me off into his study—the room where all the bookshelves were, and where his guns and whips and squire-like treasures were ; where he did his accounts, saw the steward, and had magisterial conclave with Dr. Barlowe and other county magnates ; where, in sooth, he was free from domestic rules and punctiliousness as these things were personified in aunt.

" Now, little one," began he, " we must end this troublesome business."

The " little one " was a loving term of old days. His tall, proud daughter bowed beneath the sound of the tender words. I fairly fell upon his neck and burst into tears.

The tears soon ended. I was so tired, or I would not have let them come.

" Is it always the same, Clare—my daughter ?"

" Quite the same, father ; the same, so far as my feelings go," I answered in the fullest stretch of pride. " But I am weary of all this. You can do as you wish. If he likes to content himself with a wife who cares naught for—"

" Hush, hush, Clare !" The old man was terrified at my hardness. His happy experience had never shown him marriage under such a guise as this. " So good a man, so honourable, so—"

" Yes, I know, father. But still, it must be ended, as you say." I stood before him in utter carelessness, all the rebellion beaten out of me.

A loud ring pealed through the house.

My face flushed, then I grew cold as ice, and my very knees trembled beneath me. My fancies and imaginations had taken so strong a hold upon me that the maddest possibilities were flashing through my brain and heart.

" Colonel Bolsover, sir."

The words were scarcely out of Baines's lips than the Colonel strode in. He was in evening-dress, but had thrown over this a thick, furred soldier's cloak. He had ridden fast. Bolsover Place was ten miles away.

He bowed low before me, seeming to start for a moment at sight of my tear-washed face; then, with true gentlemanhood, ignoring all but courtly deference of manner.

Truly I was sorry that I could not give to so noble a man his desire.

"You are a magistrate, Mr. Hayman; will you come over to take a man's deposition?"

"My good sir, won't the morning do?"

"If law and public authorities will go to work on hearsay that we can jot down. I know none of the names, but it is some story a man of mine wants to get told. He is one of the last prisoners sent back. He came in yesterday, starved, and in rags; how he found me out I know not; at any rate he is not long for life, and the odds and ends of his speech tend to show something of more importance than we private folks can take the responsibility of. He is an old soldier of mine, a staunch, reliable man. His wits are worn by hardship; but there is a persistent idea running through all he says. Will you come?"

"Seems I must," my father made a comical grimace. "Ten miles—a stiffish road, too."

He went off, shouting to Baines for mufflers, and boots, and coats all in a breath.

I was alone with this unwelcome lover of mine. Could I help it if he made use of this chance of speaking?

And I—I was so weary, I was so careless. I answered him as I had answered my father: if he was content to take so cold a wife I would no longer say him nay.

My heart smote me when, my father coming back, the Colonel took my hand and led me forward in his noble, gallant way, saying: "This is the proudest moment of my life."

I was in bed; I am sure I had not been asleep when I heard the clatter of my father's and the groom's horses over the hard stones of the courtyard when they came home.

The next day all the world, our little world, knew that I was to be Mistress Bolsover.

But it was not until evening that the Colonel came. We did not know why he was not at The Chase to dinner. Aunt waited a full half-hour for him, which piece of procrastination I never knew her endure willingly before.

Aunt had sailed in all the majesty of her thickest taffety robe out of the dining-room, when the expected ring was heard rousing every dog about the place. I tarried behind with my father, and Miles, and Mr. Erskine the tutor, feeling by some instinct that the chintz parlour would be the room sought by the visitor, that being aunt's and my usual resort. I was rebellious still.

I was mistaken, and he came in to my father.

After the first greetings, he fell to talking of the matter which had detained him.

"Richards was so surely dying, that I could not leave him."

"Mere wool-gathering, sir—mere wool-gathering," said my father somewhat shortly. "What are you going to make out of it all? Nothing, that I see. Clare, child, go to thy silks and tambour-work, we'll be with thee anon."

But there was a reality of the outer world, the world of wars and fighting men hanging on my lover's lips, and I would fain linger.

"We can learn no more than we have learnt now," Colonel Bolsover spoke on, unheeding me, it seemed. "Richards is dead, but there came more vehemence into his speech at the last. Laverne is clearly the name of the place—the castle where he was."

"He and the army of officers and men! My good sir, is there any sense in supposing that there are so many still held in bondage?"

"I do not know; there are no sure means of knowing. Truly, I hope not, if their treatment is to be like what Richards has endured. But I shall go to the Horse Guards and report, that is plain duty."

"What have you to go on? Are you going to send an army out to this Laverne? waste more blood over—you say yourself, perhaps only a handful of bones!" Father turned and saw me. "Clare," said he, and I never before heard his voice so hard to me, "hie thee away. This is no talk for a discreet maiden's ear."

I had to obey, but I held the door unlatched, and I tarried outside.

"It may be so, sir. I do not deny it. But we have some names now, all men of my own, too—Clarkson and Farre, Captains; Corporal Dennis. A big lever must be used to get at them, living or dead!"

What did I hear? Farre, Captain?

The only thing I heard more at that time was the jangle of the brass door-handle against the brass-plate enclosing the lock. My hand had been upon it, and I suppose my hold was helplessly loosing itself in a faint.

Miles told me afterwards that he and the Colonel found me on the floor in a dead swoon, and carried me up to my bed.

After that Colonel Bolsover went up to London, and then he came back, and affairs concerning my marriage came to be the great and sole topics of the household. There was no reason for hindering his wishes, and what was any part of it to me?

I had given my word, and I must not depart from it. Methinks I was no gay and gladsome bride, however. The sheen of silk and satin was no pleasure to my eyes, though I was so young—not seventeen yet; but I set myself to wear a haughty and cold front to everyone I saw.

I felt myself every day growing more into the semblance of Aunt Clare; once I overheard her tell my father that "she was pleased to see me mending my ways; there was some dignity about Clare, some—"

May had come again. On the morrow I should be seventeen, one week hence I should have become a wife. The fair spring sunshine was exactly like I remembered it to have been the year before; the snow of the May-flowers was melting from the hedges, and roses would be coming soon. I wandered out, and the hot afternoon sun found me in the long meadow-grass where I and the stranger had met a year ago.

Before I had been there long Colonel Bolsover came out to me. His noble face was shining with a glad light; it was not long before I heard the cause of this.

He had had a post from London, and the story of Richards was all true. Prisoners had been held back at a château called Laverne in the mountains. It was all as bad as he had said, but they were released, and—posts in those days were little more fleet than ordinary travelling—they were in England.

He held my hand within his arm as he told me this. I suppose he felt some trembling of my fingers, for suddenly he looked down into my face.

Alack, alack! I could not help myself. As we, Peter Farre and I, had said once, "tears did not come over great woes"; mine, which had rarely been shed in the many past months, were pouring forth now.

I had forgotten—forgotten that my own deed had set me as far away as death had seemed to put me from my love; I had forgotten everything, except that the Captain Farre of my lover's regiment was my—my—yes, my stranger friend.

I could not help it. I rushed with all my old impulse to speak and show the whole truth. I have no faintest memory of what my words were, I only know that all my coldness, all my dignity fell from off me, and in the end I found myself kneeling on the sunny summer grass praying him to forgive me.

For truly I had need of great forgiveness, having shown so great a contemning of a noble man.

Two days after—I had been freed since that burst of mine out in the meadow—we three, Colonel Bolsover, Peter Farre, and I, were walking over the gardens in the pale, long, spring twilight.

That morning had the Colonel brought my "friend" back to me—surely heroes have not yet died from off the face of the earth!

Riding post to and from London was to this man what he saw to be the duty of his manhood—what could we two ever do to show him our gratitude and our love?

Yes, he had my love—my second-best love now and always.

You see, he was not a young man. I did my best. I—Peter Farre and I—had gone out to him when we saw him strolling along alone.

"May we come and walk with you?" I asked, and my voice naturally fell low. "We have so much to tell you—Peter has so much to tell you."

I had laid my hand on his arm. He put his own above it, and said:

"My child, yes." Those words came very quietly; then he lifted his head, and went on heartily: "That is just what I was thinking. Farre, come, begin. Let us hear all the romance of travel."

"Not much romance, Colonel," answered Farre, "but rather some very unpleasant realities."

"Well, let us hear some of them; or, I suppose, the future is more to the fancy of this dainty lady than the past. What are you going to do with your two selves? You'll get a long leave if you apply for it; why don't you?"

"Shall we, Clare?"

And in this way we went strolling along, as I have said, while the sweet long twilight began and ended.

In a very few weeks a marriage did take place at Hayleigh Church, and, after that, Peter and I went wandering about the country in a long honeymoon. Miles went up to Oxford for his first term, carrying Mr. Erskine with him.

In coming years, and while my father was still squire at The Chase, Miles became rector, and Aunt Clare had to succumb before her nephew's more worthy ambition. Another prophetic notion of hers, however, did see its fulfilment, for Colonel Bolsover was the Earl of X—, and, I am glad to say, had a Countess with whom to share his honours.

(Concluded.—Commenced in No. 154.)

There.

THERE the warm sunset sank,
Over the sea;
There the light wavelets broke,
There the low breezes spoke,
There the eve's magic woke,
Rapture for both of us,
You, love, and me.

There the grey morning rose,
Over the sea;
There the thick raindrops fell,
There the wind's moaning swell,
Murmured, farewell, farewell!
Sorrow for both of us,
You, love, and me.

There the gay noontide shines
Glittering yet;
There we once vowed and wept;
There grief on gladness crept;
Have you the record kept?
Mem'ries for both of us,
For—I forget.

Doris Hazlewood.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

CHAPTER I.

"GUESS what I have got for you, Nellie?" said John Bowden in a cheery voice as he joined his niece, who was sauntering in the garden, book in hand.

"A very, very charming story?"

"No."

"A tiny white dog, like a ball of ice-wool?"

"No."

"I never could guess anything," replied the girl a little wearily, "but I know that it is something I shall be glad to have."

"You have been a little dull lately, and—"

"Have you found me dull, uncle?" asked the girl a little eagerly.

"Well, my dear, I can't say I did until Mrs. Ponsonby called my attention to the subject, and then it seemed to me that you were not quite as bright as usual."

"Mrs. Ponsonby has not seen me for weeks."

"Ah, then she must have heard of you, and I have seen for myself that you are a little pale, and I quite agree with her that you need somebody young with you. I am away long hours, and am not very amusing at the best of times. You want cheering, so I have got you a companion, Nellie; a miracle of cleverness, who will take interest in all your little feminine pursuits, and keep you merry all day long."

"Thank you, uncle, but I do not know that I shall quite like it; wouldn't it be something like having a governess?"

"No, not at all;" and Mr. Bowden paused to consider what it would be like; "more like a playfellow, only you are too old for play. I think, Nellie, you must consider her a guest who is charitably disposed to do her best to amuse and please you."

"An excellent guest, uncle. And what is her name, and where does she come from?"

"Her name is a very pretty one—Doris Hazlewood, and she has been some time with Mrs. Ponsonby, who parts with her because she thinks she will be such an immense acquisition to me."

"How very kind of her!"

"It is kind, Nellie; I might have looked far and wide for a suitable person, and failed to find one at last."

"We do very well as we are;" and she put her arm through his, and leant in a caressing way upon his shoulder.

He kissed her and called her his darling.

"You heap kindnesses upon me. You are too good."

"I cannot do too much for you; you are my niece, and all that I have to love. I wish I could take the same care of the little one over the seas."

At this wish, the face that had been beaming with affection and kindness, turned sad and solemn.

"That may happen yet," she answered softly.

"It is a foolish hope, and yet I cling to it. Show me the roses, Nellie; we are going to be merry and put away retrospection."

And they went to look at the first full-blown blossoms of the season, and took pride in their beauty.

James Bowden was chief banker of Littlepool; his forefathers had been bankers there for many generations, and it troubled him to think that a time must come when the town would have no banker of that name. He had neither son nor nephew, his only relations were two nieces—Ellen Bowden, his brother's child, and the unknown girl far away.

He had come into the world in the banking-house itself, a substantial, roomy old mansion in the high-street of Littlepool, where his grandfather had lived all his life, and which his father had made his home, as a matter of course, as soon as he became head of the business.

As a young man he had moved with his father into the suburb, and when he himself married he went a little farther towards the country, and some years later, for the benefit of his delicate wife, he had taken a beautiful place five miles from the town.

When he himself became sole possessor of the old-established bank, there was no thought of his going to live in the old house; times had changed, and it was then considered only a suitable residence for his chief clerk.

He knew everybody of any standing in Littlepool, and many of the county families; but his wife's weak health had prevented his going into society, or receiving friends at home, except upon the rarest occasions. And when he had recovered from the sorrow of losing her, his habits of reserve and seclusion were so confirmed that he lacked inclination and energy to break through them. It seemed so natural to him for Nellie and himself to be alone, that it had never struck him that the life was too dull for her, and when Mrs. Ponsonby made him aware of the fact, he felt a guilty sense of having failed in his duty to the girl, and hastened to repair his error at once, and thought himself most fortunate that the person who had pointed out the evil could supply the remedy.

The housekeeper was an important person in the banker's household, because she had been a devoted attendant on his deceased wife, and there was a kindly etiquette in force among the inmates of the mansion that she should be specially informed of any approaching event. So after dinner Ellen went to tell her of the coming of her companion.

"It is a good notion," said the old woman, "I'll not gainsay that, for we are all a bit aged for company to a young thing like you, but I had rather the young lady had come recommended by anyone than Mrs. Ponsonby. She do have a way of passing on to her friends people she wants to get rid of."

"Oh, don't say that!"

"It is true, Miss Ellen. That coachman your uncle took to please her, had such a dry throat that he was always stupid, trying to moisten it with drink, and was barely fit to drive a pig, let alone your uncle's beautiful horses; and the housemaid she passed on to the rector's wife wasn't all she might have been by a long way."

"You quite frighten me, nurse," Nellie said, with a little feint of alarm.

"I do not wish to do that," she replied gravely; she always understood words in their extreme literalness. "There isn't anybody who isn't right sometimes, and Mrs. Ponsonby may be right about this companion; but I know her little ways—mean, I call them, but then, I suppose, I don't look at things as ladies do."

A few days later Doris Hazlewood arrived in Mrs. Ponsonby's carriage alone. That lady had promised to come with her and introduce her to Ellen, but, instead, sent a perfumed little note pleading unexpected hindrance. Ellen read the honied phrases of excuse, and then went down to meet the stranger, feeling just a little nervous.

She found a pretty, graceful girl, a few years older than herself, looking at photographs, who in response to her gentle words of welcome said:

"I am very glad to come, and hope that I shall be able to make myself agreeable to you—useful, I believe, should be the word, but I must frankly admit, Miss Bowden, that I am not a useful person."

"There is nothing for you to do," replied candid Nellie. "My uncle and myself consider you our guest, and hope that you will be comfortable."

"Certainly I shall; but I have duties, and the chief among them is to bring back the roses to your cheeks. You have been pining."

Doris made a scarcely perceptible pause on the word, and Ellen blushed, and the speaker continued:

"Pining for want of companionship of young people. Please to regard me as the representative of young people. I will try to have as various moods as possible, so that I may seem many girls, though I am only one."

"Thank you," said Nellie, feeling that an answer was expected, and not knowing what to say.

"I must learn your tastes, Miss Bowden. Do you like girls to be sad, merry, or demure?"

"I like them to be exactly what they are."

"But some are very chameleons for changing."

"I doubt if I could ever much like those," said Nellie; "but will you let me show you your room?"

The two girls went together to the handsome chamber that was prepared for Miss Hazlewood. It opened into the little room that was Ellen's special domain, and where all her pet belongings were gathered—the gifts of her uncle and aunt, and the treasured relics of her father and mother.

After giving a glance of satisfaction round her own room, Doris looked into this.

"What a pretty woman!" she said, catching sight of the picture of a lady. Ellen courteously invited her to enter, and as she stood gazing at the face, said:

"That is my uncle's sister."

A few minutes later Doris was in her own chamber, looking in the glass.

"I am very like her," she thought; "when I looked at her I seemed to be gazing at myself."

She pushed her hair more off her forehead, and saw that the likeness was increased. When she came downstairs her coiffure was arranged much after the fashion of that of the portrait.

"I am so glad I have a little time to make friends with you before your father comes home."

"My uncle," suggested Nellie.

"Your uncle, of course. I have a bad habit of saying one word for another. Mrs. Ponsonby has told me so much of his liberality and kindness that I quite long to know him."

"You will soon do so," replied Ellen simply.

She loved and revered her uncle, but she could not praise him to a stranger.

Doris went back to the subject of Mrs. Ponsonby. She had much to say of the doings of that lady; she had travelled with her, had been at her London house, had looked on at one or two of her great receptions, and had been taken to a fancy ball, dressed as Queen Mary.

"How very kind of her!" cried Ellen.

"I doubt the kindness. I think she liked to show me off as a part of her establishment. It is not every great lady who has a dependent who makes up well as the unfortunate Mary. She said my hair and my eyes were just the right colour. I am sure I don't know why."

"They are very pretty," said Nellie, looking with shy criticism at the graceful head.

"Pretty! I do so hate the word. I should like to be beautiful, or great, or famous. Should not you?"

"I am well content as I am," Ellen said quietly. Afterwards she remembered, with a little surprise, that, much as Doris had said about Mrs. Ponsonby and herself, she had mentioned nothing from which Ellen could deduce how long she had known that lady, how she had become introduced to her, or where and how she had lived previously. It was curious that so much personal gossip should have revealed nothing of the speaker's antecedents. Ellen was not inquisitive about her companion, but it struck her as odd that so much candour should really reveal so little.

The banker greeted with grave kindness the stranger who had come to dwell under his roof, and the three were soon quite sociable together; and before the evening was over he told himself that the house was much brighter for the new comer's presence. She could sing, play, paint a little, take a hand at whist; she knew something more than the moves of chess, and was strong at backgammon, the banker's favourite game. In fact, as she said herself, beginning with a smile and ending almost with a tear: "I am jack-of-all-trades and master of none—a bad position for a poor orphan."

Mr. Bowden's voice and manner were very tender, as he asked her to walk in the garden before it was dark, to see the roses; he had great compassion for orphans, and always felt that they had a great claim upon him. Ellen, too, was touched, and took an early opportunity of whispering, "I am so sorry for you," and was momentarily repelled when Doris gave her a look that said, "I cannot understand;" but she quickly remembered, and, with warm pressure of Ellen's hand, whispered back:

"I thank you so much. I knew you were very sympathetic."

A few days later Doris was again standing before the picture of the fair lady as Ellen entered the room. "You admire her so much," she said.

"I am deeply interested in her," and there was a look of grave thoughtfulness on Doris's face that pleased Ellen, who had a liking for gravity and steadfastness.

"Hers was a sad story: she married in opposition to her friends, and, when her husband quite failed to get on in England, the little family emigrated. And many years later, when she was a widow and coming to Europe, thinking to do better for herself and her little girl, she was drowned."

"Poor mother!" sighed Doris. "And what became of the child?"

"She was saved with a few of the passengers."

"And—"

"That is all I know," replied Ellen.

"She is your cousin, and her mother your uncle's sister, and that is all you know," said Doris indignantly.

"Yes; uncle tried all means to get information, but we have never heard anything more of her."

In a few weeks Doris Hazlewood had won her way into all hearts but one.

The prejudiced housekeeper gave her warm allegiance, praised her wise sayings and her respect for those older than herself, taught her to make a syllabub, and permitted her to peep into her famous book where recipes and newspaper-cuttings were pasted indiscriminately. The crotchety gardener, with whose views on the grafting of roses she fully agreed, thought her over sensible for a woman, and the other servants declared her beautiful and sweet-mannered. The banker was delighted with her, and looked upon her presence as a great gain. In the first days of her coming, he had felt that there was something about her that was familiar to him, and as time passed this sensation grew upon him, until he sometimes inadvertently spoke as if they had known each other for years. Perhaps this feeling was due to her marked resemblance to the portrait of his sister, of which circumstance he was entirely unconscious.

Ellen admired Doris, and had much good-will towards her; but her faith in her was weak. She noted discrepancies of statement that were more than carelessness, as they never occurred except for obvious reasons; and her swift changes from mirth to sadness were distasteful to her. She likened the girl's soul to shallow water stirred to its depths by a pebble, so easily was it moved; and she knew that she had liked best the old days when she was alone. She was a little sad mostly, and sometimes, when Doris was chatting brightly to her uncle, her mind would wander to some bygone pleasantness, and suddenly she would be startled by the deep pathos of her companion's voice as she made some reference to the past, that inferred that it was too sorrowful to be spoken about. And then the banker would grow retrospective, and, recalling the misery caused by unforgiving hearts in the years gone by, would urge the girls, if ever they quarrelled with anyone, to hasten to make up differences, lest it should be too late for reconciliation. He, too, would be silent, and Nellie sorry, well knowing that he was bitterly regretting his harshness to his sister; but she could not comfort him. She was too shy, with Doris looking on, to put her arms round his neck and kiss him, as she would have done in former times. He missed her gentle caress, and fancied that she was growing less fond of him.

Once Doris was standing before the picture that had so singular an attraction for her, when she said abruptly to Ellen:

"Do you want to find your cousin?"

"My uncle would be delighted to have her safe here."

"But you yourself, I mean; do you want her?"

Ellen hesitated; the coming of one stranger had not increased her happiness.

"Ah, you do not; you are jealous of her." And Doris turned away with a gesture of contempt.

Ellen felt herself to be very wicked and uncharitable, and wondered if somebody who had danced with her in the winter at Mrs. Ponsonby's, and had shown a very kind interest in her when he made several calls upon her uncle in the spring, had looked deep into her heart and seen the evil dormant there. If so, she would never regret that he had left her, without saying the words whose meaning she seemed to have read in his eyes. To see blame or regret in his face would be sorrow indeed; better far never more to meet.

CHAPTER II.

ONE afternoon the girls were drawing in the morning-room. The door-windows were wide open. Sward, and path, and flowers, for some distance, were in soft shadow, but beyond, the golden sunlight was full upon tree, plant, and blossom, making more distinctive and brilliant their various forms and colours. The sky was deeply blue; no bird sang, only the bees hummed drowsily. A gentle wind swayed the branches of the trees, and wafted sweet scents into the quiet room.

The banker entered, saying:

"How pretty and how comfortable you look, girls. How I wish the other little one was with you."

Doris rose from her chair a little pale, and said:

"Is your desire so very earnest to know her?"

"I would give my right hand," replied the banker fervently.

"Then look at me. I am Dorothy Haslemere;" and she stood before him calm and resolute. "Am I not like my mother, your sister? Look well at me. Am I not the image of her portrait? Compare me with it. Are not her eyes mine, her hair mine, her mouth mine, her form mine, even to the pose of her head and the folding of her hands?" And she stood before him the exact presentment of the portrait. "Does not your sight recognise the resemblance, the identity; your heart feel it; your mind acknowledge it? They do, Uncle James. You have felt always that you had known someone like me in the past. I have seen that in your glance. And we have never been as strangers to each other, the unknown kinship was too strong for that."

"Dorothy!" cried the old man.

"You see your sister in me. You acknowledge me as her child," she said with grave earnestness.

"I do. My heart has done so already, I think, Dolly;" and he opened his arms, and as he kissed the face that rested on his bosom two tears fell upon it, and he knew that the love for his sister that had been dammed up in his heart would rush out on her child in a flood.

With his arm still round Doris, Mr. Bowden said:

"Nellie, do you not welcome your cousin?"

The girl was partly stupefied by what she had heard and seen, and by the startling rapidity of the change in their relations to each other. She rose and moved slowly towards her uncle as he stood proudly holding Dorothy's hand. Her face was void of intelligence as that of a sleepwalker.

"I wish you joy, Doris," she said in monotonous voice.

"Kiss her," said the banker.

Nellie coldly touched with her lips the cheek that was turned towards her, then went back to her seat.

"Have you anything of your mother's, Dorothy?" His voice seemed to linger caressingly on the name so long unspoken.

"Do you forget the wreck, uncle? The 'Orion' carried to the bottom of the sea, as well as my dear mother, all her treasures, all the little mementoes of her childhood, of her lost husband. All his letters and yours."

"Mine!"

"Yes; you were kind once. She talked to me often of you, and treasured a few loving letters. She had destroyed the cruel ones—those you wrote just before she left England, when you refused to see her or listen to her prayers for reconciliation."

"I know, and I regret it; but I sent her the money that she needed."

"Yes, money; you sent her money when she wanted love." And the girl stood aloof from him, beautiful in her scorn. "She hated the loveless gift, but she used it for the sake of her husband and her child. She would have starved rather than have touched it for herself, but for us she sacrificed her just pride. The dearest wish of her heart was to return it to you. And it was mine. I have hoped that when we met I should come to you with it in my hands, but they are empty, uncle," and she extended the beautiful pink palms towards him with exquisite dramatic action.

"Thank Heaven!" he said. "I could not have my money thrown back to me."

"I have worked hard to do it. I respected my mother's pride."

"Spare me, Dorothy. I too have suffered."

"You have not been poor and alone in a strange land, but," she continued with sudden softness, "you have repented of your harshness. I have witnessed your remorse, else were I Doris Hazlewood still. And you have hungered to give to the child all the affection you denied her mother, so, uncle, I stand revealed to you as Dorothy Haslemere."

"My sister to the life," he said, "but with more spirit and force."

There was exultation in his words.

"Yes, I could not be crushed, extinguished like my mother. It is my hard life that has made me different; sorrow and endurance have made me strong."

"I sought eagerly for you, Dorothy; I would have sheltered you from all grief and trouble had it been possible. I wanted you."

"And I have striven to come to you, and my will is strong. For years my mind looked straight to this meeting, but I meant to come to blame, and, uncle, I am come to love."

"And be loved," he said, as the tender affection in her eyes thrilled him to the heart.

At this moment Nellie's head, which had been resting upon her hands, fell to the table with a dull thud. She had fainted.

Uncle and niece went to her.

"She is jealous," said Dorothy; "yet she has had all your love hitherto, and might spare me a little now."

The old man was startled. How thin and ghastly the girl looked! She was his cherished darling, but in the joy of finding the lost he had forgotten her.

They laid her on a couch, and bathed her hands and face with water. The banker would have called the housekeeper, but Dorothy said it was better not. And presently Nellie opened frightened eyes that grew calm as they rested on her uncle.

"You are better, pet? It is the heat," he said.

"Yes, the heat," Nellie answered languidly, and Dorothy fanned her with a screen of peacock's feathers.

Later, Dorothy told her uncle that a lady—the only one saved from the wreck—took her to France with her, and befriended her until she died. Then, always full of the intention of seeing her uncle without his knowing her for his relative, she called herself Doris Hazlewood, and got a situation as English governess to some little children, and very gladly accepted Mrs. Ponsonby's offer to engage her as companion when chance led to her meeting that lady in Paris. Her mother had often spoken to her of Littlepool, and it was with great delight that she learned that Mrs. Ponsonby had a residence near it, at which she occasionally resided.

Dorothy had a way of referring to kind things said of her uncle by her mother that made him feel that he ought to do very much for her to make amends for his neglect of his sister. So he made her rich presents, and in the access of generosity, prompted by some remark of her mother about his liberal home and open hand that she had remembered opportunely, he bought a pony carriage for her use and Nellie's.

Dorothy drove well, as she did most things, and by right of her few additional years, took the lead in the house, and Ellen became a person of little importance. The girl subsided into her changed position quietly. Her uncle would have been indignant if anyone had said that he loved or considered her less than before, but the brilliant Dorothy was always ready to amuse him, and put herself so easily and persistently to the front, that Ellen was sometimes a little unnoticed and forgotten.

She was unhappy; all the pleasantness of her life was slipping from her. She was rather weak in health and inclined to be moody, and she felt that there was a spirit of antagonism springing up between herself and her cousin, known at present only to themselves, but which she feared could not be always secret, and which would greatly displease her uncle. She fought against it, as also did Dorothy, who liked to be friendly with everybody, but was quick to take offence with her cousin, and had a bitter tongue which she sometimes used against Nellie with poignant effect.

Once the banker noticed some ill-will between the girls, and he spoke to Nellie kindly, bidding her not to be jealous of her cousin, for his love and his wealth were enough for them both. Nellie denied the imputation.

"But you seem almost to dislike her at times." She could not deny this, and he added: "Then you must be jealous, for she is good and affectionate."

The girl began to cry. He kissed her and said:

"Get over this bitterness, my pet; it is not worthy of you."

And she was humbled and ashamed, but she soon roused herself and tried to put away the hateful feeling, and to see nothing but the good in her cousin's character.

CHAPTER III.

DOROTHY took a fancy for the sea, and urged Nellie's pale looks and languor as a reason for going there. The banker got apartments for them at a pretty little village just beginning to gain a place in public favour, and placed them under the care of the housekeeper.

They had been there about a week, and were walking on the most frequented part of the beach, when Nellie observed a gentleman, with a look of surprise and recognition on his face, coming towards them as if to speak. He did not, however, but turned aside when close to them, and Nellie, glancing at Dorothy, saw a curious expression of reproof and command in her eyes.

Afterwards she observed that the man was following them at a distance, and said so to her cousin, who answered it lightly:

"It is the fault of your beaux yeux."

The next morning Ellen was very wakeful, and rose and went into the little garden before anyone was astir in the house. The gate was ajar, and she was tempted to run down the little lane by the side of the house that led to the shore, and see how grand and beautiful the ocean looked in the early sunlight. She had gone but a little way down the lane, when she saw the stranger of the beach and her cousin standing together. Dorothy seemed to be pleading earnestly and to gain her point, for the tall man kissed her and went away. She advanced towards her cousin, who exclaimed involuntarily:

"What would uncle say?"

"It is only my brother," said Dorothy haughtily.

"Your brother!"

A deep red came into Dorothy's face as she said sharply:

"Are not all men our brothers, Simplicity, when it is not convenient to introduce them to our friends in their true personality? He cannot be my real brother, as you know I have none."

"I hardly understand," stammered Nellie.

"No," replied her cousin, "you have been protected and cared for always, and have not had to fight your own battles like me." And Nellie was softened, and listened compassionately to a little tale Dorothy told her of how she had been wooed and almost won, and then the man proved false, and she had resolved to forget him, and had succeeded in doing so, and the man came back and wanted his old place in her affections, but it could not be; he had kissed her, but now they had parted for ever. Then she asked Nellie to promise never to make mention of him to herself or anyone else, and the girl gravely promised.

The two went to look at the sea, and were better friends than they had been yet. Mr. Bowden came down for a few days, and found Nellie better, and Dorothy charming, congratulated himself that he had two such nieces, and laughed and said that men would soon conspire to rob him of such treasures.

The next visit, he took them back home with him. Dorothy had grown tired of the place. The covert dislike to each other had come to the surface again, they had wearied of each other's society, and Dorothy, in revenge for Nellie's reserve, spoke of the concealment that like the worm in the bud, made pale her cheek, and threatened to tell her uncle that she was a love-lorn maiden if she did not rouse herself and be companionable.

The old house grew gayer, and people who in the past had only called, or at most looked at the grapes and the flowers, now came to afternoon-tea, and sometimes to dinner. The girls went out, and Miss Haslemere was much admired and talked about, and made many friends; but few people cared about Nellie, who seemed to be losing all her youthfulness. She felt herself eclipsed and dominated by her cousin, who, with the merry malice that amused lookers-on, could taunt her bitterly.

And yet once again, when she had been stung to a reprisal, her uncle had whispered to her:

"She is a sweet, good girl, Nellie, and sometimes I fear that you do not quite value her as you should."

Then Nellie found the world a dreary place and a lonely, and wondered how it was that she was losing the love of the two hearts whose affection she most prized—her uncle's, and the other—she would not give him a name even to herself, he was only a memory.

The banker came home early one day to drive with the girls. The three were standing on the lawn in the sunshine waiting for the carriage. Neither had noticed a man coming through the park. He crossed the grass to them, and they were rather startled by his saying:

"You here, Doris; I thought you had left England. Your letter said so."

"I do not know you," she said. Then, looking at Ellen, added: "I do not wish to know you."

She moved from him, and putting her hand on Mr. Bowden's arm, said:

"This person insults me by his presence. Will you bid him leave me?"

"Doris—sister, are you mad?"

"This gentleman will tell you that I have no brother."

"Certainly she has no brother," said the banker; "she is my niece. May I request you to leave us."

"And no father?" asked the stranger of Dorothy.

"None," she answered firmly, looking him full in the face with steady eyes.

"You deny our father, our tried, patient father, who has borne with you so long. This is too much!"

"There is some mistake," suggested Mr. Bowden.

"Ellen knows of this person," said Dorothy, addressing the banker, "and she knows that he is not my brother."

"You told me so," said Ellen.

"Do not believe her," cried the stranger; "she is steeped to the lips in falsehood. Doris, will you come home with me, and make confession to this gentleman you have so cruelly imposed upon?" She turned from him with scorn. "It is your last chance," he said bitterly. She moved not. "Mr. Bowden, in two days time I will bring my father to you, and then you will know whose child she is. Doris, will you come?"

She was as immovable as a statue. He lifted his hat to them all and strode away.

"He is mad," said Dorothy, "or is it the excitement of wine? In that case he may sleep away his folly."

"He seemed sober," replied the banker; "but his hurry is insane; he is out of sight already."

Mr. Bowden helped the girls into the carriage, and as Dorothy took her seat she said:

"I wonder what his business at the house was?"

No one could tell her, and the subject was allowed to drop.

The banker had not forgotten that both his nieces had seen the man before, but the present was not the time for enquiry.

Through the long drive Dorothy was most amusing; she seemed resolved that her companions should not have a moment for reflection. The banker was quite carried away by her vivacity, but Ellen thought her heartless, and wished that she would cease the chatter that fell upon her ears as pitilessly as hail upon the window-pane. She recollected that Dorothy herself had said that she once loved the man, and, if he had lost his wits through love of her, she owed him compassion. And Ellen felt all her old aversion to her cousin growing deeper and deeper, until she wished earnestly that she had never been found; then she reproached herself for the wish, and a sense of unreality came over her, as if all that had happened of late was but the phantasy of a dream.

In the evening Dorothy made reference to the stranger when she was alone with her uncle—mentioned that he had addressed Nellie and herself in the same strain at the seaside.

"He seemed in earnest," said the banker; "perhaps it is a case of mistaken identity."

"Perhaps so," she answered, "but it need not trouble us; I, at least, am safe and strong in your love and protection."

"They shall never fail you, Dolly."

She kissed his hand with the grace that made all she did seem the right thing to be done.

The next morning she called Mr. Bowden's attention to Nellie's pale face, and suggested that the fresh breezes of the Atlantic, or the air of Swiss mountains, would do her much good. Would he not let them go away at once—to-morrow? She would get everything ready. She delighted in doing things in a rush. He did not know what a capable girl she was—what an excellent cousin!

He answered with a smile, pleased at her eagerness for Nellie's good, that he was too old to be hurried, but that a doctor should see Nellie, and under his advice they should go at leisure to ocean or mountains as he should decide. She laughed, commended him for having resisted her wiles, and he went into town amused and flattered, and satisfied that he possessed the most charming niece in the world.

The following afternoon, Dorothy asked Ellen to drive to the station with her. She was sending off a box to a friend, and wished to pay the carriage.

They went. Dorothy spoke to the ticket-collector at his little window. The train came in; she saw the box deposited in the luggage-van.

"I have managed nicely," she said as they walked back.

The door of a first-class carriage was open; she stepped lightly in, arranging her dress daintily. The guard closed the door. Dorothy gave Nellie an insolent smile, as she cried in her sweetest tones, "Au revoir!" The train steamed away out of the station, and Ellen stood alone on the platform, bewildered and amazed.

She went back to the carriage, and, as she drove home, came to the conclusion that this strange proceeding was some frolic of her cousin's, and that she trusted to her winning ways to make peace with her uncle on her return.

Ellen was coming downstairs to join her uncle, who she believed had come in while she was dressing. As she reached the hall, the outer door was opened, and three gentlemen entered. She recognised the tall, young one that she had seen twice before, and understood that the white-haired one was his father; but the sight of the third made her heart stand still. It was the Henry Hervey whose eyes had said more than his lips. He saw her, and, shaking hands, the two followed the others into the drawing-room. Then he introduced his companions to her, saying that they were very old friends whom he had not seen for many years until within the last few weeks.

Ellen was nervous, and the three men were all more or less eager and constrained, and it was a relief to her when her uncle came in, and after a few minutes took the venerable old man with him to the library. The young man went to a window and looked out, playing restlessly with his watch-chain. Mr. Hervey, who had never been far from Ellen, came closer to her and said softly:

"I have longed to see you. And you—have you missed me a little?"

"I thought you had forgotten me."

"I could never do that, but I feared to speak too soon, and circumstances kept me from you longer than I expected. I think I was wrong—I should have been bolder. May I be so now?"

Something in Ellen's face gave him the desired answer, and he was about to take her hand, when a servant came in, saying:

"Miss Haslemere is wanted in the library, but she is not in her room, and this letter was found there."

Ellen took the letter addressed to herself, opened it, and read:

"SWEET COUSIN,

"Do not break your tender heart for me; I have played high and lost. The picture and its story put the idea into my head, and I made a good Dorothy Haslemere. I am sure Mr. Bowden will endorse that statement.—Your loving friend, "DULCIE HILL.

"My humble acknowledgments to Mrs. Steven for so kindly allowing me to peruse her incomparable commonplace book."

"I will go to the library," she said to the servant. "I am so glad," she whispered to Mr. Hervey. Her words were an enigma to him, but he saw the brightness in her face, and was glad also.

She gave the letter into her uncle's hands, saying: "Doris left for London this morning."

Mr. Bowden read the letter. He hardly gathered all its meaning, but he understood he had been tricked—befooled.

"Is this your daughter's writing?" he asked the old man.

"Yes," he answered readily; "and it is her style. She is heartless and cruel. I am tempted to hope that I may never hear of her again. News of her always brings sorrow and humiliation."

"I am very, very sorry for you," said Mr. Bowden, shaking hands warmly with him.

"And I am grieved that she should have brought trouble into your life," he replied.

"It is little harm—little harm, that she has done us," he said kindly; then noticing Nellie, he added: "I am afraid I was less kind to you, my pet, than I ought to have been—you were wiser than I."

"Mischief, always making mischief," said the grief-stricken old man. "She is indeed one to bring the grey hairs of her father with sorrow to the grave."

"Do not be grieved for me," said Ellen tenderly, deeply touched by his misery. "I shall forget her in a day."

"Thank Heaven!" was the fervent answer.

To the banker's ear there was a new and glad ring in the girl's voice, and when he looked at her face he marvelled at the happiness there. The old man, moving to take his leave, said:

"My son is with Mr. Hervey."

Then the banker's mind, quickened by the excitement of the moment, caught a clue to the change in Ellen, and rejoiced that it was not all due to the withdrawal of the supposed cousin.

"As honourable men as ever lived," said Mr. Hervey, as the three watched the father and son walk sadly away.

"I pity them from my heart," replied the banker. "Ah, Nellie, we must be all-sufficing to each other in the future."

Mr. Hervey forbore to put in his claim for Nellie that evening, but the next day he did so, and was successful. And the banker used to say for many years, "That as he lost a niece he gained a nephew," and Nellie would smile joyfully, for time neither dulled nor lessened her love for her husband.

The Editor's Note Book.

THE prospects of the London season for 1884 were never particularly brilliant, and now, on the top of political doubts and Parliamentary dissensions, comes the lamented death of the Duke of Albany as the finishing blow. Nothing now remains to complete the discomfiture of the West End tradesmen but a dissolution, which may be brought about by the occurrence of any one of some half-dozen probable contingencies.

THE late Duke was not so well known to the public as his brothers, his delicate health having condemned him to a quieter life than is led by the other sons of the Queen, but where he was known he succeeded in making himself popular and respected. The affectionate sympathy with which the intelligence of his premature death was received was creditable alike to the people and their Sovereign.

OF course the early intelligence of the melancholy event comprised all that variety of circumstantial but inexact statement, which makes newspaper reading nowadays so speculatively interesting. The Duke, we were told, had fallen upstairs, had fallen downstairs, had fallen off a chair; he had died of apoplexy, of epilepsy, of concussion of the brain.

By the time the actual facts of the case were made known, the papers had been filled with sensational accounts of the manner in which the Queen had received the mournful news, and of her first interview with the poor young widow. These were all officially contradicted after a day or two, and it became evident that the reporters had again depended on their imaginations for their facts. Newspaper enterprise is, no doubt, a very good thing, but surely the line ought to be drawn at fiction.

WRITING so long before the day of publication as I am obliged to do, it is almost dangerous to venture on any comment on such a situation as that at Khartoum, which may undergo complete alteration at any moment, but I think that enough has happened to show that General Gordon's mission has unfortunately failed, and that the untrustworthiness of the troops on whom he has to rely exposes him to serious danger. The telegram from the country along the Red Sea coast announcing "the close of the war" may be true enough, but must not be taken to mean that our Egyptian difficulties are very much nearer solution than they were before.

THE battle of Cincinnati, as it may be called, is mainly interesting to the inhabitants of that city and the State of Ohio, but may also be recommended to the attention of politicians who are not indisposed to play fast and loose with the passions of the mob. One of the first things the rioters did, following the example of the Parisian Communists, was to burn down the Court House, which contained the archives of the State and, no doubt, much legal evidence, the destruction of which will be useful to a great many of the ringleaders. The moral of the story is the old one, that it is impossible to estimate the mischief which may arise if a lawless mob is allowed to get out of hand, even for half an hour.

TELEGRAMS from Madras state that an epidemic of small-pox is raging with great violence in that presidency, and that the mortality is mainly amongst non-vaccinated children. It also appears that the chief difficulty in dealing with the epidemic arises from a widespread superstition among Hindoos that small-pox is a goddess, whose visits ought not to be interfered with. After all, there is not much to choose between these Hindoos and our own more civilised anti-vaccinationists.

THE announcement by a Temperance Committee of two handsome prizes for "a good temperance drink, which shall take the place of the cheap intoxicating liquors to which the public are accustomed," is in the nature of a confession that mankind wants something more than merely to quench its thirst with water or lemonade, and that the world-wide instinct which leads to the consumption of some form of fermented liquor is not so unnatural a one as Sir Wilfrid Lawson and Dr. Richardson would like us to believe.

WHAT the teetotalers want, in point of fact, is a stimulant which shall have something of the cheering effect of alcoholic drink, without the accompanying disqualification of producing intoxication if consumed too freely. It is of no use to point out to the advocates of total abstinence that a moderate use of the good things of this life is the simplest way out of the difficulty. Perhaps, on the whole, it is well that there should be an organisation to assist in the reform of people who cannot drink without making beasts of themselves, but I think it will take a long time for chemists to invent a wholesome drink which will stimulate without over exciting the converted drunkard.

BARON HUDDLESTON, in refusing to stay execution in an action for damages in which he had decided against the Guardians of St. George's-in-the-East, who were the defendants, made a remark which may be commended to the attention of some of the learned judges who are far too ready to encourage, in all sorts of cases, and under all sorts of circumstances, that system of appealing which grievously handicaps a poor suitor as against a rich one, and the abuse of which is one of the crying evils of our present system of legal procedure.

SAID Baron Huddleston: "No, it is a cruel thing to parties in a cause that they should be dragged from one court to another on an appeal that may never succeed. Unless I have some doubt I will never sanction an appeal." Whatever the profession may think of this, there can be no doubt that the public will cordially agree with the views of the learned Baron.

ONE would hardly have expected that so Conservative a body as the City Commissioners of Sewers would have unanimously agreed to a resolution asking the Sanitary Committee to consider the desirability of erecting a Crematorium at the Ilford Cemetery, in order that the public might have the option of burning instead of burying the bodies of their dead. It would seem as if the question of cremation had emerged from the "fad" stage, and was about very speedily to take its place among the reforms, the carrying out of which is only a question of time.

THE Daily Telegraph thinks that so long as people can disappear, or be murdered in London, without the discovery by the police of the circumstances of the disappearances, or the murderers being discovered and punished, it is a mockery for Mr. Howard Vincent to assert that London is the safest capital in Europe. But it must always be remembered that London is really a vast province and not a city at all, and that it is really difficult to say—not in a leading article, but as a matter of practical business—how, unless he is assisted by happy accident, a detective is to discover a murderer who is sufficiently astute as to leave absolutely no evidence behind him.

THE idiotic form of amusement known as practical joking seems to be coming into fashion again, and the success of the elaborate hoax which was carried out so effectively at the Haymarket Theatre some weeks ago will probably lead to a number of more or less ill-natured mystifications. The Haymarket hoax was one of the most pardonable of its kind, inasmuch as little sympathy could be felt for the victims, while the contrivers were able personally to enjoy the result of their scheme; but it would puzzle all Earlswood to say wherein lies the humour of sending a number of bogus orders for goods to be delivered at a particular house at a given time.

EIGHT hundred and sixty pounds for a print, which not many years ago was sold by auction for about a fortieth part of that amount, is not a bad price considering the "badness of the times" and the fact that there is "no money." Whether the measure of a collector's joy is in direct proportion to the price he pays is not very certain, but it certainly looks very like it.

MR. HERBERT FRY'S valuable "Guide to the London Charities" is not a facetious publication, but even in its business-like pages there is an occasional gleam of unconscious humour. Thus, "The Society for the Promotion of Permanent and Universal Peace," with an income of something more than three thousand pounds, has, under the heading "Number of persons benefited last year," the significant words, "No return." I wonder who, except the paid officials and the printer, was in any way the better for that three thousand pounds.

C. D.

Iron as the Colouring Matter in Nature.

A DEEPER interest and larger beneficence belong to that ochreous earth of iron which stains the marble of your springs. It stains the great earth wherever you can see it, far and wide—it is the colouring substance appointed to colour the globe for the sight, as well as subdue it to the service of man. You have seen your hills covered with snow, and, perhaps, have enjoyed at first the contrast of their fair white with the dark blocks of pine-woods; but have you ever considered how you would like them always white—not pure white, but dirty white—the white of thaw, with all the chill of snow in it, but none of its brightness? That is what the colour of the earth would be without its iron; that would be its colour, not here or there only, but in all places, and at all times. Follow out that idea till you get it in some detail. Think first of your pretty gravel walks in your gardens, yellow and fine, like plots of sunshine between the flower-beds; fancy them all turned suddenly to the colour of ashes. That is what they would be without iron ochre. Think of your winding walks over the common, as warm to the eye as they are dry to the foot, and imagine them all laid down suddenly with grey cinders. Then pass beyond the common into the country, and pause at the first ploughed field that you see sweeping up the hillsides in the sun, with its deep brown furrow, and wealth of ridges, all aglow, heaved aside by the plough-share, like deep folds of a mantle of russet velvet—fancy it all changed suddenly into grisly furrows in a field of mud. That is what it would be without iron. Pass on, in fancy, over hill and dale, till you reach the bending line of the seashore; go down upon its breezy beach—watch the white foam flashing among the amber of it, and all the blue sea embayed in belts of gold; then fancy those circlets of far sweeping shore suddenly put into mounds of mourning—all those golden sands turned into grey slime; the fairies no more able to call to each other, "Come unto these yellow sands," but, "Come unto these drab sands." That is what they would be without iron. Iron is in some sort, therefore, the sunshine and light of landscape, so far as that light depends upon the ground.—Ruskin.

Cookery.

NEW RECIPES FOR OLD SWEETMEATS.

ONE of the great conveniences of the present day is the large number of economical preparations for culinary and domestic use. Not only have we numerous kinds of prepared soups, more or less excellent and moderate in price, but there are tinned vegetables, meat, fish, fowl, and fruit, all of first-rate quality, for it does not pay to preserve any but the best articles, though some brands are far superior to others. Condensed milk has now an established reputation, and is an invaluable addition to the fresh milk supply. Nothing can be better than a cup of coffee made with Café Vierge, an extract of coffee which may be cited as possessing the highest strength and flavour, with the addition, when required, of a teaspoonful or two of Swiss milk. Most useful, too, are the preparations of cocoa manufactured with a view to enhancing the nourishment of the staple ingredient by such additions as malt, as in Liebig's cocoa.

No one, in these days, need be worried about the preparations for a party, especially in the sweetmeat-department, for jellies, creams, and custard are all so nearly prepared for the table as to require little more skill than goes to mixing the contents of bottles and tins with the requisite quantity of milk or water. By all these useful and excellent preparations, catering is made a much easier and simpler affair for both cook and housekeeper than at any other period of our domestic history.

In this paper we purpose to give a few recipes for making favourite little cakes and sweetmeats with very little trouble and comparatively small expense. Time was, when preparing almonds for cakes was an affair of much labour, and it was only at certain seasons of the year that cocoa-nuts were to be had. At present almonds can be bought ready pounded, and desiccated cocoa-nut is, for culinary purposes, as good as that which is freshly grated. To add to the conveniences of having these nuts ready prepared, we now have dried whites of egg, known as "Nelson's Albumen." This preparation is the whites of eggs carefully dried, so that it will keep for an indefinite length of time. It is useful for any purpose to which the white of egg is applied, and answers well for clearing soup and jelly. When required for use, the Albumen is soaked in cold water, and whisked in the usual way.

This Albumen will be found very useful, when, as in the following recipes, only the whites of eggs are required for use, or when, as is often the case, an extra white of egg is wanted.

The strength of the Albumen is fully equal to that of the fresh egg, and it is even more readily whisked to a strong froth.

MACAROONS.

Beat up a packet of Nelson's Albumen with three teaspoonfuls of cold water to a strong froth, mix in half a pound of finely sifted sugar, and two ounces of pounded sweet and bitter almonds in equal quantities. Flour a baking-sheet, and lay on it sheets of wafer-paper, which can be bought at the confectioner's, and drop on to them at equal distances a small piece of the paste. Bake in a moderate oven for ten minutes, or until the macaroons are crisp and of a golden colour. When done cut round the wafer-paper with a knife, and put the cakes on a sieve to dry.

In following recipes for this class of cake some judgment is required in the choice of the sugar, and the result will vary greatly, according as this is of the right sort or otherwise. A little, more or less, sugar may be required, and only practice can make perfect in this matter. As a general direction it may be given that the sugar must be of the finest quality, and be very finely sifted, but not flour-like.

CHOCOLATE CAKES.

Whisk a packet of Nelson's Albumen with three teaspoonfuls of cold water to the strongest possible froth, mix in half a pound of finely sifted sugar, two teaspoonfuls of Schweitzer's Cocotina, and six drops of Nelson's Essence of Vanilla. Sift paper thickly with sugar, and drop small teaspoonfuls of the mixture at equal distances on it, allowing space for the cakes to spread a little. Bake for ten minutes in a moderate oven.

COCOA NUT CAKES.

Beat up a packet of Nelson's Albumen with three teaspoonfuls of cold water to a strong froth, mix with it a quarter of a pound of finely sifted sugar, and two ounces of Challen's Coker Nut. Put sheets of wafer-paper on a baking-tin, drop small pieces of the cake mixture on to it, keeping them in a rocky shape. Bake in a moderate oven for ten minutes, or until crisp.

COCOA NUT ROCK.

Boil half a pound of loaf-sugar in a gill of water until it is beginning to return again to sugar, when cool, add a packet of Nelson's Albumen, whisked to a strong froth with three teaspoonfuls of water, and stir in a quarter of a pound of Challen's Coker Nut. Spread the mixture, not more than an inch thick, in a greased pudding-tin, and place in a cool oven to dry. When done, cut in neat squares, and keep in tins in a cool, dry place.

AMANDINES.

Blanch and pound to a paste three ounces of bitter almonds with a little rose-water. Beat three-quarters of a pound of sugar to a cream, with a quarter of a pound of butter. Work in a quarter of a pound of flour and the almond paste, and having thoroughly mixed these ingredients by beating with a wooden spoon, stir in three packets of Nelson's Albumen whisked to a strong froth with nine teaspoonfuls of cold water. Bake in small tins as for queen-cakes; when done turn them out and ornament some of them with minced pistachio kernels, or coloured sugar, or they may be iced.

APPLE MERINGUE.

Beat up two packets of Nelson's Albumen with six small teaspoonfuls of water, and stir them into half a pound of stiff apple-sauce, flavoured with lemon-extract. Put the meringue on a bright tin or silver dish, pile it up high in a rocky shape, and bake in a quick oven for ten minutes.

MERINGUES.

Soak three packets of Nelson's Albumen in nine small teaspoonfuls of water, whisk to a very strong froth, and mix with three-quarters of a pound of finely sifted sugar. As quickly as possible fill a tablespoon with the mixture, and put it on a strip of paper placed on a baking-board; repeat this, working rapidly, until all the meringues are made, then sift fine sugar over them, and put them, without loss of time, in the oven, the heat of which must only be sufficient to dry the meringues, and give them a delicate brown tint. When the meringues are coloured, and feel firm to the touch, take them off the papers, and with great care scoop out from the inside as much of the soft sugar mixture as you can without injuring the case. When this is done, again place the meringues, the hollow side uppermost, on fresh strips of paper, and let them remain in the same moderate heat until perfectly crisp. When cold fill one case with whipped cream, place another over it, and if necessary to keep it in position, use a very little white of egg. The meringues must not be filled with cream until just before serving, as of course the moisture may dissolve them.

Kartaline.

MANY ladies who have leisure time, and who are fond of painting, without possessing enough talent and originality to produce first-class work, will be glad to hear of this process, which is an easy and effective way of colouring photographs, and one that essentially differs from the usual methods. We are all familiar with the washed-out look most photographs coloured by amateurs present, and with the aggressive way in which jewellery, when it is painted, will start out of the picture; but in Kartaline the colouring matter is vivid, and becomes incorporated with the chemicals, and so a part of the print, leaving the surface of the photo free from all roughness, and of the smooth creamy delicacy that is seen in water-colour painting upon ivory. Another advantage of using this method is that it is indelible.

THE Kartaline colours are sold in boxes, with the necessary medium and preservative and small camel's-hair brushes; but each article can be bought singly. The colours consist of white, flesh (Nos. 1 and 2), vermilion, carmine, light and golden yellow, light and wood brown, sienna, blue, violet, purple, green, and black. They are dry, except the black, and when used have to be wetted with the medium before they are applied. All the shades of colour are very deep, and the only skill necessary consists in putting them on and wiping them off, so that the colour remaining on the photo is sufficiently strong and not too vivid. Any well-printed photo can be thus painted, and does not require to be removed from its card; but vignette pictures of ladies in evening dress or fancy costume, or children's heads, are the most effective.

THE process is as follows: Have a tumbler of water at hand, into which to drop the brushes, so as to wash them after applying colour, a clean small face-sponge, a saucer, the medium, and photo. Take the photo, and wet it all over; if the tongue is used to wet the photo it will be more effective than water; but, if this is objected to, use the water and sponge. Commence by painting the flesh. For a fair woman and a child use flesh tint No. 2; for a dark woman, flesh tint No. 1; for a medium complexion, first a little flesh No. 1 and then flesh No. 2. Mix a little colour with the medium, take it up with the brush and drop it on the cheek, and wipe it off at once with the sponge. Look at the result, and put on more colour, if what is on already is too pale. Remember, when putting on the colour, that, after it has once been allowed to sink into the photo, it can never be softened, so be particularly careful not to put too much on at a time or to mix it very strongly. Keep on applying the flesh tints to the face until the complexion is made evenly over the whole surface; then mix some blue, and put this on and take off immediately in places where shadows are visible, also at the roots of the hair, round the eyes, at the chin and nostrils; and when these shadows are formed blend all together with a final wash of the flesh tint over the whole face. Work in the hands and arms with the two flesh tints and with the blue shadows. The lips, eyes, and hair of the picture are next painted. The iris of the eye paint with blue, brown, or black, according to its colour, the pupil with a touch of black; touch the ball of the eye with a little white to make its highest light, and put a touch of white in the iris; carefully mark out the eyebrows and eyelashes with sienna, light-brown, or wood-brown, and work these in with a brush that is nearly dry. Soften every tint by taking it off, except the last touches to the eyelashes and the reflected white lights. Work the lips in with flesh tint No. 2, and constantly wipe off and remove their colour, so as to leave them strong in tone without hardness. A little blue in the shadow of the lips will help to soften them. Work the hair tints in the same shades as the eyebrows. Touch in the jewellery with the same care as the flesh tints, make gold ornaments with golden-yellow and with white reflections. Silver ornaments with white, mixed with blue, and with strong white lights.

THE drapery, lace, and background of the photo are worked in when the finer portions are completed. For the drapery the colours can be mixed by one tint being laid on over another, and reds obtained of various shades by using a wash of yellow before applying the carmine or vermilion. Yellow, as a first wash, with various browns afterwards, will give good shades. For the lace, touch in white or black rather strongly. In working at large surfaces, have sufficient colour ready mixed in a saucer, and put it on with a large brush and sponge it off. By applying plenty of colour at once, a uniform shade over the whole drapery will be obtained. The first tints should be thus put on and washed off; but the final tints are allowed to dry on the photo. Do not use green for dresses, and only sparingly in the backgrounds. It is used for tree foliage, but never without brown and yellow added to it, to soften its tone. Black is another hard colour, and requires careful application. White can be put on very thick, and shaded with blue and black. A little practice will soon initiate the painter into the depth and tone each colour produces, and into the careful washing away of the tints.

THE brushes must be washed between each tint being applied. Use the preservative medium when the painting is perfectly dry; pour it once quickly over the surface with a large spoon. It preserves the picture from dust and dirt, but need not be used if the painting is to be protected with glass.

Spring Cleaning.

PART III. CARPET CLEANING.

SOME old-fashioned people still prefer to have their carpets carefully planned and fitted into every corner, as if the boards were something to be ashamed of. Younger housekeepers, with the love of novelty, adopt the simpler mode of having a carpet laid down only in the centre, with a margin of the boards stained all round, and polished or varnished. The modern housemaid is but little aware of what she owes to the revolution in taste, and is by no means as grateful as she ought to be for the changes from large pieces of furniture to small, and for having the corners of the room so accessible to brush and duster. There is quite as much grumbling by that functionary over the boarded margin to be kept polished as there was over the periodical brushing of so much additional carpet.

THE centre carpet ought never to require much severe cleaning. As the edges are not nailed it can be raised frequently and dust removed from beneath it. Even if a few carpet-tacks should be driven in, they can be taken out and put in again without bringing in the upholsterer's man. The carpet which is tightly strained is easily swept. Damp tea-leaves scattered over the floor before sweeping absorb the dust, but it must be admitted that all modern teas are not innocuous, whether from adulteration in the tea or uncertainty in the colours of the carpets, it would be difficult to determine. Bran is one of the very best substitutes for tea-leaves to use with sweeping, and freshens the colours. Put the bran into a bag—a pillow-case will answer well—close the top, pour on cold water, leave to soak for half an hour, squeeze until almost dry, use like tea-leaves on the carpets. The water squeezed from the bran comes in usefully for washing any chair-covers with crewel embroidery, or woollen materials delicate in colour. The antimacassars should be well worked through the bran-water, rinsed in clean water, shaken to get rid of superfluous drops, and pinned out to dry. If circumstances prevent the carpet being raised and removed from the room, go round with hard hand-brush and stir all the dust out of the pile. Then sweep with bran. Raise round the edge and take as much dust as possible from underneath. Lay down again, and go over with damp rough cloths, thoroughly scrubbing every part. Stair-carpet often requires to be cleaned more thoroughly than that used on sitting-rooms. Bedroom and nursery carpets also require vigorous treatment, for health considerations as well as for sake of appearances.

CHOOSE a fine day for carpet cleaning, as rapid drying is essential, and a good current of dry fresh air of great importance. The beating also, which is the first stage, can only be done effectively out of doors.

IF the carpet be of large size, it is thrown over a stout line, or across a fence. Small pieces and stair-carpets are more effectually done by being held by two people who strike alternately. The steam threshing-machines are rapidly taking the place of the old flail in farmyards, but those who have seen the latter used will understand the whole system of carpet-beating. One person stands on one side of the carpet, another on the other, and time is kept by giving stroke on stroke alternately, thus allowing the dust to escape. The untrained domestic who administers a few smart raps with a cane here and there upon a rug or carpet, and considers her duty is discharged, does more harm than good, and leaves the dust in patches undisturbed. Turn the carpet wrong side out, and beat thoroughly on that side, then turn the other side and treat it in a similar manner.

MUCH of the success of carpet-beating depends on the choice of sticks. They must be pliable, yielding a little to the blow, yet sufficiently substantial to inflict a decided blow. A good blackthorn is an excellent servant, and if there be a knob at the end, it should be covered with some rags to prevent the stick tearing the carpet or splitting the seams. If a walking-stick with round end be employed, strike with the knob.

CARPETS may, like dresses, be cleaned by different methods—dry cleaning, and ordinary scouring. The choice of process must depend on the colours of the carpet and its condition—if it be much soiled, or only requiring to be freshened. Blues and greens are fleeting colours, and require careful treatment. Dry cleaning and very rapid finishing are essential for delicate colours.

AFTER the carpet has been well beaten, go over it carefully to find if there are grease-spots. If the colours are fixed, rub the spot with a piece of hard soap, and wash out with a brush and cold water, well drying the spot with a flannel, and then with a coarse cloth. For blues and greens, soap is doubtful. Instead of it make a mixture of fullers'-earth, gall, and water, rub it in, leave it for some time, then rinse and dry very thoroughly.

A LARGE carpet will take a whole day to clean, so housekeepers must arrange to leave the scrubbers undisturbed at their work, and not expect several other things to be included in the same day's labour. The professional charge of sixpence the square yard is really not excessive, as the cleaning alone, without beating, or taking out grease-spots, will occupy twenty minutes for each yard, and one yard must be done before another is begun.

WITH delicate carpets the wet must not be allowed to soak through to the wrong side, and it is quite unnecessary to clean the latter, the right side being enough.

HAVE ready a number of dry, coarse cotton or linen cloths, some coarse flannels, and one or more large pieces of coarse sponge; two or more hard scrubbing or scouring brushes, some large tubs or pans, and pails, and a plentiful supply of both hot and cold water.

GALL cleaning is always safe for good carpets, rugs, Berlin-wool work, etc.; as not only does it leave the good colours uninjured, but it refreshes those which may have grown dim with wear. Put a bag of very fresh bullock's gall into a pail containing two gallons of cold water, with four ounces of pearlsh dissolved in it, and well mix it either with a stick or with your hands. Have ready, besides this, two pails of cold water, a large sponge, a couple of flannels, and some dry coarse cloths. Dip the brush into the gall and scrub and water the carpet, a square yard at a time, as quickly and carefully as possible. Rinse and take up the gall and dirt with a large flannel or sponge, which is to be frequently rinsed in the pails of cold water. Well dry with cloths before beginning a second square. As this process must be rapid, not allowing the damp to penetrate, it can be done indoors. If the carpet be very well brushed previously, and all the dust which may have filtered through removed from the boards underneath, it may remain spread in the room in which it belongs. The smell from the gall is at first objectionable. To lessen this as much as possible, it should be obtained from a bullock freshly killed. The carpet when cleaned should be placed in a good current of air; or if it has been cleaned on the floor, open doors and windows for a couple of days will remove any unpleasant odour.

AMMONIA is also used for dry cleaning; the smell remains for a longer time than that from gall, but it is less unpleasant. Dissolve in a small pan four ounces of pearlsh in hot water, and mix with it one gallon of ammonia, which must be bought from a druggist, not from a chemist. Dip a sponge or coarse flannel into the ammonia, take it out rather wet, and well rub it into the carpet; then dip the scouring-brush into the liquor and well scour the part already sponged as quickly as possible. The dirt and ammonia must then be taken up in the sponge or flannel, and the part well dried with flannels and cloths before proceeding with the next. If either this process or the previous one should be done in a room, a good fire must be kept burning to dry the carpet quickly. The floor or board under the part scrubbed must be very clean.

CARPETS with few colours can be scoured, and for the commoner kinds of stair-carpet this soap cleaning is quite good enough. The same rules as to a clean floor, rapid work, and rapid drying, apply to scouring. Cut up a bar of soap and dissolve it over a fire in two gallons of water. Put two quarts of this dissolved soap into a pail of warm water. Dip a scrubbing-brush into this soap-liquor, and scour with it about one square yard of the carpet, being careful not to let the liquor soak through to the back. When this piece is thoroughly cleaned, rub the soap well out of it by means of a coarse flannel or sponge, taking up all the wet and dirt made by the brush; rinse the flannel or sponge frequently in warm water. Prepare some common sour by stirring into clean water sufficient oil of vitriol, bought at a druggist's, to make it taste sharp. Take a clean sponge, and dip it into a pail of sour, squeeze it out, and then rub the sour well into the part of the carpet just cleaned and rinsed. Rub as dry as possible with clean, coarse cotton or linen cloths before going on to another square yard of the carpet.

CARPETS which are reversible are generally cleaned by the thorough process, and if there be few colours in the design there is no difficulty in administering a good homely treatment of soap-and-water, giving a due measure of rinsing to both sides impartially.

THE professional cleaner will have a stone floor, with a fall of six or eight inches, to drain off the soap-and-water as used, but in a private house a substitute may be found in a deal table, by raising one end. A board of three feet wide and sufficiently long to rest on trestles, say ten or twelve feet, allows two persons to work at the same time. The floor on which it rests must be very clean, as the carpet drops on it as the process proceeds. Place the carpet on the board face upwards, scouring with soap-liquor and hand-brushes. When as much as the board supports has been scoured, pull the carpet to one side, let it drop down, and clean a fresh piece. When all is done hang the carpet over a fence or clothes-horses, to drain for a few minutes while the board and the floor are cleared of soap and dirt. Return the carpet to the board as before, and scour out the soap with plenty of cold water. Again drain the carpet, again dry up the floor, and again scrub with more cold water. If all the dirt seems gone finish with sour as directed for other processes. Drain and dry as fast as possible.

Gold-Diggers' Drinks.

THE taking of "drink" has always been highly characteristic of the miner. No bargain could be made or any other matter of business or sociality settled without the indispensable drinks. A friend of the writer's, whose lot it was to officiate at one time as a clergyman in a mining community in California, used to say that he had to ring a bell on the Sunday morning, all through the apology for the street, to call his parishioners to Divine service, and that, finding nobody in the church when he came in, he had first to look into one gambling saloon or tavern, and then into another, to invite those he found there to come to church. "All right, parson," would be the good-natured reply; "we'll be there as soon as we've played out this hand for the whiskies. Jest go ahead with the prayers and things, and we'll be along for the preachin'!" The same clerical friend was shocked on his first arrival among the miners at being asked to "stand drinks," after he had received a liberal subscription towards the building of his church. Two mining companies threw dice to determine which of them should treat the "whole creek" to champagne, and as the wine was sold at fifteen dollars a bottle, the cost to the loser may be guessed. In most mining localities it was regarded as a cause of mortal offence to decline drinking with the first fellow who shouted, "Let's put in a blast, colonel!" In some places it was considered quite a serious breach of etiquette not to ask all who were sitting round in the bar-room of a tavern, even though total strangers, to "step up and take a drink." Sometimes an invitation was not required. A traveller, after a long ride, dismounted one day at a tavern to take some refreshment, when, to his utter astonishment and dismay, some fourteen men who were sitting round stepped up, and "lowed they would take sugar in tharn." The gentleman paid for the fifteen "drinks," as it was in strict observance of the custom of the country, but he took good care not to revisit that hostelry.

The Australian gold-digger of old times was, in many respects, different from the Californian, but still he evinced the same carelessness of money. It used to be the custom for these men to come down to the township after they had made a slight "pile," go each to his favourite public-house, and give his money into the landlord's hands, with the intimation that he "shouted" (or asked all and sundry to drink) until it was expended. Then the landlord, at short intervals, would call out, "Step up, boys; it's Jim Jenkins's shout!" Then they all wished Jim luck, until Jim's shout was out, when he went back to his gully, proud that he had "spent his money like a man." One one occasion, a digger came down and handed his money to the landlord according to custom; but contrary to expectation, nobody would respond to his shout. He had been a convict, "lagged" for some grievous offence. The man was at his wit's end; he couldn't drink by himself. At last he struck upon the brilliant expedient of engaging an idler at labourer's daily wages—eight shillings—to drink with him. And so he got through his holiday!

Household Gardening.

WITH mild weather vegetation will move rapidly, and trees flower, and vegetables rush onwards to maturity. And not only will that which is useful or beautiful make quick progress, but the unsightly and pernicious will be summered into activity. If the old adage of a "stitch in time," etc., has force in anything, it is in reference to prompt and timely measures for the extirpation or prevention of weeds. Attacked in their weak infantile state they are quickly and easily subdued; but if by negligence or procrastination they are allowed to become established, they will soon be practically masters of the situation, and bad masters too, because robbers, depriving the soil of its virtues, and compelling plants and crops that it is desired to cultivate to sicken and starve. Begin early, then, in waging war against weeds; attack them even before they are fairly visible. Immediately there is the slightest suspicion of a green tinge on the soil run the hoe through it briskly. A thousand incipient weeds may then be destroyed in a minute, but neglect this simple, yet profitable work, and the weeds that have been spared will give trouble for weeks. No better advice than this can be given to owners of gardens in April, for, if acted on, the advantages resulting will be felt throughout the season, and gardens will be rendered more profitable and enjoyable.

ARUM LILIES.

In a very pleasant and complimentary letter a lady asks for information "concerning the treatment of these plants, and how to make them bloom." "The Lily of the Nile," as the plant under notice is popularly called, is one of the most distinct, handsome, and popular of plants for flowering in the spring in greenhouse and light windows.

At Easter, the large, white, trumpet-shaped spathes, almost resembling wash-leather in texture, are in great demand for church decoration, and are grown in thousands for this purpose by professional cultivators.

They are of very easy culture. The main point in the management of these plants is to secure a strong, luxuriant growth under the full influence of the sun in summer, and then, and then only, they will flower freely in the spring.

If a plant has been neglected in the summer by not having been supplied with adequate support, or has been kept crowded amongst other plants in a room or greenhouse, it cannot be expected to flower in the spring; and all that can be done to induce it to throw up its coveted spathes is to sponge or syringe the leaves frequently, and keep the roots continually moist. The plant is an aquatic, and once it commences growth must have abundance of water. The simplest and best method of treating Arum Lilies in summer is to plant them out in very rich soil in the open garden, watering them copiously throughout the season when showers are not prevalent, and digging them up and placing in pots the last week in September or the early days of October.

At the present time the plants are in pots, and if they have been well prepared and are sufficiently watered, they will soon commence flowering if assigned a light position. After the flowers have faded, let the plants have all the light and air possible, watering them copiously, and at the same time keeping them out of the reach of frost.

About the middle of May they may be stood in a warm position out of doors, and towards the end of the month, or early in June, may be turned out of their pots and placed in the garden.

For inducing a strong growth the best cultivators prepare a trench as if for Celery. Dig in manure abundantly, and then insert the plants a foot apart, dividing them, if it is desired to increase the number, into as many portions as can be secured with roots attached.

They are then watered as often as is necessary for keeping the soil and roots constantly moist. In warm, dry weather they should be freely sprinkled over the leaves every evening, at the same time saturating the roots. For a time they will make little or no growth above ground, but the roots will be working, and towards the end of the summer the plants will commence unfolding their large rich green leaves.

In potting them in the autumn use rich loamy soil, pressing it down firmly amongst the roots, applying water immediately and in sufficient quantity to moisten every particle of the soil, the plants in the meantime being stood in a perfectly shaded place out of doors, and sprinkled two or three times a day to prevent the leaves flagging.

When frosts are imminent remove the plants under glass, allowing them the lightest position at command. They do not require heat in the winter, but must be safe from frost, and during December, January, and February the soil only needs to be sufficiently moist to keep the foliage fresh and healthy. They thus gain a partial rest. Then in March, as the natural heat increases, and water is given more abundantly, fresh, free growth commences, which is soon followed by the coveted flowers.

Persons who have Arums and no gardens in which to plant them, should re-pot them in May or June, removing most of the old soil from the roots and giving fresh loam; then grow the plants in the lightest position at command, preferably in the open air during July, August, and September, during which period the roots should be almost as if in a swamp, for it is at that time difficult to give them too much water.

As fully, yet as concisely as possible, we have sketched the method of growing these favourite plants successfully, and those who carry out the instructions can scarcely fail to succeed in their object. The botanical name of the Lily of the Nile is Richardia Ethiopica.

SCARBOROUGH LILIES.

"Dora I." desires to know if these plants flower every year, with other particulars of culture. Our reply is that healthy, well-managed plants flower every year brilliantly, and there are few, if any, greenhouse or window plants more beautiful in September and October.

The chief essential in the culture of Scarborough Lilies is to have the pots well filled with healthy roots. A few roots in a great mass of soil, or, in other words, small plants in very large pots, seldom grow well or flower freely.

April is a good time for re-potting these plants. In removing them from the pots do not drag them out by the bulbs so as to break the roots, but turn the pot over, striking its edge on a bench or table, and the entire mass of soil will fall into the hand intact.

Take away a portion of the old soil, which may be sour or inert, till several of the roots are liberated, and place in a clean pot, just large enough to hold the roots without crushing them in violently—still, they should touch the sides of the pot.

Afford ample drainage by placing an inch or more of broken charcoal or cinders in the pots—then a little moss or fibre for the soil to rest on. Sufficient of this should be put in and pressed down firmly, so that the plant, when placed on it, will leave the bulbs just above the level of the pot.

In adding fresh soil, the best being turfy loam, with a sixth part of wood-ashes and sand mixed, work it well and carefully amongst the roots and make it firm—but not hard—and do not fill the pots quite full, as an inch or so of space should be left for holding water.

A good watering should be given after potting, with further supplies as needed when the soil approaches dryness. Over-watering is a danger to be avoided; still, the soil must never be allowed to get really dry, and whenever water is given let it be plentifully, mere surface-sprinklings doing more harm than good.

A shelf in a greenhouse, or a window facing the sun, is a suitable position for the plants, which also succeed in a frame after the middle of June. As the growth increases so must the supply of water be increased, until about the middle of August, when the soil should be kept rather dry than otherwise for a month. This will afford the plants a slight rest, which is favourable for the production of flowers.

As the blooms fade remove them, and the stem will wither, and it can be cut off also. It is not a good plan to permit seed-pods to form, as these exhaust the plants, while the seed—unless the plants have special treatment—is rarely of any value.

The botanical name of the Scarborough Lily—which is really not a Lily at all—is Vallota purpurea.

BULBS AFTER FLOWERING.

A correspondent, writing an appreciative letter from Shepherd's Bush, is only one of many requiring hints on this subject.

The first thing to do after the flowers of bulbous plants fade is to cut off the spikes, which should be done before seed-pods form. The next important matter is to keep the foliage fresh as long as possible under the full influence of light and air. The functions of the leaves is to assimilate the food that is supplied by the roots and to secrete it in the bulb. The longer the foliage can be kept in working order the greater the storage of nutritious matter, and, consequently, the finer must the flowers be another year.

There is no better plan with bulbs that have flowered in pots and window-boxes than to plant them in the garden any time during April after the flowers have withered. There they may remain to flower year after year; a few fresh ones being obtained if the finest possible spikes and flowers are required in pots another season. The plan recommended is better than drying the bulbs and keeping them in paper-bags throughout the summer.

Treasure Trove.

AN instance once occurred, in which the crown, the lord of the manor, and the clergyman fought a kind of triangular duel for the possession of a found treasure. A good many years ago, the large sum of four thousand pounds was found just beneath the surface of a field near Stanmore. The money being mostly in foreign gold coins of the early part of the present century—such as French louis-d'ors and napoleons, and Spanish doubloons—speculation arose touching the question how such a treasure could have got into such a spot. The rector's gardener found the money; the gardener's wife told the rector's wife; the rector's wife told the rector; and the rector instituted an enquiry. Some of the older inhabitants then recollected that about the year 1815, when the Continent was in a troubled state, a foreigner had come to live at Stanmore. No one knew anything of him or whence he came; the chief fact observed relating to his sojourn in the village was that he used often to be seen walking about in one of the fields. After some time he left the place. Two years later, another stranger made his appearance, and announced that his predecessor had buried a considerable sum of money in a neighbouring field, at the same time sketching a ground-plan, showing the exact spot where the treasure was concealed; that he had afterwards died, and that his representative (the new comer) now wished to obtain possession of it.

As it used to be a frequent custom, in many countries, and especially in troubled times, to hide treasure underground, there seemed nothing absolutely incredible in the story. The stranger and the villagers, however, failed in their search, and the transaction was forgotten until the real finding, many years after, brought it once more under notice. It was supposed that some alteration made in the field, by the removal of certain trees, had thrown the searchers off the right scent. Be this as it may, the treasure came to light in the fulness of time; and then various claimants appeared. The finders (for a second hoard had been lit upon, after the gardener's first discovery) said: "It is ours, for we found it." The rector said: "It is mine, for it was found in my glebe." The lord of the manor said: "It is mine, for it was found on my manor." The sovereign said: "It is mine by law, for the found treasure is of precious metal."

Without detailing the course of the enquiry, and the operation of the law, suffice it to say that the claim of the crown was substantiated. If the next-of-kin, or the legal heir of the mysterious stranger, had come forward and proved his identity, the crown would have waived its claim, because the property had evidently been secretly deposited by some one, and not abandoned.

Odds and Ends.

THEODORE HOOK, at a dinner-party one day, was charged with stealing from a farce written by one of his friends the expression, "You are down upon me, as the candle said to the extinguisher." He immediately proceeded to show how little he was under the necessity of stealing, by supplying the same species of witticism to everything that was said to him for the next half-hour, e.g., "You are very pressing, Dean, as the tilberts said to the nut-crackers. Pray pass the wine," he continued, "though I'm sorry to trouble you, as the pin said to the periwinkle." "Bravo, Hookens!" shouted the Dean; you must give up your plan of going abroad; we can't afford to lose you." "Oh! it will be all the same one hundred years hence, as the American aloe said when it came into bloom." "But your song, Hook: only a few verses." "You really reduce me to extremities, as the rat said to the trap which cut his tail off. I've a bad cold, but will try my best, and hope to come off with flying colours, as the English general said when he ordered his niggers to retreat. If I attempt a stave, don't make a butt of me."

"So you want a situation as engine-driver, do you?" said the chairman of the company. "Yes, sir," the applicant replied. "Have you the necessary qualifications for such a responsible position?" "I am sure I have, sir." "Well, suppose your train should meet with a serious disaster, in which a number of passengers would be killed and a large amount of property destroyed, what action would you take in such a case?" "I would telegraph the newspapers that the accident was of little importance, and then send word to the chairman of the company to sell the stock sharp." "H'm," replied the chairman; "I am afraid those are not the proper qualifications for a good driver; but you are a man of ability, I see. We want a first-class superintendent. You can consider yourself engaged as superintendent of the line at a salary of a thousand a year."

AMONG the students of the piano now at the Paris Conservatoire is numbered a prodigy of such tender years that the personal intervention of Ambrose Thomas was necessary in order to obtain the gifted child's admission. Ernest Schelling, the prodigy in question, is only eight years and some months old. As the rules of the Conservatoire admit no pupils under nine years of age, a special relaxation of the laws was granted in view of the exceptional talent of the young pianist. He has played in public ever since he was four years old, and during the past season he played at a charitable matinée in Paris, his fellow-performers being Madame Sarah Bernhardt, Mdlle. Lureau, of the Grand Opera, and others of equal prominence.

AN acquaintance of Power met him one day in the street and button-holed him at once, exclaiming: "Oh, Power, my dear fellow, I am so glad to meet you! In fact, I was looking for you, for I want to ask your advice under most extraordinary circumstances." "Well," said Power, "what's the matter?" "Captain B., whom you know, has threatened to pull me by the nose whenever he meets me. What would you advise me to do?" "Did he really make use of the threat?" asked Power, with a strange twinkle in his eye. "Oh yes, no doubt in the world about it!" "Well," said Power, in one of his most sarcastic and contemptuous tones, "I'll tell you what to do. Soap your nose well, and it will slip through his fingers."

It is related that in his latter days that strange medley of bonhomie and conceit, the Vicomte d'Arlingcourt, succeeded, after several disappointments, in persuading the manager of a minor Paris theatre to accept a drama from his pen. It failed, however, to please the public, and did not draw a sou. During its very short run, one of the author's friends, meeting him on the boulevard, remarked that he hoped he was satisfied, as he had been acted at last. "Satisfied!" echoed D'Arlingcourt with an indignant air. "How can I be satisfied if they play my piece only when the house is empty?"

A GERMAN shoemaker, having made a pair of shoes for a gentleman of whose financial integrity he had considerable doubt, puzzled his Teutonic brain to know what excuse he could give for not delivering them, and finally made the following reply to him when he called for the articles: "Der poots ish not quite done, but der beel ish made outd."

LAWYER: "You say you made an examination of the premises. What did you find?" Witness: "Oh, nothing of consequence; a beggarly account of empty boxes, as Shakespeare says." Lawyer: "Never mind what Shakespeare says. He will be subpoenaed, and can testify for himself if he knows anything about the case."

ENGLISHMAN in America: "Have you any court-plaster?" Druggist: "No; but here's some sticking-plaster. You see we have no royal family in this country, and therefore no court, and consequently no court-plaster. If your finger is cut you will have to take a piece of the democratic article or go somewhere else."

It is claimed that Brush has accomplished the storage of electricity. So did the cyclone, long before Brush ever thought of it. But it didn't make the cyclone any more popular. The trouble with the cyclone's electricity was that it wouldn't stay stored. It dissipated itself. Likewise the property adjacent.

A DAMSEL was asked: "When a lady and gentleman have quarrelled, and each considers the other in fault, which of the two ought to be the first to advance towards a reconciliation?" Her reply was: "The best-hearted and wisest of the two."

A LADY was sitting at table between an Englishman, stiff and cold, and a young Parisian. As the lady was about to move her head the Parisian exclaimed: "Don't turn towards that other gentleman, you will catch cold."

A MAN has an umbrella that was made during the reign of George III. It has passed through a great many rains since.

ONE difference between sailors and soldiers is that sailors tar their ropes while soldiers pitch their tents.

THE woman that maketh a good pudding in silence is better than she who maketh a tart reply.

THE BOARD OF TRADE.—A shopkeeper's sign.

WILLIAM WIRT's letter to his daughter on the "small, sweet courtesies of life," contains a passage from which a deal of happiness might be learned: "I want to tell you a secret. The way to make yourself pleasing to others, is to show that you care for them. The world is like the miller at Mansfield, 'who cared for nobody, no, not he, because nobody cared for him.' And the whole world will serve you so if you give them the same cause. Let every one, therefore, see that you do care for them, by showing them what Sterne so happily calls 'the small, sweet courtesies,' in which there is no parade; whose voice is to still, to ease; and which manifest themselves by tender and affectionate looks, and little kind acts of attention, giving others the preference in every little enjoyment at the table, in the field, walking, sitting, or standing."

In a recent trial the judge having asked a witness: "What is an 'Anthony'?" He replied: "The littlest pig, your honour. The little pig is always 'Anthony.'" On an enquiry why the little pig was so-called, the attorney replied: "I believe, your honour, it is associated with the saint of that name, from the fact that in his unhappy time the smallest and least valuable pig was usually picked for the church."

At a banquet when solving enigmas was one of the diversions, Alexander said to his courtiers: "What is that which did not come last year, has not come this year, and will not come next year?" A distressed officer, starting up, said: "It must certainly be our arrears of pay." The king was so diverted that he commanded him to be paid, and also increased his salary.

A GENTLEMAN dining at a restaurant where waiters were few and far between, dispatched a lad among them for a cut of beef. After a long time the lad returned, and was asked by the faint and hungry gentleman: "Are you the lad who took away my plate for this beef?" "Yes, sir," "Bless me," resumed the hungry wit, "how you have grown!"

A SPANISH student going out with a party to shoot rabbits, was told not to talk lest he should frighten the animals. When the timid creatures appeared he uttered an exclamation in Latin, which frightened them away, and upon his companions blaming him, he said: "Who could have supposed that rabbits understood Latin?"

THE following extract from a French advocate's will pithily expresses his opinion of his clients: "I give 100,000 francs to the local mad-house. I got this money out of those who pass their lives in litigation; in bequeathing it for the use of lunatics I only make restitution."

It is said of a distinguished member of the bar, who secured the acquittal of a client for stealing a cow, at the beginning of his practice, when told that his kindness could never be repaid, as the defendant was very poor, replied: "Oh, I'll let him off easy—I'll take the cow."

A PROFESSOR lecturing on "English Industries" to a class of juveniles, informed them that it took seven men and a boy to make a pin. "I expect," said a little fellow, "that it's the seven men that make that pin, and they use the boy to stick it into to see if it's sharp enough."

"I am ashamed of the effeminacy of my sex," said a lady orator. "Look at your fripperies and superfluities. Why, for instance, do you need parasols when I never use one?" And a pert minx answered: "Because you are on the shady side of life."

A SWELL, while being measured for a pair of boots, observed: "Make them cover the calf." "Impossible!" exclaimed the astonished shoemaker, surveying his customer from head to foot; "ain't leather enough in my shop!"

"WILL you ever pay that bill you owe me?" "Oh yes; sooner or later." "That's all very well, but I want you to set a time. I want to know for certain when it will be paid." "Well, if you want me to be exact about it, I'll say—later."

AFTER a christening, while the clergyman was making out the certificate, he happened to say, "Let me see, this is the 30th?" meaning the date. "Thirtieth!" exclaimed the indignant mother; "indeed it is only the eleventh!"

"Is it about the right length, sir?" asked the skilful barber, as he finished cutting his customer's hair. "I like the sides and back," was the response, "but I wish you would make it a little longer on the top."

It is related of a Lancashire young woman and a Chinese lady that on being introduced they looked at each other's feet, and then both fainted dead away, the former from mortification, and the latter from fright.

MR. X.'s son (just returned from abroad, to new Irish butler, engaged during his absence): "Do you belong here?" Butler: "Bedad, sir, I do; an' if I didn't belong here, sure I wouldn't be long here."

EPITAPH.—Here lies John Fallowes, who lived at All Hallows. He was a maker of bellows. But though he made bellows; He couldn't make breath; And for the want of that It brought on his death.

THE young lady who made seven hundred words out of "conservatory" last autumn has run away from home. Her mother wanted her to make three loaves of bread out of "flour."

A MAN advertises in a country paper for a woman to "wash, iron, and milk one or two cows." What does he want his cows washed and ironed for?

"I HEV often noticed," says Josh Billings, "that the man who would have done such wonderful things of he had bin there never gits there."

"YES," said the reverend gentleman, "I am rector of the church, my mother-in-law is director, and my wife is corrector."

WHAT particular sail connected with a ship would be likely to remind a young man of his earlier days? The spanker.

WHEN the widow buries her first husband she becomes pensive, but after she gets the second she is usually ex-pensive.

THERE is a boy in Birmingham so bright that his mother looks at him through smoked glass.

To die for one's country is sweet, but to live for one's country is a more healthy occupation.

THERE is a widespread contest over who shall be the champion light-weight grocer.

Correspondence.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Enquiries will be attended to as quickly as possible, but, as we have to go to press several days before publication, some delay is inevitable. In no case can questions be answered "next week," as some of our friends demand.

We have received several very unreasonable complaints of delay in attending to letters, which have been addressed to us by Correspondents who have paid no regard to the instructions which are given every week in this Journal.

The Editor is therefore compelled to give notice:

1. That all letters containing postage-stamps for copies of this Journal, or on similar business, must be addressed to the PUBLISHER.
2. That all letters containing enquiries for the Correspondence Column, or on literary business, must be addressed to the EDITOR.
3. That Correspondents are urgently requested to adopt distinctive pseudonyms, and not to use such vague signatures as "A Constant Reader," etc.
4. That Correspondents wishing to write on two or more subjects—say to send in an answer to a Correspondent, and to enclose stamps for a copy of the Journal—must send each communication in a separate envelope, properly addressed as above indicated.
5. That NO ATTENTION can be paid to any Correspondents who do not observe these rules.

QUESTIONS.

ADALE writes: "Can any of your readers tell me the name of a song in which the words occur, 'Moods and tenses bother my senses'?"

AUSTRALIA will be grateful if any correspondent can inform her where she can get the piece for recitation called "Papa's Letter."

R. E. P. wishes to know where he can find the lines:

Heart and hand that move together,
Feet that run on willing errands.

ANSWERS.

ADALE.—Beethoven's "Adieu to Music" is a piece, not a song. It might be called a song without words.

BUSIRIS.—The earliest age for a clerk is, we believe, eighteen; the limit twenty-five. 2. Director's nomination. 3. If entering at, say eighteen years of age, seventy pounds; at twenty-one, one hundred per annum.

C. L.—You can get your toy boat put in order by Henry Monk, 219, Strand.

DICK DUNMORE.—"Strangers Yet" is published by Boosey, Regent-street, at 2s.

G. O. S. E.—The epigram is correctly given as follows. We do not know who composed it:

Matilda, whose charms were beginning to fade,
A crusty old widower seemed to upbraid
With "Pardon me, sir, but I think, to be plain,
'Twould not be amiss if you marry again."

The gentleman shrugged up his shoulders and said:
"Indeed 'tis a chance if again I shall wed;
But, to answer you fairly, I'll just mention this:
If I marry again, it will not be a Miss."

HEART'S CONTENT.—According to "Men of the Time," Miss Charlotte Mary Yonge was born in 1823. It is said that she gave two thousand pounds, the profits of her "Daisy Chain," for the building of a missionary college at Auckland, New Zealand, and devoted a great portion of the proceeds of "The Heir of Redclyffe" to fitting out the missionary schooner, "Southern Cross," for the use of Bishop Selwyn. Miss Elizabeth Missing Sewell, we learn from the same authority, was born in 1815. The list of her works is too long for us to give in this page. Among her fiction, the most popular are "Amy Herbert," "Katherine Ashton," and "The Earl's Daughter."

HOUSE MOTHER.—If you will refer to an article in No. 59 of this Journal, "Summer Vegetables," you will find full directions for boiling cabbages, greens, cauliflowers, etc. We can only repeat what is there stated, that it is rarely necessary to use soda to preserve the colour of green vegetables. There are places where the water is hardly suitable for dietetic purposes, on account of the quantity of chalk it contains, and in such a case it may be necessary to use soda. London water is well adapted for culinary use, and soda is not required for boiling vegetables in any of that supplied by the various companies either within the metropolis or suburbs. Used in such quantities as some writers recommend—"a bit the size of a pea," for instance—the effect either one way or the other is of no consequence, but when, as is recommended by one authority, you use a teaspoonful of carbonate of soda to a gallon of water, the case is different. We maintain that soda draws into the water some of the finest and most useful properties of green vegetables, and, moreover, that the reason many people find them indigestible is because of this loss on the one hand, and of the addition of alkali on the other. Besides, there is no need whatever for the use of soda in boiling green vegetables. Have plenty of water, sufficient salt, and a perfectly bright clean saucepan, and not only will the greens be a fine colour, but there will be no unpleasant smell whilst they are cooking. 2. You are still in time to make your orange-wine. Will not your wine merchant supply you with a rum or brandy cask? Stone's orange and raisin wines are very useful for family use, and they are pure and wholesome.

JOSÉ.—There is no book published upon "Drawn Work," but it is explained and illustrated in the "Dictionary of Needlework," by S. F. A. Caulfeild, and B. C. Seward, published by L. Upcott Gill. There are also occasional designs in the Queen.

LEILA.—A masqueress is a very good costume for a fancy ball, and it is done in the following way. A swallow-tail coat and waistcoat of black satin is worn over a large white shirt-front, with a diamond solitaire and masquer collar. The skirt is quite plain, and rather short, and made of black satin; black silk stockings and patent-leather shoes, a crutch stick in the hand, and a pince-nez on the nose; the hair cut short and curly, and parted on one side.

L. G. D.—

He that lacks time to mourn lacks time to mend.
Eternity mourns that. 'Tis an ill cure
For life's worst ills to have no time to feel them.
Where sorrow's held intrusive and turned out,
There wisdom will not enter, nor true power,
Nor aught that dignifies humanity.

"Philip Van Artevelde," Part I., Act I., Sc. 5.

L. N.—Lodore is by Lake Derwentwater. Southey has immortalised the spot in a poem commencing, "How does the water come down at Lodore."

ONIONS.—The snake's skin ought to have been prepared, and should not have been folded. You had better consult a taxidermist, who may, perhaps, be able to do something for the skin.

PERPLEXED.—1. "Ramequins," or "Ramakins," are a mixture of Gloucester and Cheshire cheese, butter, eggs, and cream, with the inside of a French roll; they are baked in paper cases in a Dutch-oven, and eaten hot. 2. We do not know the derivation of the word. 3. Shield flourished in the earlier part of the century. He was one of our best song composers. The words of his celebrated song, "The Thorn," are generally attributed to Burns. There is, however, considerable doubt as to the authorship of the words of this song. It is not included in Alexander Smith's edition of Burns's works, nor in the Aldine Edition (Pickering, 1839). 4. We believe he is "Master of the Music" to the Queen. We do not know of any such office as "Composer to Her Majesty."

P. P.—An "Adullamite" is a member of a party of the more moderate Liberals who seceded from the Whig leaders and voted with the Conservatives on the occasion of Earl Russell and Mr. Gladstone introducing a measure for the reduction of the election franchise in 1866. They received the name from their being likened by Mr. Bright to the political outlaws who took refuge with David in the Cave of Adullam. The party was also known collectively as "The Cave."

PYGMALION.—Try first-class gentlemen's hosiers. If the work is exceptionally good, you may perhaps get orders.

RAVEN.—It can hardly be doubted that instances of premature interment have occurred, but it is impossible to judge of the authenticity of the records. The poem "On One Who Died in a Tomb" may probably have reference to the reported premature interment of a Mrs. Blunden, a lady of good position in Basingstoke, in the early part of the last century. The cause was supposed to have been that of taking a draught of laudanum in mistake, or in too large a quantity, which threw her into a lethargy, and was not discovered until after she was buried, when, as noises were said to be heard emanating from the tomb, the body was exhumed, but life was extinct, although it was proved that she had breathed, a dew being found on the inside of the coffin-lid:

Worn with old age and penury, nor thence Rescued by any man's beneficence,
Into this tomb with tottering steps I past,
And hardly here found leave to rest at last.
Usage for most doth after death provide Interment, I was buried ere I died.

SPES.—The verses are not worthy of publication.

THALIA.—"Rowlands' Kalydor" is highly recommended for your purpose.

WHY ABRAHAM?—To "sham Abraham" is to feign sickness, but the more received meaning is an impostor wandering about the country seeking alms under pretence of lunacy. Originally an Abraham-man was one of a set of mendicant lunatics from Bethlehem Hospital, London. The wards in the ancient Bedlam bore distinctive names as of some saint or patriarch. That named after Abraham was devoted to a class of lunatics who on certain days were permitted to go out begging. They bore a badge, and were known as Abraham-men. Many, however, assumed the badge without right, and begged, feigning lunacy.

NOTICE.

NOW READY, PRICE SIXPENCE,

PART XXXV. OF HOUSEHOLD WORDS,

Containing Serial Story, entitled "My Lord Conzett," "A Family Feud," a Story in Five Weekly Parts; and numerous Short Stories.

The Editor's Note-Book on Current Topics. Interesting Articles on Cookery, Gardening, The Family Doctor, Fashions, Music, etc.

AND SOMETHING SUITABLE FOR EVERY MEMBER OF THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

NOTICE.

The Fifth Volume of HOUSEHOLD WORDS, containing Nos. 106 to 131, bound in cloth, uniform with Vols. 1, 2, 3, and 4, can now be had, price 4s. 6d. Also Binding Cases (including Title and Index), price 1s. 6d. Title and Index may also be obtained separately, price 1d.

All back Numbers, Parts, Quarterly Divisions and Volumes, also the Extra Numbers, are in print; and may be had by ordering from any Bookseller, Newsagent, or Railway Bookstall, or should any difficulty be found in procuring from an Agent, enclose stamps for the amount, adding price of postage, addressed to the Publisher of HOUSEHOLD WORDS, 24, Great New Street, E.C., when the copies will be sent per return.

The Publishers of HOUSEHOLD WORDS will send Copies direct, post-free, to any address in the United Kingdom or the Continent, upon receipt of P.O.O. made payable at the Fleet Street Office, to Messrs. CHARLES DICKENS & EVANS, at the following rates:

Weekly.			Monthly.
	s.	d.		s.	d.
Three Months .. ..	1	8	Three Months .. ..	2	0
Six Months .. ..	3	3	Six Months .. ..	4	0
Twelve Months .. ..	6	6	Twelve Months .. ..	8	0

New Volumes commence the first week in May and November respectively.

All applications for Advertisements to be addressed to Mr. Joseph Smith, 24, Great New Street, E.C.

FAMILIAR IN THEIR MOUTHS AS HOUSEHOLD WORDS.—Shakespeare.

HOUSEHOLD WORDS,

No. 156.]

SATURDAY, APRIL 19, 1884.

[VOL. VI.]

Cruel as the Grave;

Or, The Dreary Winter.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

WICKHAM is a charming little village, nestled down in a hollow in the midst of a fertile country. There is a great wood sheltering it on one side, and a river flowing through. Doctors will tell you sometimes that it is not a wholesome place; that it is too sunk, too sheltered; but the people of Wickham have firm faith in its healthfulness, as well as its beauty.

As you cross the picturesque bridge over the river, you pass the old grey-stone church, with its crumbling tower and the strange carvings round its roof. What tales this old building could tell us! How many generations have worshipped within its weather-stained old walls!

Passing the church, and turning sharp round, we leave the gleaming river and the manor woods on our left hand, and come into the village, one straight, wide street, bordered on either side with a row of tall lime-trees, whose leaves are already yellowing in the still August sunshine.

Poppy Prendergast, looking out from the drawing-room window of the comfortable old rectory, sighs as a yellow leaf drifts in against her blue gown.

The beautiful fragrant summer is almost over, the child thinks. But Poppy never sighs for long. Presently she leaves the window, and goes downstairs, along the hall, and out of the glass door into the dear old garden.

All the houses in Wickham are noted for their delightful gardens. Everything is still, and sweet, and peaceful here. The old gardener is rolling the beautifully-kept strip of grass, with its blazing beds of scarlet geraniums, of blue lobelia, of calceolarias. He looks up with a smile as Poppy passes. The air is full of the perfume of mignonette. Up against the old red-brick house a purple clematis hangs, a glorious mass of colour; down on the sunny west wall plums are ripening; the jasmine is blooming in fragrant stars. There are long rows of tall, sentinel hollyhocks, every shade of purple, primrose, wine colour; of prim quilled dahlias.

Out in the centre of the grass-plot is a great, hoary old apple-tree, and every now and then a rosy apple comes dropping softly on to the grass, through the still sunshine.

Poppy loves that old apple-tree. She can remember August mornings, when she was a little girl; when, if she had been good at her lessons, she used to be allowed, as a reward, to go out and pick up the ripe red apples in her little white pinafore.

What happy days those seemed, looked at now from the heights of eighteen years!

Poppy crosses over the grass, and looks up through the gnarled old boughs at the blue sky above. She makes a pretty picture as she stands there, the sunshine flickering through the leaves on her bright head.

She is a tall girl, with, for all her youth, a certain stately, womanly way of carrying herself. She has soft, round, flushing cheeks, cheeks that, when she is pleased or excited, crimson up in such a wonderful way as to have long ago earned her her pet name of "Poppy." Mary is her real name. A sweet, red-lipped, childish mouth; honest, innocent, clear grey eyes, with curling black lashes and straight black brows. Not by any means a wonderful beauty; just a fresh, charming English girl in all the pride and glory of her untried youth; who, standing there in the peaceful sunshine amongst the flowers and birds, is wishing, in her vague, girlish way, for something—she knows not what—to happen, something that will break up the even tenor of her way.

"My dear boy, I am so sorry! What can I say?" Old Miss Spencer's kind, faded face was all flushed with emotion.

As Poppy stood under her tree, the old lady was coming down the path on the other side of the wall, leaning on her handsome nephew's arm. He had been making her a confidence. He had been going to be married, and the girl had jilted him, and the kind old maidenly heart was all yearning over her boy. "How could any woman find it in her heart to refuse him?" she thought, looking up at the handsome face, the tall, broad-shouldered figure beside her.

"Dear, dear boy!" she said softly, squeezing his arm affectionately.

Frank Ashpittall was very fond of these old aunts of his, who had brought him up, and whom he had not seen for seven years; he had been out in India, and only arrived at Wickham the night before, to have the fatted calf killed, the best robe fitted on to him by trembling old fingers.

His gloomy face relaxed a little; the love and kind words did him good. They soothed his self-love, and restored that old faith in himself which had been so sorely bruised. He patted the clinging old hand on his arm.

"Never mind, Aunt Dora," he said. "It won't break my heart. I dare say it will do me good. You have brought me up to think I can have everything I want." And then he went on with a sudden bitterness, slashing the head off a lovely purple dahlia, poor Aunt Dora's pride, as he spoke: "After all, what can you expect? All women are alike. She's married a man with ten thousand a year. How could you expect her to prefer me? 'She was made to shine in society,' her mother says. Women have no hearts nowadays; it's all a question of sale and barter with them."

"My dear boy!"

Kind Aunt Dora was horrified; she stooped for her dahlia, and looked at it carefully.

"Did I do that?" said Frank penitently. "Oh, Aunt Dora, I am very sorry. I must be more careful, or you must not trust me out with a stick."

"Never mind, Frank, it is not the least consequence," Aunt Dora answered heroically. Would she not have sacrificed all the dahlias in her garden to save this dear nephew of hers an ache? "But I can't bear to hear you speak like that. There are plenty of good, true women still left in the world."

"You and Aunt Sophie; I don't know many more. Ah, if they were all like you, the world would be a better place. If I could tell you all I have seen, the trickeries, and shams, and deceits—but you don't know. You judge everyone by yourself."

Aunt Dora sighed, but she smiled too. How could she help being gratified at being the exception to this very sweeping condemnation?

"Do you remember little Poppy Prendergast, Frank?" she said after a minute's silence, during which she was revolving many things in her simple old mind.

"Yes, of course. What a jolly, good-tempered little girl she used to be; she was always ready to do anything for me. Let me see, she must be nearly grown-up now."

"She is past eighteen."

"Ah, how time flies! What has she grown up like? Is she pretty?"

Frank asked this last question with more appearance of interest than might have been expected in a young man who had just renounced woman's society for evermore.

"I don't know," Miss Spencer answered cautiously. Not that she did not admire Poppy herself, but she did not know what this travelled, fine-gentleman nephew of hers might say, and so she was careful not to commit herself. "She has a nice complexion, and fine hair. She is a very good girl," she went on, letting her enthusiasm get the better of her. Long ago, before she had heard this episode of Madeline Ferrers, Miss Spencer had had her little plans and projects, but of course that was all over now.

Captain Ashpittall made no remark. He was not specially interested. Goodness in young ladies did not seem to him to possess any remarkable attraction. He had not met a great deal of it, he would tell you.

"Suppose we come in and see if she is at home," suggested his aunt. "It will be something for you to do, and Mr. Prendergast will be pleased to see you."

"As you like," Frank surrendered himself. "Ah, there is the same little gate, and there is where I used to swing my hammock," he said, kindling into some little interest as they stood down at the end of the garden by the gleaming river. "I think if this weather lasts I must rig one up there again."

"I will look up your old one. It was put by quite safely," said Aunt Dora. "We always come in this way, Poppy and I, to see each other," she went on, as she opened the little iron gate amongst the plum-trees, that led out into the rectory garden.

And so, while Poppy is wondering, and dreaming, and longing under the apple-tree, her fate is coming to her, could she but recognise it, up the sunny path by the hollyhocks, in the shape of this fair-haired, sunbrowned young man, who has been in the wars, who has been wounded, who has been even jilted. What more materials are wanted to make a perfect hero?

"There she is—there is Poppy! I thought we should find her," cried Aunt Dora in triumph, and she glanced askance at her nephew, to see if she could discover what he thought.

Frank Ashpittall looked with some curiosity. This was a very different type of girl from the one he believed had broken his heart and wrecked his life, but still the young man admitted to himself that in her blue gown, with her bronze-brown hair, her freshness and sweetness, she was a pleasant sight to look upon.

She came across the grass to meet them, flushing all over her soft cheeks.

"I thought we should find you here. My dear, you remember our nephew—you remember Frank."

"Oh yes!" Poppy held out her hand, and looked at him with her honest grey eyes. "We are all glad to see you back again."

"Thank you. I remember you quite well, Miss Prendergast, as you were then, a little girl with your hair all hanging down your back; I have just been telling my aunt I remember how good you used to be to me."

Poppy laughed softly.

"Yes, seven years make a great difference," she said.

"Does that mean you will not be good to me any longer?"

"Miss Spencer, it is such a lovely afternoon," and Poppy turned her back on him, "don't you think we might have tea on the grass? You would not be afraid? I will have rugs brought out."

"No, my dear, I am not afraid."

The old lady glanced up at the sky, and down at the grass. She much preferred her tea in a comfortable drawing-room, if she had her choice; but she was aware it was Poppy's way of keeping high festival, and she would not disappoint the child.

"It will be delightful!" declared Captain Ashpitall. "I will carry the tables and chairs for you, Miss Prendergast, if you will trust me. See, here is a delightful corner."

Poppy was in her element. She ordered tea; she searched for ripe plums, she picked some bright flowers for the centre of her gipsy-table. She laughed and chattered as she poured out tea in her harlequin cups.

It was a merry little feast. Frank was surprised to find how much he enjoyed it. He had been so long out of England; the peaceful rectory, the sunshiny garden, the bright girl's face, were all pleasant to him. For a little while he even forgot his cruel Madeline. This was a girl, he thought, looking into the honest grey eyes, who would be true to a man.

"And you have been wounded," she said, looking up at him reverentially. This man was the nearest approach to a hero she had ever seen in her short life.

And the old rector came across from his study, walking slowly. He had stooping shoulders, and snow-white hair, and a kind, careworn face. People said he looked as if he had seen a great deal of trouble. Poppy's mother had died at her birth; the girl was the youngest of a large family, who were all dead and gone—only the old man and the young girl were left.

But since he had come to Wickham ten years before, with his motherless girl, no one had ever heard him speak of those old days and those past troubles.

He was a shy, silent, reserved man, kind-hearted, courteous with all his flock, but never very familiar.

Poppy he simply idolised. All the pent-up love of his heart seemed to be poured out on this one child who had been left him. I don't think she ever missed another love; from the time she was born he was father and mother both to her, and if his love and care had not been enough, every woman and mother in the parish, rich and poor, high and low, had kind words and kind wishes to spare for her. She had grown up amongst them. They loved her bonnie, winsome, girlish ways. If she had a cold or a headache—for she was not very strong—everyone was troubled for her. She lived in an atmosphere of love, and peace, and kindness.

"Well, what do you think of her?" said Miss Spencer a little wistfully, as she and her nephew took their way home an hour later. "Some people call her nice-looking."

"Nice-looking!" said Captain Ashpitall emphatically. "I call her charming, so frank and unaffected too, without any of the airs and graces of town girls."

And so it began, and, of course, from the very first everyone knew how it would end.

The good people of Wickham looked anxiously at Miss Spencer's nephew, to see if he was worthy of such an honour, and one and all decided he was.

And the sweet, hazy, August days drifted by, and the child, in her quiet old home, flushed, and softened, and brightened, growing lovelier and sweeter every day. Something new had come into the world; she did not understand it all; she only knew that she was happier than she had ever been before.

The little gate at the end of the garden was always open now. Captain Ashpitall would stroll in of a morning, would find his way up to the old bench under the apple-tree, where Poppy was sure to be, or, if not there, down in the summer-house, or in the pretty, old-fashioned drawing-room. What did it matter where, so long as they were together?

Frank Ashpitall was handsome, well-bred, courteous, accomplished—just enough of an invalid still to be interesting. They sang duets together; they read poetry together—the "Idylls of the Kings," Mrs. Browning's sweet, passionate love-poems.

And one evening, scarcely a month after they had first met, they had all dined at the rectory. It was a still, fragrant night, with a great, golden, harvest moon rising over the lime-tree tops. The rector and the Miss Spencers sat over the pleasant wood-fire; the young people wandered up the garden to the moonlit, shimmering river, and there Frank told Poppy all the story of Madeline Ferrers. The girl's grey eyes were full of pity and wonder, perhaps, too, a little pain, as she raised them to his.

"Oh, how could she—how could she?" she breathed softly.

Frank's face flushed under that clear, innocent gaze.

"Don't be sorry for me, Miss Prendergast, unless, indeed—Poppy, I only told you because I should like you to know everything. I thought I cared for her a year ago, but I know now it was all a mistake, since I have seen you, since I have found out what the real thing is. Look up at me, dear."

He was holding her hand now, and they were standing still in the moonlight. Miss Spencer, wandering uneasily to the window, saw them, and went back quickly to the fireplace, and took up her knitting nervously.

"In spite of all that, Poppy, I can give you a whole heart's love.

Poppy darling, look up and say you can care for me."

And Poppy did not say a word, but she looked up at him with all her answer in her true eyes. Frank was her hero, her king amongst men. It seemed to the girl as if her happiness was almost more than she could bear.

"Are you sure," she whispered, a little later, as they made their way up to the house, "that you do not care for her now?"

"I am certain that I never cared for her—that I do not care for her now, certainly. I could never care for a woman who had once deceived me."

Frank spoke sternly; he had very rigid ideas of right and truth. Poppy shivered under his arm, she could not have told why.

"You are cold, my darling. I ought not to have let you stay out so long. You belong to me now. Poppy, Poppy, before we go in, give me one kiss of yourself, and tell me that you never cared for anyone else in all the world."

"Oh, don't you know it, Frank? How could I? Never for anyone else for one moment. It seems to me as if I had loved you all my life."

And so they were engaged, with everyone's full and free consent. The Miss Spencers were delighted, so was the whole parish. Mr. Prendergast was a little taken aback at first, he pished, and pshawed, and exclaimed, he rubbed his spectacles, and passed his hands through his white hair. Poppy was too young to think of such things, he said; why, only the other day she was a baby; but when it was conclusively proved to him that Poppy had thought of such things, that he was no longer all-sufficient for his little daughter's happiness, then he gave way readily enough.

There was really nothing to be urged against it. If she was to marry some day, Captain Ashpitall was about as good a husband as she could have. He was a gentleman in every sense of the word; he had plenty of money of his own; whatever his aunts had would come to him. Above all, there was no doubt at all of his love for Poppy, and hers for him. One stipulation only the old man made. They were not to be married for a year.

"Poppy is young. I have not had much comfort in my children; leave her to me a little longer—she is the last. Captain Ashpitall, she is very young, she has never heard a harsh word in her life. Will you be tender with her?"

Frank was much moved; he got up and took the old man's hand.

"Can't you trust me?" he said. "You don't know how I love her. You will never be sorry for having given her to me."

And he meant it. He had not known it was in him to care for anyone so much.

He was not perfection, this young man. The perfect man or woman has yet to be discovered in spite of our novelists. He was capable of loving deeply and truly, but he was of an intensely jealous, exacting nature. He would have all or nothing.

"Poppy is the very wife for him," said his aunts.

She simply worshipped him. Her trust, and faith, and belief in him were absolute. They were a perfect pair of lovers, everyone said.

"Let me see," said his aunt Dora, laughing at him, one day, "it is not a month since you declared there did not live a woman in the world who could be trusted."

"Ah, but I had not seen Poppy then; that was my ignorance. How could I tell? Poppy is like a piece of crystal. I could scarcely have believed it possible anyone could be so pure and true. It would be impossible to connect the least shadow of deceit with her."

"I must run up to town for a few weeks," said Captain Ashpitall.

August was over; it was the first week in September. "You must write to me every day. Why, Poppy!"

Poppy was crying. She had been strangely unlike herself these last few days. She looked pale, and there were shadows under her eyes, and she had a nervous, anxious manner.

"Why, Poppy, do you care so much?"

Frank was rather pleased, on the whole. He liked these tributes to his charms.

He drove off to the station in high good-humour with himself and all the world. And Poppy stole up to her room and watched him out of sight, and when he turned the corner over the bridge she threw herself down by her bed and cried and sobbed as if her heart would break.

It was a cold day; there was a chill wind blowing through the limes; the yellow leaves were drifting in showers against the windows. Her summer, her beautiful summer, was over, Poppy thought pitifully.

It was a month before Captain Ashpittall got back to Wickham; his business had taken him longer than he expected. He wrote to Poppy, and heard from her every day almost; he bought her a locket in town, and got his photograph in it, smiling to himself at the thought of how pleased she would be, how her cheeks would flush up and her eyes shine.

He had sent no word of his coming—he was fond of taking people by surprise. He walked out from the station, leaving his traps to follow. It was a close, damp day, with a grey fog lying low over the river; the trees were bare; the dark brown leaves lay in drifts on the ground.

Frank swung himself down over the low bridge wall to the narrow footpath that ran along the river at the end of the gardens. It was about the rectory dinner-hour, he knew; still, it was just possible he might see Poppy. "Dear, sweet little Poppy!" his pulse quickened at the thought of seeing her again. But the garden was empty, dark, and desolate. The bench under the apple-tree was almost lost in the mist, the flowers were withered and dead.

Frank turned to go, and, as he turned, came face to face with a man coming in the other direction. A tall, dashing-looking sort of man, with a dark, almost foreign-looking face—a stranger in Wickham evidently. He stared rather curiously at Frank, and made a kind of half bow.

"Who the deuce is he?" thought Captain Ashpittall impatiently, "and what is he doing down here?" It annoyed this young man excessively not to be able to understand everything. "Who was the fellow I met just now by the river?" he asked his aunt, when the first exclamations of surprise and welcome were over, and Aunt Dora, the housekeeper, had given her orders for some kind of meal to be prepared for "the Captain." "I am sure I never saw him before; he looks as if he might be a gentleman, and yet somehow I don't much like the look of him."

Aunt Dora glanced at Aunt Sophie, with something like a guilty flush on her face.

"Do you know him?" said her nephew, looking curiously from one to the other.

"Know him? Oh dear no! We did hear—they do say——" Aunt Sophie admonished her sister with a look. "He is quite a stranger. I believe he is staying up at old Mrs. Randall's, at the Mill Farm. He has come for his health, I suppose."

"Hum! Queer, out-of-the-way sort of place for him to come to;" and Captain Ashpittall dismissed the subject, to his aunts' great relief. A stranger in Wickham was quite an event, and this particular stranger had been a wonderful exercise to their minds.

"I will go up and see Poppy, Aunt Dora," Frank remarked a little later. "Have you seen much of her?"

Again Aunt Dora hesitated.

"Not quite so much as usual, but perhaps that is only natural, since you were not here."

"She's not looking at all well," put in Aunt Sophie, who was always an invalid herself, from her armchair. "You must take care of her, Frank."

"Not looking well? She said nothing to me."

Captain Ashpittall was put out; he did not understand his aunts. Poppy had no business not to be well. He was a young man who liked everyone belonging to him to be happy and prosperous; it reflected a certain credit on himself.

But he forgot all his vexations when he found himself in the cosy, rectory drawing-room, and Poppy, looking, he thought, lovelier than he had ever seen her before, in her soft black dress, with scarlet geraniums at her slim waist, and in the lace round her throat, came to meet him with a little joyful cry, and clung to him as she had never done before.

Mr. Prendergast was dozing over the fire; he roused up to speak to the young man, and then considerably took himself off to his study.

"Poppy, you don't deserve your name; what have you been doing to yourself while I have been away? You look quite pale, now I come to look at you."

Poppy flushed up redly enough, as she answered:

"I have had a little cold, I think, but I am quite well now. Don't say anything to father, he can't bear to think I should be ill."

"You will be all right now. You don't go out enough, Poppy. I wish you would come to me at once. Why must we wait a year?"

"Oh, Frank, we promised, and a year is nothing; it soon goes by."

"I don't think so." Frank was rather offended. "I think if you cared as much as I do—— Well, my darling, I did not mean that; but it is hard lines. Why shouldn't your father give up his parish and come and live with us?"

"I don't think he would like that."

"I can't, you know, be always running down here. I must be off in another fortnight."

"A fortnight! Oh, Frank!" The tears brimmed up in Poppy's grey eyes.

"You won't feel the time, you know," said Frank mischievously. "I will come back at Christmas. Why, Poppy, you little foolish child, I am not worth all that. I did not think you cared so much."

"Who is that fellow?" It was a few days later, a crisp October morning. Captain Ashpittall and Poppy were coming through the pine-woods, when, at the narrowest part of the path, they met the same stranger Frank had noticed before. He stood aside amongst the dead ferns to let them pass. He was less well-dressed than before; and it seemed to Frank that he had a cowed, broken-down sort of a look, as of a man with whom the world had not gone well.

He raised his hat with a courteous enough bow as they passed, and Poppy crimsoned up all over her face.

"Who is that fellow, Poppy? This is the second time I have met him."

"He is lodging up at Mrs. Randall's," Poppy said hesitatingly.

"So Aunt Dora told me; but who is he? It's most extraordinary that no one knows anything about him. Where does he come from? What is he doing here, of all places? What is his name?"

"Mr. West, he calls himself."

"Calls himself! He looks like a fellow, somehow, that had no right to any name. Do you know him, Poppy? I fancied he looked at you queerly."

"I have met him."

"And spoken to him?"

"Yes," said the girl. Her red colour had all faded away now; but she looked at the young man steadily, almost defiantly, with her great grey eyes. "There is no harm in speaking to him, Frank. I don't understand why you ask so many questions."

"Don't you? You are very young, Poppy; you are very pretty; you don't know the world. This fellow may be any kind of an adventurer."

"Surely, Frank, you can trust me."

"Trust you? Yes. If I could not trust you I could not love you. If I had to give up my faith in you, Poppy, I would give it up in every human being."

And so they made friends again after a fashion, and spoke no more of the stranger, but a shadow had fallen upon them. They walked the rest of the way almost in silence.

Frank was put out, he could not have told why. He could not have said what he suspected. He cursed himself for a fool, a distrustful idiot, and yet his suspicions would not be silenced. Poppy was changed, there was no doubt of that. She had grown absent and sad. Once he had come in upon her unexpectedly—she had been crying—she thrust some letters into her pocket. He had been used to boast to his aunt that he knew every thought of her heart—could he say so now? The doubt was a torture to him, and yet, such was the man's nature, that he could not help it.

Mrs. Bosanquet, the squire's wife, was giving a party.

Poppy was a great pet of hers. She had always promised the girl a "coming out" ball, and now she must certainly have one in honour of her engagement, and to introduce Captain Ashpittall to county society. Mrs. Bosanquet was one of the few people who were not quite charmed with Poppy's choice. She had had plans of her own; people said she wanted to marry the girl to her own son, a good-natured, heavy-featured young man. But, at all events, however that may be, she did not approve of Frank.

"He's handsome enough, and pleasant enough, I own," she would say with a little shrug of her fine shoulders, "and his aunts are great friends of mine; but, if I don't make a great mistake, he's hard, and unforgiving, and jealous-natured. Of course he's not jealous now, he has not been tried. Anyone can see that Poppy worships the very ground he walks on. I don't like that either; the most love ought to be on the man's side, it's safer, and Poppy is a tender plant."

But even Mrs. Bosanquet was obliged to own, the night of her dance, that Captain Ashpittall looked and behaved like the very beautiful of a young girl's lover.

He was the handsomest and the most distinguished-looking man in the room; and he was very tender and devoted to Poppy.

All the mists and shadows between them seemed to have cleared away that night. He was so proud of her beauty, and of the admiration she excited.

She was looking her loveliest, in some kind of pale, shining blue gown, a great bunch of purple passion-flowers at her bosom, a few of the same dusky flowers in her bright hair; her soft cheeks were blazing crimson, her grey eyes shining dark under their black brows.

"Who is she?" the men whispered; "she's the greatest beauty I have ever seen."

Old Miss Spencer, who had chaperoned her, was amazed at the sensation the girl created.

It was after supper, the band was playing a mournful, pathetic waltz tune; Miss Spencer was sitting in the great bay window, half hidden by the folds of the heavy curtain. Her nephew found her out there, and came and sat beside her. He looked very handsome, very well satisfied with himself.

"Tired, auntie? Where is Poppy, Aunt Dora? I have been looking for her everywhere."

"I don't know. Is she not dancing? I saw her a few minutes ago with John Bosanquet."

"Poor Bosanquet!" Frank laughed. He was the successful one, he could afford to be amused; this was not the kind of thing that made him jealous.

"You ought to be proud, Frank; she has had admiration enough to-night to turn any girl's head; but I don't believe she ever has a thought in her heart for any one but you."

"I don't believe she has," Ashpittall answered softly.

"Love me all in all, or not at all," was his motto. He had found all he wanted in Poppy. He would prove himself worthy of her great love and trust, he resolved.

A silence fell between them. The dancers whirled on to the plaintive, melancholy waltz-tune. Frank Ashpittall will not forget that tune as long as he lives.

Some ladies sat down on the other side of the curtain; they were talking over everybody and everything.

"The rector ought to be told," said one; "everyone is speaking of it."

"Does she really meet him?" said the other.

"My dear, it is quite certain. I am the last to mention a thing of this kind if I was not sure, but there is no doubt of it. She meets him up in the woods. I fear it has gone farther than we think."

"And Captain Ashpittall—"

"Oh, of course he knows nothing. No one could blame him for breaking with her."

Miss Spencer put out her hand and half rose from her chair, her nephew pressed her back again. His face was deadly white, his eyes were gleaming; it seemed to the young man that he had been listening to these voices all along.

"Jane told me she met them the other day. I never encourage servants' gossip, but—"

"He's a fine-looking man, rather foreign-looking, don't you think?"

"No good, you may depend upon it. What should he be doing here? When Captain Ashpittall was in London they used to meet every day. I did say a word to Miss Spencer, but you know she is quite infatuated about the girl; however, it has gone too far now. Something must be done, I don't like to see that nice fellow deceived. Shall we go into the conservatory? It is getting very warm here." And the two ladies, quite refreshed by such a delicious piece of gossip, shook out their rustling skirts and sailed away, quite unconscious of the pale listeners so close to them.

Miss Spencer sat trembling in her chair. She was afraid to look up. Her nephew laid a hand upon her shoulder.

"Is this true, Aunt Dora?" he whispered, and his voice sounded harsh and strange. "Have you heard this before? Tell me all the truth."

"Oh, Frank, Frank, I will tell you anything I know, but not here! I never believed it."

Frank made an impatient sound. He went and got a shawl from the cloak-room, put it round the trembling old lady, and drew her out on the terrace.

"Now."

"She did say, Frank—but you know what a gossip she is. I never listen to her."

"And you let me go on in ignorance, and all this time she has been deceiving me—deceiving us all."

"Perhaps it is not true, Frank. I cannot believe it."

"Not true? When it is in everyone's mouth? When I met him myself the very night I came home, prowling about the garden, I asked you, I asked Poppy. She put me off, but I suspected something. I knew something was wrong, I have felt it all the time." He crossed his arms over the balustrade, and leant his face down over them.

"You will not condemn her unheard, Frank. You will hear what she has to say. She is very young. She has no mother. She may have been thoughtless."

"Yes, I will hear what she has to say, and then—I will say good-bye to her."

The waltz was over. Someone was singing in the music-room. Long afterwards the words came back to Frank Ashpittall, though he listened now as one in a dream:

But ah! in the dreary winter,
I stood by a narrow grave,
And I saw within it a sweet face dead,
I'd have given my life to save.
But I knew my life could not waken
The life in that peaceful clay;
So I laid down my heart beside her,
And silently wandered away.

A cloaked, shrouded figure came hurrying along the dark path, and up the terrace steps. The light from one of the windows showed the flowers in her hair, the pale shimmering gleam of her dress.

Frank Ashpittall stepped forward, and stood in her way. The girl gave a low cry.

"Where have you been? Poppy, answer me!" His voice was low and stern, and the girl turned deathly white, and shivered from head to foot.

He put his hand on her shoulder and almost shook her.

"Have you been to meet that man?—tell me!"

Still she looked at him with wide, frightened eyes. Frank laughed aloud, a harsh, contemptuous laugh.

"And can you say that you have not met him over and over again? That while I was away you used to meet him every day? That your name—yours, my wife that was to be—is in everyone's mouth? I promised Aunt Dora I would hear what you had to say, and you have nothing to say, and so—"

"Oh, Frank, Frank, you are not going to leave me!" She spoke then. She held up her hands in piteous entreaty. "Frank, you will trust me?"

"Have I not trusted you, and have you not deceived me? I told you once, Poppy"—ah, how well she remembered it!—"that I could love no one who had once deceived me. And yet you are young," he went on more gently. "You may have been led away. I would not wish to be hard on you. If you would tell me!"

Poppy dropped her arms in a hopeless kind of way.

"I can tell you nothing," she said in a low voice. "If you will not trust me and believe me, Frank, I can say nothing."

"And you have been meeting him now?"

"Yes," the girl breathed rather than spoke.

"I might have known; I had my lesson before. Heaven forgive you, Poppy! You have done more harm than you know of."

She made no sound; she said no word more in her own defence.

"I can understand now the poor devils you read of, who shoot a woman or run a knife into her," said Frank passionately. "It would have been better for me to have seen you dead than hear this. I will say nothing to your father. You can tell him what you like." She gave a sort of sob—of relief it seemed—then. "I shall be off to-morrow by the first train. It was a bad day for me when I came here; and now." He took her in his arms and kissed her passionately, almost fiercely, once, twice, three times. "There, that is good-bye to the old times—to the girl I believed you to be."

Still she said no word. She endured his kisses passively. When he let her go, almost pushed her from him, she stood as if turned to stone. Only when he was gone, when the last sound of his steps had almost died away down the terrace, she gave a sort of low, gasping moan, and put her hand up to her throat; then she laughed strangely.

"Don't be afraid, Miss Spencer; I am not going to do anything. I think, don't you, that we had better go home?"

She did not cry, she made no complaint, she volunteered no explanation; Miss Spencer had not the heart to blame her.

It was a terrible ending to their happy evening.

"My dear," said kind Aunt Dora, as the carriage drew up at the rectory gates, "I cannot believe it; there is some mistake. If you would only tell Frank."

"Miss Spencer, I can tell him nothing," Poppy spoke with some spirit; "if he will not trust me, it must be all over. You heard what he said—that he could not love anyone who had once deceived him. I have deceived him; we have said good-bye, and it is all over now."

And so it was all over; there was no more to be said. Captain Ashpittall left Wickham by the first train, before anyone was astir. He enclosed a few lines to Poppy for her father, which she was to give him or not, as she saw fit.

Mr. Prendergast took it all placidly, he suspected nothing; he was deceived by Poppy's pretence of indifference, and, truth to tell, very pleased to think that his little daughter was all his own again.

"They had changed their minds," she told him, stroking his white head tenderly; "she was going to stay with him always now."

The Miss Spencers fretted themselves ill. Aunt Sophie took to her bed. Who would have thought it was all going to end like this?

It was a nine days' wonder in the place. People talked and talked, and began to look curiously at Poppy when she appeared in church, or walked about the village, her fair head held higher than usual, a new determined curve about her soft mouth. If she was heart-broken she would not show it. Not yet. It takes a great many tears, a great many sleepless nights, to wash the roses from young cheeks, the brightness from young eyes. Poppy would pay afterwards for the watch she kept on herself.

Only Mrs. Bosanquet would hear no word against her favourite.

"It was all Captain Ashpittall's jealousy and hardness; had she not always said so? Poppy was well rid of him. Meeting a man, indeed! And pray, if she had met him, what had become of him?"

A question that indeed no one could answer, for the stranger had disappeared as completely from Wickham, as if he had never been. Nothing more was heard or seen of him. "Miss Prendergast had fallen between two stools," said the malicious.

That was a dreary winter; there was a great deal of rain. The dead leaves lay in melancholy drifts about the streets; a thick, unwholesome mist hung low over the swollen river. Everyone had colds and coughs; the doctor had never been kept so busy. A change somehow seemed to have come over the pleasant little village. The green gate at the end of the rectory garden was never opened now.

Miss Spencer and Poppy paid each other formal visits. By a tacit understanding Frank's name was never mentioned between them. Miss Spencer had loved Poppy in her own way, but naturally she blamed her, for was not Frank her idol? But yet her tender heart yearned sometimes over the girl, who was young and motherless, and who must have been, kind Aunt Dora said, led astray.

And everywhere I see the room,
And all the weeping eyes;
And I hear the tender, terrible words
While my little one dies.

"Will you come home? Poppy is dying. She wants to see you. Lose no time."

This was the telegram Frank Ashpittall read at his club, one dreary morning a few days before Christmas.

He stared at the flimsy strip of paper, at the few scrawled words. It seemed as if he could not take it in for a minute.

Poppy dying—his beautiful, bright-faced Poppy! Captain Ashpittall had tried to persuade himself that his love for her was dead, that she had killed it herself that October night. But he knew now—he had known all the while—that love is not so easily killed.

Over and over again, in all the dreary days that had passed since he had last seen her, the thought would keep coming to him, had he been too harsh? Had he judged her wrongly? And now, standing with that awful telegram in his hand, it seemed to the young man that he would give all the rest of his life to undo the past, to hold Poppy once again in his arms, to know that she was his, and his alone.

Our lives! This is the way we talk in our ignorance. We are ready to give what is not required of us, what is not ours to give. We withhold what is expected—a little trust, a little faith, a little patience.

It was late on the winter's night when Frank Ashpittall reached Wickham. Never had a train seemed so slow.

The rectory carriage met him. "His young mistress was the same," the old man-servant said in a moved voice. "The doctor gave no hopes. She had been failing for the last month. She was never very strong."

How cold and chill the rectory looked, with the shadow of death brooding over it! A red-eyed housemaid let him in, and led the way to the drawing-room, where a fire was burning, and Poppy's chair and work-table pushed away into a corner.

Frank Ashpittall laid his face down against the cushions of the chair for a moment.

The rector came blundering in, looking ten years older. He did not take the young man's offered hand; he did not understand it all, but in a confused sort of way he connected him with the present trouble.

It was so sudden, so unexpected. Poppy had taken a cold, no worse than she had often had; but the doctor said she seemed to have no strength to rally from it, and now she was dying.

"She heard you coming, she expects you. Will you go to her now?"

As in a dream Frank followed him up the low, wide staircase, along the passage, into the bright girl's room, with all its pictures and photographs and little valueless trifles. The lamp was burning low. Someone was sitting over the fire—a man, who got up and went out as they came in. Frank saw nothing, noticed nothing but the little white bed in the corner, the wasted face, the great grey eyes that lit up with the ghost of their old love-light as he came in.

"Oh, Poppy, Poppy!"

Mr. Prendergast had gone, and they two were alone together once more.

"Frank, you have come—you are good to come! Frank, I could not die without telling you it was all a mistake. That man was my brother. Poor Tom! I may tell you now."

Frank Ashpittall was down on his knees by the bed.

"Your brother! Oh, Poppy, how could I tell? My darling, my darling! can you ever forgive me?"

The wasted little hand was stroking his hair with its old caressing gesture. Strong man as he was, Captain Ashpittall sobbed aloud.

"Don't, Frank, don't; I can't bear it if you do. Then you do love me still, Frank?"

"As my own life. Oh, Poppy, you do not doubt it, my darling?"

"Put your arms round me, Frank, and I will tell you. You will stay with me to the end, won't you? It has been so hard without you."

The sweet voice was very weak and low. Frank put his arms round her, and held her close. It seemed to him as if his love and his repentance must be strong enough to keep her even from death.

"Poor Tom! he was always wild. I understand it more now. They said he broke my mother's heart, and father cast him off. I used to be so fond of him, I remember, long ago, when I was a little child in Cambridge, and he was at college. I had not seen him since, and I thought he was dead; and then he wrote to me last September. It was a few days before you went away, I remember. He was going to Australia, he said; but he could not go without seeing us again. I was to let him know if father would forgive him. Poor Tom! he said it was so hard to be cast out from home, and he was so tired of it all. He was so changed, no one would have known him. Father passed him once on the road. He used to come to the end of the garden, and I used to go out to him. He was so sorry for everything; he promised me that, once he was in a new country, he would do better. Once I spoke to father about him, but he was very angry, and forbade me to mention his name again; and so that night of Mrs. Bosanquet's ball, he came to say good-bye to me."

Frank groaned.

"Oh, Poppy, Poppy! if you had but told me."

"I could not, Frank; I promised him not; but now it is all right. Father has forgiven him. I told him everything, and when I am dead, Tom has promised me to be a comfort to him."

"Poppy, you are not going to die; I cannot bear to let you go!"

"Poor Frank! I must go. God knows best."

The child seemed to have no strength left her for great grief. She had given all her true heart's love to this man. No one but herself knew what she had suffered when he left her.

But it was all over now; a great peace and calm seemed to have come to the weary, bruised spirit. Within sight of the Eternal Love, human love shows very small and weak; and Frank realised with an agony in his heart—such as he had not felt in all his thirty years—that he might lavish all his love in vain now. He was powerless to call her back to life; she was drifting slowly out on an ocean where her nearest and dearest could not follow her. He never left her again. Father and brother came and went; doctors and nurses took their turn of watching; but there, all through the still night, patient and untiring, Frank Ashpittall sat.

She was very quiet and patient, she had no pain or ache. Sometimes her mind wandered a little. She would fancy herself back in the sunny garden with Frank; once she cried out and begged him "to trust her, not to leave her."

"I am here, my darling; I will never leave you," said Frank. And she opened her sweet eyes on him with recognition.

What more is there to tell of her? In real life people do not, as a rule, say any wonderful last words, and neither did my poor Poppy.

In the late grey dawn of the winter's morning there came a change, and while they all knelt round her—the broken-hearted father, the brother, the lover, who had loved her so well, and yet had left her—she passed away gently, quietly, peacefully, as she had lived.

"Poor Poppy!" I say; and yet, while we mourn for her, shall we wish her back again in life? I think not. She was too fragile a blossom for this hard, workaday world. As long as the summer of love and kindness lasted she bloomed bravely, but the first blast of the dreary winter of harshness and mistrust laid her low. Her short, sweet life, her sad death, have not been in vain. For her sake, the poor prodigal brother, who had been the means of bringing her so much sorrow, has vowed, with God's help, to become a better man, to do his best in the future, to atone for the bitter past. Through Captain Ashpittall's influence, he has got an appointment in London, and there the poor broken-hearted father has gone with him—broken-hearted, and yet with a new peace and hope in his heart, for if Poppy has been taken from him, yet is not his first-born given back?

Kind old Aunt Dora and Aunt Sophie talk often through their tears of the dead girl's beauty and goodness. Mrs. Bosanquet tells the new rector "that she was little short of an angel." But it is Frank Ashpittall who misses her most. Poor Frank, who feels that a lifetime of sorrow can never undo the past, can never give him back what he has lost. He rose from Poppy's deathbed a changed man. He saw it all then—all his hardness, his jealousy, his suspicion; and every day, every hour he lives, he thinks of his lost love, and prays that he may be forgiven for that harsh judgment, and that one day he may grow worthier of that true, faithful girl's heart.

Primrose Time.

THE birds are singing to their mates
From every budding spray,
And swift to heaven's golden gates
The swallow wings his way;
The rook to-day in noisy throng,
Is building on the lime;
The thrush proclaims in tuneful song
'Tis primrose-time!

A maiden sits beneath the gate
That bounds her father's farm,
Her mind intent to fill the crate
That hangs upon her arm,
With hyacinth and daffodils,
And violets in their prime;
Each flower the air with perfume fills
In primrose-time.

A stranger came and saw the maid,
And though of high degree,
His aimless stroll he straightway stayed,
For she was fair to see;
He thought to while the sunny hours
All innocent of crime,
Yet hearts are gathered oft with flowers
In primrose-time.

And oft they met beside the gate,
Or by the river's brim,
Until she found when—ah, too late!
Her heart was lost to him.
He'd wed the maid he oft did say,
When back from foreign clime;
He loved—alas!—but rode away
In primrose-time.

A year has gone, the snowdrop pale
Has burst its winter sheath,
And all throughout the woodland vale
It weaves its dainty wreath.
But still the lover cometh not
Back from that foreign clime;
He surely can't have yet forgot
That primrose-time!

Alas! his sire had sternly claimed
Allegiance to his birth;
He felt no shame to be ashamed
Whate'er the maiden's worth.
Spring, summer, autumn, passed away,
And now the winter's rime
Has decked the trees with jewelled spray
Ere primrose-time.

At last, at last! his hand is free—
His sire has gone to rest,
Where pride of birth can never be
A passport to the blest;
Then haste, true heart, seek out thy love,
Pray thou be there betime,
And angels waft thy prayers above
In primrose-time.

Alas! 'tis there thy prayers must fly,
Thou ne'er wilt see her more,
She whom thou loved'st in days gone by
Is on the distant shore.
A mound beneath the old yew-tree,
A wreath with loving rhyme,
Is all that there is left to thee
Of primrose-time.

"My Lord Conceit."

(A SERIAL STORY.)

By the Author of "FRAGOLETTA," "DAME DURDEN," &c., &c.

Book VII.

CHAPTER I. LEARNING TO FORGET.

It was a hard life and a reckless life to which Ivor Grant had bound himself, when he entered the Mexican cavalry.

Not till he was far out of sight of English land and English skies did he discover that the faithful lad, who had vowed such devoted service, was also a passenger in the same vessel, and was recklessly and obstinately determined to follow his fortunes, no matter where they might lead.

Ivor was deeply touched by the lad's pertinacity. "You may send me away, sir, but you can't prevent me following you," was all Tom would say to his remonstrances, and with something more akin to gladness than he had felt for many a long day, Ivor looked at the honest, rugged face, and knew he had one friend at least who valued him for what he was, not for what he owned.

His troubles weighed heavily upon him still. It seemed as if he shaped his actions and lived his life by some sheer mechanical instinct. Where men's lives were most needed and of least account, where the fiercest clang of warfare rang out, where recklessness and courage seemed but synonymous terms, thither he took his way, and his past military experience served him in good stead. He had no ambition, he had no hopes of any future better or brighter than this dull present; he knew that a soldier's grave under some foreign clay was all he could look forward to, and he almost prayed that that rest might come speedily, as the desolate days rolled on, and Time still held for him only those maddening memories of a happiness brief as any dream, and, like a dream, delusive.

In after years—looking back on this portion of his life—he used to wonder with a shudder how he had ever lived through those first awful months, performing the routine of duty, ready at any moment to face the hardships and perils of his calling, yet bearing within his heart, each hour he lived, the well-nigh intolerable anguish, that nothing seemed to lighten or to ease.

Days came and went; suns rose and set; duties and obligations pressed hard upon him, and clamoured for fulfilment; and he shirked nothing, avoided nothing, feared nothing, though there were nights when he could only stagger to his bed in barracks, or in camp, with a sick and heavy horror of the day and all that it had brought, and wonder dumbly how such misery could be borne, and yet not kill.

It seemed at last as if his own powers of endurance brought with them a sort of hopeless faith in himself, as if there must be something yet in life to live for, since that life was so hard to destroy. It was in such moments, his weakest, and, as he told himself, his worst, that the allurements and sweetness of his hopeless love were nearest to his heart, that he saw ever before his aching eyes that one sweet woman face before which all others paled into darkness and insignificance. How persistently it haunted him; how in the dark and lonely hours when he lay wakeful and gazing at the quiet stars, as she too might be gazing in that far-off land, he seemed to recall her voice, her looks, her smile; each meeting that had been so precious and so brief, down to that last interview in the quiet churchyard, when he had touched her hand in sorrowful farewell, and listened to her last, low, broken words.

At times, too, he looked at himself with a sense of pained unfamiliarity, as if that brown haggard face were not his own, and found himself wondering how the bright hair, which had been his mother's pride, could have become so thickly sown with grey.

"My youth has all gone now," he thought bitterly. "Well, I ought not to complain. It was pleasant enough, and I enjoyed it while it lasted. I wonder—I wonder how old I shall be before I learn to forget!"

He had a little picture of Beryl—a picture she had given him that happy springtime—which he always associated with rosy dawns and cowslip meadows, and the solemn baby-face of little Jack. It had never left him since, and sometimes he would take it out and gaze at it under the brilliant tropical midnight skies, until his aching eyes could see it no longer.

He had told her it was too sad for her. She had always seemed so bright and happy a creature then. He never looked at the face now but he seemed to hear her jesting words, the words that her eyes belied: "All women wear masks, you know. Perhaps my real self is a sadder one than you imagine, or I am getting a little tired of smiles."

A little tired of smiles! Ah, they had not lasted long—not very long. Was she tired of them now? Would she ever again be the radiant, beautiful goddess of his dreams—standing midway between earth and heaven, in that brief charmed pause that held the daylight from the dawn? Never again—oh, never again! He knew that, better than any words could tell him; knew it as the picture faded from his sight in a mist of tears, that all the strength of manhood could not check—such tears as a man can shed but once in a lifetime for sake of some woman lost and loved “not wisely but too well.”

A rough life and a hard life had Ivor Grant led, fighting under a strange flag, and fighting, too, amidst and against fierce and half-barbarous savages.

He felt he had nothing in common with them, and they seemed to feel it also. Many a time, if it had not been for Tom, Ivor would have flung himself defenceless into the midst of carnage, so only that his life and his sorrow might end for ever. But the thought of that faithful friend who had followed his fortunes, or rather misfortunes, kept him from such utter desperation, and nerved him also to bear a life that was irksome and toilsome in the extreme—an incessant witness of tyrannies and cruelties, varied by fierce outbursts of warfare that let loose the worst passions of the impulsive, passionate race whose service he had joined—a race who fought like tigers, and triumphed like fiends; who reeled across a battlefield blind and drunk with bloodthirst and rapine, caring as little for the lives they took, and the bodies they trampled on and plundered, as they cared for the beaten-down grass, or crushed herbage, that marked their path to victory.

He had been wounded several times, but never very severely. At last, however, he was ordered on an expedition of more than usual danger, and to a part of the country quite unknown to him.

Halfway on the route his squadron was attacked by a force of the enemy that nearly trebled their own.

After almost superhuman exertions to make the best of his position, Ivor found that his men were growing utterly insubordinate. Some threw down their weapons, some clamoured for mercy; most of them fled like sheep, and Ivor himself received a wound that for once seemed likely to bring him that death for which his weary heart had prayed so long. He was left for dead, lying like a felled tree under his slaughtered charger, and there Tom found him after hours of patient search, when he came back with the reinforcements for which the fugitives had prayed.

It had been a horrible scene and a horrible time to the faithful lad, that rapid ride, that agonised search where the dead lay piled ten or twelve deep in many cases, under the burning midday sky.

And there among mangled limbs of men and horses he discovered Ivor at last.

For a few moments he thought he was dead, but as he drew him from out of that suffocating pressure, and bore him into the shade of an adjoining wood, Ivor opened his eyes and sighed faintly. Tom laid him down and gave him some brandy with which he had provided himself, and then rushed off to find the regimental surgeon, who was already going on his dreary rounds over that field of carnage.

Ere they reached him Ivor had again relapsed into insensibility, and in that state he was placed in the mule-cart which had been brought thither for the wounded, and taken back to the camp.

For long, long days afterwards he knew nothing of what went on about him. It was a gunshot wound that had laid him helpless at the mercy of his foe, and it held him helpless still, baffling the rude skill of surgeons, and wearing his life down to the last extremity of weakness. And Tom watched him, faithful to his trust; and at last a desperate resolve took possession of him. He must get his master away, get him to the nearest town where proper medical advice and attendance could be procured. He and a few of the more slightly wounded men had been left to attend to the sick while the rest of the troops pushed on, eager for revenge on the foe who had entrapped and then eluded them, and were now safe in one of their own lawless fastnesses in the wild mountains.

Tom had always been more famous for military insubordination than for military prowess. He considered that he and his master were thrown away upon the half-savage and brutalised beings, of whom the greater part of the army of Mexico was composed. True they had a kind of desperate courage and foolhardiness—they were fierce and bold when their blood was up, and could fight like lions; but then like lions they were equally ready to tear each other to pieces over a disputed carcase that formed their share of plunder, or the loot that was the only glory their brutal victories achieved. Over and over again had Tom wondered how that refined and cultured nature of Ivor Grant's could accustom itself or content itself in such a life, among such a set; and, when it was a question of life or death, when this valued and beloved existence was at stake, he wasted no time over imaginary points of honour, but one night took the liberty of helping himself to a cart and mule, and with Ivor carefully concealed under some straw and cloaks at the bottom of the said cart, he made his way to the nearest town.

Ivor was too ill then, and for long after, to heed or note what happened.

Indeed, Tom could never give any very clear account of how he got to Vera Cruz, but get there he certainly did, and receiving fresh assurance from each doctor he saw, of the necessity of getting his master to England—to England he resolved to take him.

It was not until he had reached the Mexican capital that the full danger of his actions seemed to dawn upon him. He knew that he was ostensibly a deserter, and that his life was in peril every hour. But he took the precaution of discarding his uniform at an early date, and gave out that he and his master had been set upon by brigands in one of the mountain districts.

In the disturbed state of the country his story was easily credited, and having once thrown off his military responsibilities, he troubled himself in no way as to penalties, or pains.

When Ivor Grant was sufficiently recovered to ask questions, Tom informed him that they had both been discharged as useless, and he was too wearied and too weak to trouble himself about details. The peace and quiet, the sight of the blue water, the scent of the cool salt breeze, were like magic to him. He drank in health and strength, he revelled once again in liberty; beside the martyrdom of those three past years, the present looked like a dream of paradise.

Unquestioning he accepted the strangeness of this freedom, thinking only to himself: “The world is wide, I can soon find other service if I try.”

Before they sighted English land he had another relapse, so serious a one that the ship's doctor was alarmed, and told Tom it was necessary to his master's life that the bullet should be found and extracted. As yet this had not been done, for the operation was too difficult and intricate a one for the rough surgical skill that Tom's limited resources had alone been able to command. Once in England, however, he resolved to find out the cleverest surgeon possible, and entreat and persuade him to attend to his master, even if he had not the means to pay for such attendance all at once. He did not doubt for a moment that he could raise funds. He remembered Beryl Marsden; he had a vague idea that she was rich; and there was Colonel Dunbar, his master's old friend—between them they would manage to do all that was necessary, he felt sure of it.

The one thing was to get him to London, and in face of all obstacles and difficulties, by sheer force of resolution, and, perhaps, a touch of that British obstinacy of which Tom had a full share, he succeeded in accomplishing this portion of his enterprise. His funds were at a very low ebb indeed, so low that he could only procure a very humble lodging; but Ivor was far too weak and exhausted to be scrupulous.

“So far, so good,” said Tom to himself, having seen his master comfortably in bed after the long dreary journey from Southampton.

Then, having administered some warm soup to the exhausted man, and seen him fairly asleep, he took himself out on a double quest—one, to find out if Colonel Dunbar was at his club in town, the other to leave Ivor's last valuable—a seal-ring—in trust, at the nearest pawnshop.

“The exchequer's low—very low,” Tom said to himself with a grim amusement at the position he occupied in regard to the management and administration of the said exchequer; “but I suppose 'twill all come right soon. They say when things is at their worst they begin to mend. I don't see myself as how things can be much worse with my master and me than they are at this here present moment. Whew! how it do rain in this blessed old country! 'Twas raining when I left it; 'tis raining now I've come back to it. Wonder if they've had a peep of the sun since I left? I shouldn't think so from the look of things. I—— Well I'm blest!”

The breaking off of his soliloquy and the subsequent exclamation were occasioned by an event so sudden and so unexpected that it drove all thoughts of wind and weather out of his head—drove them out with that sudden extinction of minor discomforts that a great surprise or a great joy brings, and it seemed as if both of these had met and mingled for one brief moment's space, as Tom, after all these years of hardship and trial, looked back once again at a face associated in his mind with the saddest and sweetest memory of his life.

CHAPTER II. THE POWER OF THE LAW SET AT NAUGHT.

It was four days after that interview in John Marsden's rooms. The winter night had closed in darkly, with stormy gusts of wind and rain, and the occupant of those gloomy chambers sat by the fire, shivering at every blast, and grumbling, “not loud, but deep,” at the abominations of the English climate.

The table beside him was littered with law-books and law-papers, and mysterious documents bound in red tape, and looking horribly uninteresting, though one and all those things represented the machinery of that mighty engine which chance had set at work in his favour, and whose laboured beats bore for him the musical sounds of fortune.

It was as one of the noisiest and stormiest blasts was shaking the windows, and rattling against the doors, that a knock came to the door of his own room. He did not hear it, and, without waiting to repeat the summons, the visitor turned the handle and entered.

John Marsden started to his feet with a low cry of terror as a cold hand touched his shoulder, and he saw behind him a cloaked and shrouded figure—the figure of a woman.

"Have I startled you? I knocked, but no one answered," she said, speaking low and hurriedly, as if eager to get rid of the words.

"Good Heavens, Beryl! You! Whatever brings you here?"

She sank down on a chair beside the fire, and unloosed her heavy cloak.

"I—I have come," she said in the same nervous, hurried way, "to bring you the papers."

He looked at her in blank astonishment.

"You have grown sensible at last. Is that what you mean? Why couldn't you give them up sooner?"

"I don't know," she said wearily.

She had thrown aside her veil, and her face was white as death, but her eyes looked wild and fevered, and John Marsden noted, with a hock of surprise, how altered and how ill she looked.

"I have been very ill," she went on presently.

"When did you leave the Abbey?" he asked brusquely. She shuddered.

"Yesterday," she answered. "It has grown unbearable, insupportable. I—I could not stop, and I thought it was no use to hold out; the lawyers say the case is clear enough. These," and she handed him some yellow, faded papers, "are what they wanted. The certificate of my mother's birth and marriage. They were in my father's desk. I don't think he knew or even guessed that she was related to the Grants. It was a runaway marriage, you know, and her people never forgave her."

"And may I ask why you have thought fit to oppose what was your lawful right, and mine?"

"Yours!" Her white face flushed crimson; she looked at him with a scorn and defiance that no words could have portrayed. "I thought your wish for a reconciliation was not quite disinterested. You have played your cards very well, John Marsden."

"Yes," he said coolly, "I think I have; and I'm glad you've come to your senses. I didn't want to use force. Well, this settles the matter. There's nothing to prevent us from going down to Grantham Court and taking possession as soon as we like. When will you be ready?"

She shuddered, and half rose to her feet.

"I— Oh, don't ask me—don't force me to go. The place is full of haunted memories to me. You—you can't understand."

"No," he said brutally, "I can't, and I don't wish to. Put all that sentimental bosh out of your mind, for you've got to come there, and to come with me. I've a fancy for playing the country squire, and I've a fancy that you should see me do it."

She sank back again on her seat, and pressed her hands against her heart as if to still its laboured beats.

"Don't be too hard on me, John," she said in a strange, suppressed voice. "If it's the money you need, take it and welcome. I don't care for it. I don't need it. But I can't and live at the Court. I can't feel it is mine—not in the face of all the wills, and all the laws that ever were framed."

"But I mean that you shall do it," he said doggedly; "and the law is on my side, I fancy."

"Law!" she cried passionately; "it is always that—it is always that. It is well you don't say justice, well you don't call this selfish tyranny by its right name. Law! What does it care for a woman's sufferings—shame—agony; for the brutal force that seizes her life and holds it in a prison from which she cannot escape? You stand there, you call yourself my husband, and you know you have not one spark of tenderness, one thought that is worthy the name, one feeling that is due to the rights you claim. You have tyrannised over me, neglected, degraded, deserted me. You came with a hypocrite's pretence of sorrow, and won a promise that I believed it was my duty to give. I might have known better than to be deceived so easily, but for a time I was deceived; and now I see you in your true colours, now I know what your wish for reconciliation concealed; and since I know it, I have come here to-night to tell you one thing. You may have my property, my money—everything that the law gives—the law that men made for men—but do not force me to live under your roof. It cannot benefit you now—it is only added misery to me."

She looked so beautiful, so queenly in that outraged dignity of the womanhood she defended, that for a moment John Marsden stood looking at her perfectly stupefied.

He was not alone in his amazement—another spectator stood in the doorway lost in reluctant admiration of the scene he had witnessed, but neither husband nor wife were aware of his presence.

"You—you—how dare you talk to me like that?" blustered John Marsden at length. "I tell you now, as I told you before, that very few husbands would have behaved as generously as I did. I could have taken proceedings against you. Why, I could have had a divorce, madam, had I chosen! I—I—"

"Yes?" she said calmly. "Then why did you not choose? Does it never occur to you that I might ask how those three years in India were spent by you?"

"She is superb!" muttered the listener under his breath. "To think of a woman like that being thrown away upon a wizened little ape with no more brains than an empty cocoanut!"

"That has nothing to do with you," said John Marsden defiantly. "A man can do what he chooses, especially if his wife goes and leaves him like you did."

"I wrote and asked you if I might return to India. You forget that, and your answer. If I had grown utterly reckless, if I had yielded to a temptation that lay close at my hand, into which you, the man who should have defended me, wantonly cast me for your own selfish ends, I fancy you would have had no right to complain of me to-day."

He was silent. Well enough he knew she spoke the truth. Well enough he knew that even the law, in whose strength he trusted so implicitly, would scarcely have vindicated conduct such as his in the eyes of the world.

"Why—why do you come and say all this now?" he said at last. "We agreed to be friends. I want nothing more of you. Can't you bury bygones, and let us be at peace?"

"I say it," she answered coldly, "because you have deceived me again. You left India with a settled purpose; you sought me with that purpose; you won me over by pleading my duty, and all the time you knew you only wanted to save appearances—that it was my money, my new position, which gave me any importance in your eyes. But for them you would never have troubled me. You and your hateful spy played your cards well, but not quite well enough to deceive me. When I thought you were poor, ill, lonely, that you were even a little sorry for all I had had to bear, it was a different matter. I would have come to you then, and, in time, I might even have grown more gentle and forbearing than I seem to have been. At least you are the father of my children, and I can't forget that. But what can I say of your conduct now, except that it is on a par with all that has gone before; that I cannot excuse it, I cannot forget it, that since it is the Court you desire, you may have the Court, have everything I possess—everything to which the law entitles you. But at least be content with that, and leave me in peace."

"Will you give me those papers?" he said huskily.

She handed them to him without a word. He glanced over their contents, then opened a drawer in his writing-table and placed them within, and locked the drawer again.

"Now, madam," he said defiantly, "you have given me your views of the case, listen to mine. The moment Grantham Court becomes ours—you need not start; I am quite justified in using that pronoun—the moment we are entitled to take possession, you will be prepared to accompany me thither. Considering you are the daughter of a clergyman, and have always set up for being a religious woman, your views as regards wifely duty seem rather lax. But that duty shall be enforced to the uttermost, so I swear. I am not used to being thwarted or contradicted, either by man or woman, and I'm not likely to submit to it from you! The matrimonial knot is not an easy one to slip out of, and I intend it shall be firm enough to hold you whether you desire it or not. Now, I have said all that is necessary. You may return to Vaux Abbey, if you choose; but hold yourself in readiness to obey me, whenever you hear that matters are settled, and that I am going to take possession of the Court."

"You fool!" The exclamation was so unexpected—so full of scorn and contempt, that Beryl Marsden was no less startled than her husband, as she too faced the doorway and saw from whom the interruption had proceeded.

"So, count, you are at your old work!" she said with cutting emphasis. "Do you still find it remunerative?"

The pale face flushed ever so slightly, but he advanced a few paces and addressed John Marsden with a cool disregard of Beryl's presence that was in itself an insult.

"You should never trample on a fallen foe, my good John," he said calmly; "and you should never lose your temper with a woman. Mrs. Marsden has become sensible, I presume, or she would not be here. For the rest, it will surely be to her own interest to look after her own property, if only to save it from the desecrating touch of alteration and—improvement. The Court is quite open to both."

She turned on him like a tigress.

"If you dare," she cried—"if you dare to touch a stone, to alter a room, to—"

His mocking laugh cut short her words.

"Dare! Strange word, madame. Do you intend to defy your husband? My good friend here can do what he pleases within and without the Court once he is the ostensible possessor. Perhaps, when you think the matter calmly over, you will come to the conclusion that it would be more advantageous to reside there yourself, painful as its associations may be."

She stood there with her hand on the back of the chair from which she had risen, and looked at the face of her antagonist. For one instant her courage seemed to fail; for one instant the light, and strength, and defiance faded out of her face, and her voice broke forth in a woman's last resource—appeal.

"What harm have I ever done to you," she cried piteously, "that you should persecute me thus?"

A flash that looked like triumph shone in Count Savona's dark eyes. To see her weak, strengthless, appealing, was a triumph he had scarcely expected.

"Madame," he said with a low bow, "I do not persecute you. Far from it. I am but an instrument of Fate, and I would advise you for the best, if you would only allow me. But, like so many of your charming sex, you are impetuous, you are self-willed, you will not listen to reason. You have chosen to look upon me as an enemy; you will not believe that I am your friend."

"No," she interrupted with a return of the old indignation, the old proud defiance; "your friendship, Count Savona, is little less dangerous than your enmity."

"It is my misfortune, madame, that you have always misjudged me," he said mockingly. Then he turned to John Marsden with a dark frown and a swift change of manner. "Have you said all you wish?" he asked.

"Yes," answered Marsden hesitatingly. "I—she—you have heard my decision, Beryl. You will be prepared to obey it when necessary."

She looked not at him, but at the glittering eyes of the count, and her courage failed. What could she do, one woman against two such merciless adversaries?

"When—necessary!" she echoed faintly. "Yes, I will be prepared to obey you when necessary."

She moved away unsteadily, in an odd, dazed fashion, like one in a dream. Indeed, in looking back in the after days, this scene did seem to her like a dream—an evil one enough, with a nightmare-like horror attending upon it that filled her mind with terror.

The count followed her to the door.

"I will see you down the stairs," he said politely.

She shuddered, and drew back as if he were some noxious thing.

"No," she cried impulsively. "There is no need. I—I mean I have a cab waiting."

"Very well, madame," he said, and bowed, and returned to the room, leaving her to make her way alone down the dark and narrow stairs.

As she reached the first landing something dark and shadowy seemed to shrink back into its gloomiest corner; something that in her perturbed state of mind she scarcely noted. She reached the outer door, and for a moment stood alone on the threshold, while the rain fell in plashing, noisy sheets, and the wind moaned and whistled around the dreary houses, and the dreary street.

The driver sitting shivering on his box noted that hesitation, that upward glance at the windows, that utter indifference to the discomfort of the elements, so significant of a preoccupied mind. And someone else noted it, a solitary figure, bronzed and worn-looking—the figure of a man in tattered foreign garb, who was passing through the street. Perhaps the fact of his so noticing it, or some instinct or impulse impossible to define, stayed his hurrying steps, and led him to approach the cab and the grumbling driver.

He laid his hand on the handle to open the door for the lady—he felt she was a lady even before the low sweet voice murmured scarce conscious thanks for the service done. Something in that voice seemed to startle him as he heard it. He leant forward eagerly.

"It is—it can't be! Why, yes—if it ain't the blessed little gentleman's mother!"

"Tom!" she cried, and her hands went out to seize his own, and her white face looked up to him in the flickering lamplight. "Tom, is it really you? Here—"

"It is, ma'am. Here I am back again, like a bad shilling, and after such a fight for dear life with those Mexican savages as ne'er a soldier in this here blessed old England ever dreams of."

"And—and your master?" she faltered, wondering why all that mountain of trouble seemed to be rolled from her heart and her life, at the bare thought of the proximity of that one most faithful friend.

"My master's very ill, ma'am," said Tom gravely. "It was just life and death, and those foreigners they didn't know what to do with him, and none of them could fetch the bullet out, and some say it's in his lungs, and some it's in his shoulder, and some it's in his side, and the Lord knows where they haven't fixed it! And so, one day they says to me, 'Take him to England,' and what with prize-money and one thing or another, I scraped enough for his passage, and I worked my own, and—well, here we are."

"And you've been with him always—you've never left him all these years—you good, faithful Tom!"

She was weeping now, weeping softly and unrestrainedly in this mingled gladness and sorrow that had come to her.

"Of course I've been with him, ma'am. You told me as how nothing I could do to serve you would be half as much to you as if I was a true friend to Mr. Grant, and I'd lay down my life for him, ma'am, that I would—cheerful—any moment that would serve him."

"I'm sure you would, Tom—oh, I'm sure you would!"

She was sobbing so passionately that it hurt him to hear her, and the impatient cabman growled out an interrogation to know how much longer he was to wait.

"Don't take on so, ma'am, don't," entreated Tom. "Mr. Grant is sure to live. He's stronger than you think, and I'll write to you, ma'am, if you'd like to hear, and tell you how he gets on, and—"

"Yes, do, Tom—do," she cried, dashing the tears away from her eyes; "and look here—" She thrust a handful of gold and silver into his hands. "Take that, Tom. You must—indeed you must, and get him medicine, wine—anything he needs. He won't know and he won't question; but oh, Tom, he mustn't die—my last friend, my only friend. Oh, God will not be so cruel as to take him from me!"

"No, ma'am, not a bit of it," said Tom cheerfully; "he ain't a-goin' to die, never you fear. And now, where am I to tell this growling old idiot, who's so afraid of wetting his precious clothes, to drive you?"

"The Charing Cross Hotel," she said, and Tom touched his hat and withdrew from the cab-window, and made a mental note of the address, little dreaming how soon and how strangely that scene was to be recalled to his memory.

Meanwhile, in that dusky, dreary room upstairs, the two men were congratulating themselves on the success of their schemes. It was close upon midnight when the count rose to say good-night.

"You have the best of it now, my friend," he said, "but take care; don't drive her too far, for she's borne almost as much as she can. One thing more," he added with his cold, harsh laugh. "You keep a diary, I know. Before you go to bed, make an entry of this night's interview. If ever there was a desperate woman on the face of the earth, that woman's your wife. If ever there was a human creature who hated another human creature with a hate that has made men—aye, and women, too—murderers before this, that creature is your wife. It's a very narrow line that separates reason from madness, you know, and I never saw anyone nearer that line than the woman who left this room two hours ago. Well, good-night, my friend, and pleasant dreams of the Court and your new fortune."

The door closed. Within the room, where this drama of human passion had so lately been performed, only silence and darkness brooded like dumb witnesses of what had been.

The solitary occupant of the room locked away his papers, paused a moment or two to make some entries in his memorandum-book, then drew his chair near to the fire, and bent over it, rubbing his cold, thin hands together as if for warmth.

"A hard fight," he muttered to himself, "a hard fight; but I've got the best of it, after all. I never feared a woman yet, and I'm not to be beaten by one, no, not the cleverest or the—"

What checked the sentence on his lips? What suddenly seemed to chill his blood like ice, and stop the beating of heart and pulse in one second's space of deadly fear? He had heard no sound of opening door, or approaching footsteps, yet something was certainly standing behind him. The firm, nervous pressure of a hand was upon his shoulder. As his eye rested on that hand, he seemed to recognise in its brown, lean, slender fingers a sentence of doom long threatened and long defied, yet never, even amidst such defiance, quite forgotten, or quite unfeared.

There was a moment's breathless silence, yet a moment that seemed to hold an eternity of memory in its brief pause. The candles burning on the table had burnt down so low that their sudden extinction was scarce perceptible, and in the deserted streets the rising wind gave one long, sad moan like the last cry of a suffering soul. Was it echoed by another, or was it only fancy that repeated it? The darkness and quietness of the room had scarcely been disturbed by sound or struggle.

The paralysis of fear that had held that silent figure in its grasp nerveless and immovable, seemed to hold it there still. Only it no longer leant towards the fire, but lay back in its chair with ashy face, and wide and staring eyes, and on the old wood floor something fell with a monotonous, dripping sound.

Something!

The room is full of shadows. Has one of them life, that it moves so stealthily through its darkest corners to the door? So light it is, and so noiseless in its movements, that neither sound nor echo betrays its presence.

The room is dark and quiet as ever; the night falls with storm and rain over the great city beyond; but once again, like pitying things, the shadows close around that solitary figure which now is voiceless, powerless as themselves.

(To be continued.—Commenced in No. 141.)

A Branch of May.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

Who keeps old May Day?

Half the world does not know what is meant by this. May Day is May Day, always old and always young, in a sense. There are, however, some people who see a difference when they hear a day called "old" or "new."

Villages, and even little towns, where the enlightening puff of the railway-engine does not come to blow old-world customs altogether away, are thus places where one will find this and sundry other holdings of bygone habits.

They have a Michaelmas Day, and they have an "old" Michaelmas Day, by which they eat goose on the 29th of September, and again, twelve days after, do the same. The country lads and lasses on the 1st of May in these places carry round their garlands and sing their May-songs, and they do the like on the 12th of May. It causes a double holiday-making, and a double harvest of pennies from the good-natured.

Not many years ago, there broke a May Day over a straggling little town that lay sleepily rejoicing in the fat valley beneath some low green hills. The hills sloped mistily away into the grey rosi-ness of the morning, and the valley opened to let the reedy Ouse overflow his shallow banks without let or hindrance. He made a winding trail of silver betoken his lazy self, but he had a shimmering crowd of attendants in the patches, and pools, and flashes of watery radiance that the green earth showed up to right and left of him.

Dew glistened on the young grass, and the golden light of the morning gave a buoyancy to the air. Birds were singing high in heaven; away in the distance there could be heard the mellowed ring of voices and of laughter.

By-and-by three young people—two youths and a girl—got over a stile by the roadway, and ran laughing down the shelving meadow to a bend where an old boat was moored.

"She's half full of water," cried the girl. "Why don't you have her seen to, Taff?"

"She is yours, the 'Lady Margaret,'" and the young man called "Taff" pointed to the boat's name, and gave a sideways jerk to his head. That action must be supposed to send the information to the further young man.

The girl Madge Westcott and Taff were evidently brother and sister, for both were fair, peculiarly fair, and flaxen headed, also each one owned a nose, celestial, "tip-tilted," or whatever the observer might be inclined to call it. The feminine nose was charming, however, whereas the masculine nose made one feel antagonistic at times. Now the man behind these two was a tall, slight man, in contrast to the shortish, plumpish figures of the other two, and his features were dark and straight. According to the canons of beauty he might pass a whole bench of judges; whereas, for the other two, one could scarcely dare to predict as much.

The boat had ignominiously stuck in the oozy mud.

"Give a hand," ordered Taff to Madge, who, being a girl, looked on whilst the men pushed.

"You are cool, I must say, Westcott," put in the friend.

The two were fellow law-students down at Greensmeade for a few days. This Lawrence Pigott had never been down before, but Taff's friends were always welcome at old Dr. Westcott's, even though they were numerous, and often changed by the said Taff. Each one of course had a conspicuous virtue in his introducer's eyes; now and again one came again on his own merits. But Taff himself liked variety; strange that he should have chosen the immutable law for his profession.

This May morning was Lawrence Pigott's second day in that rural spot; of course no one who had seen him had yet gone so far as to question the chance of his being one of the "fellows" who should win for themselves a second invitation.

"Cool," was his pointed word, and a little chivalric haughtiness reddened the pale darkness of his face.

"Ah, you know nothing about it," loftily returned Taff; "Madge is equal to me."

"What a compliment!"

Whereat Madge tossed her fair head and made a show of mock offence.

"I should be sorry if I were not more than equal to you," she said. "You and I," touching her trim self with a finger, and then pointing the same finger at her brother. "Could there be a comparison?" She still stood on the bank and made no effort to help as Taff had suggested.

"Rubbish!" Then Taff gave a shove with all his might to the boat. "If you want to get afloat this morning you'd better come, Madge," said he with meaning.

"My dear boy, do you not see I have a new dress on, and if I get it coated with mud I shall be painfully aware of the fact that a stained and besmirched dress will be my fate for a year?"

"You should not wear a new dress for boating," grumbled Taff.

"Would you have liked to present your only sister to your friends in a suit of brown shreds and sliminess—you know the brown serge?"

"Who sees what a girl wears?"

"The girl herself," coolly answered Madge. She smoothed her plump hand over the close blue serge skirt, and rather drew up her dainty, rounded figure. "There'll be an awful splash when she rights herself." The girl's face was a puzzled mixture of merriment and of care for the new dress. But she moved downwards as if she must do the thing which custom and fate allotted her.

"Keep back!" was the second quick command launched at her. Pigott gave this one, and threw out an arm to emphasise his words. "Now, Westcott, give it her!"

A creak, then a long slow swish and wash, and the Lady Margaret balanced herself in the water below the meshes of the reeds.

The young men straightened their backs, stretched out their arms, then fell "at ease." Scarlet cheeks on Taff's part attested the thoroughness of his work; Pigott was paler.

"You have a good sweep of river," he said, looking along the winding silver streak. He was utterly ignorant of the river and the country; a town man and a book man—a man whose life had known scarcely a holiday.

"Fine!" Taff tilted his straw hat back from his brow, and stepped on to the little craft. "We shall be able to pull up to Quetchley I should say—eh, Madge?"

"I doubt it. There was no rain yesterday, and the water is down a bit. A week ago you'd have done it, but now—there's the turn by Bailey's farm;" here she put her hand in Pigott's, and sprang into the boat. "We might try for it, though. Leave the boat with Baines, and walk home across the fields."

"And be back without keeping breakfast waiting?" asked Pigott.

"Yes. Well, we got up early, didn't we, for the express purpose? Nine is the hour, you know, and the pater is not particular about five minutes—not when Taff's friends are down, at any rate."

She nodded her head and bent to her work. She and Taff pulled. Lawrence would have been a novice.

So they floated on. What they talked about doesn't matter. It was full of life and of gladness, though, and the way they enjoyed themselves was perfectly easy and free from rule, even from the rule of straight sailing or pulling. The old Lady Margaret slipped along by one bank and then by another. Willows and may-bushes shadowed the shining water, more than once a flicker of the may-snow was dashed over Madge's dark dress as Pigott caught up at a branch and tried to break off a bunch of the flowers.

"Ah, you've gathered it!" and the girl put her mischievous nose to smell as he held it to her. "Don't take it home, though; it's a snare and delusion, like most prettinesses."

"No." Pigott looked doubtful, then laughed. "How do you mean?"

"Who carries the may into a house, carries ill luck"—don't you know that?" She jerked her head to the right. "There's Quetchley," said she, "over there, and round that corner comes our Hill of Difficulty."

"A superstition?" he asked, pulling the clustering blooms to pieces.

Madge shrugged her plump shoulders.

"I suppose so. Don't take it into our house, that's all. Carry it home, if you will—I would not," she said.

The young man threw the thing away with an amount of vigour that was quite uncalled for. The white flowers flew high, then fell, striking the water, and following along the wake of the boat. All his life this Lawrence Pigott had been, so to speak, fighting through the world, and his quick, easily-excited nerves rebelled against any more obstacles or any more fighting being set before him.

"I want a run of good luck, not bad."

He spoke quickly, and with a momentarily rising colour.

"And you've got it." Taff spoke with decision.

"Now, Madge, be ready, pull with all your might when I shout, and jump her over the bank."

"All right."

"Don't drown me," laughed Pigott, "or my beginning of good luck will look like the satire of my evil genius."

"Have you got an evil genius?" asked Madge. "Taff has let us suppose you were one of those extraordinary people who walk over the heads of deserving others." She gave a little jerk of her head in her brother's direction. "One of the people who succeed in everything. You are going out to be a judge in India, are you not?"

Pigott gave a long laugh.

"That is too cruel, Miss Westcott. My first clerkship, a judicial underling; but such creatures have been known to grow into judges."

He ended much more quietly than he had begun, and as his face sobered his eyes gave out a steady light of ambition.

"I know—" began the girl.

"Don't talk to the man at the wheel," called Taff. "Now, Madge, over with her."

The two bent, then Taff, with his muscles strained to their utmost, gave a sharp, strong pull, and seemed half to spring from his seat.

Madge likewise.

The old boat flew through the water. Crunch—scrape—stuck fast!

No pushing, or pulling, or tugging could stir her. Away stretched the shining meadows, over fields away rose the brown outhouses of Bailey's farm, but no Bailey retainer was in the growing grass by the river. From beyond a little knoll curled the blue smoke from the Quetchley chimneys, but no man could hear any shouts from the discomfited crew of the Lady Margaret.

The men could easily tuck up their trousers, and wade through the knee-deep water—but Madge?

They must carry her over.

Pigott was by far the tallest, therefore the fittest, as he explained, to keep the skirts of the new blue dress out of the water.

Of course they laughed a good deal. One does laugh at these adventures when one is young. Madge shook her ruffled plumes as she found herself carefully set down in the midst of the dewy grass; she did not at all find fault with her experience.

"You are ever so much better than Taff, Mr. Pigott. He would have dragged me over like a bundle."

"I had the new dress to think of," and the young man's dark eyes laughed.

"Now we must be quick," and Madge dismissed personalities summarily, "and get on to a path. There is one close by. We must not stand and spoil the mowing grass. Do you think you'll take cold? You are not used to this sort of thing," she added.

"I? No. I never took cold but once in my life."

"Bosh! Cold!" and Taff strode on barelegged still.

They had lost the short cut by Quetchley, so they were late in getting home. The town-clock chimed the half hour after nine as they came into the one Greensmeade street.

The golden May sun came streaming down it, bunches of greenery—nay, in some cases, they seemed to be young trees fastened by the cottagers' doorposts—were fixed to overhang almost every doorway.

"Is this for May Day?" asked Pigott.

"The boughs? Yes, of course. You'll see them all along the street, and if you'll stay till old May Day you'll see the same thing over again. Hark, there's a garland coming!"

"What do you mean?"

"Don't you know? Dear! what a heap of good things you Londoners miss! How do you keep May Day?"

"Not at all. In the days of my youth the chimney-sweep used to get up some jack-in-the-green business, and go about with a lot of tawdry tinsel and finery, but that is now a thing of the past. Now, what is your garlanding?"

"See for yourself."

And some little girls came along with a doll dressed in wonderful village finery, seated under a canopy of boughs, and with wreaths of spring flowers all about. The doll was their Queen of the May, and standing before the big grocer's shop of the town, they began their May song.

These things date from far-back times; they only survive, as we have said, in the places the railway does not touch.

Here is what they sang in a minor, almost tuneless sing-song:

MAY SONG.

A branch of May I have brought you,
And at your door it stands,
It's well set out and it's well spread about,
'Tis the work of our Lord's hands.

Man, as man, his life's but a span!
He's cut off like a flower,
He's here to-day and he's gone to-morrow,
And we're all dead in an hour.

Death! ah, death, if strikes so sharp,
It strikes unto the ground,
And there's never a surgeon in all England,
As can cure this dreadful wound.

Take your Bible in your hand,
And read it through and through,
And when the Day of Judgment comes,
The Lord will remember you.

Now, I've sung my little song,
No longer can I stay,
So it's "God bless you all, both great and small,
And "I wish you a merry month of May!"

At the end came a curtsy for pennies.

"Quite a poetic May Day!" was the ending of some talk of Pigott's, as he entered the sunny breakfast-room.

"Poetic enough to do without breakfast—eh?" and Dr. Westcott laughed good-humouredly.

"We might have been drowned," gave Madge as an apology.

"Drowned? you've never been in the water?" and her mother peered at the girl over her spectacles.

"I? Oh no. But they have."

"How very foolish!"

Three days later, the very day when the young men were to have ended their holiday and should have gone back to London, Taff to study and Pigott to go to outfitters and such like folk who should prepare him for his Indian life, this last-named gentleman was helpless and racked with the pains of rheumatism.

He was in for rheumatic-fever, very probably, the doctor said, and could by no means be moved.

Taff had to travel alone, and had a message to carry to Pigott's mother and sister.

"I'd give anything to hide it from them," wailed the unhappy Lawrence; "but if I do not show up at home they will know there is something wrong. Say that your mother is a tyrant, Westcott, and I am only kept by her orders."

"Tell no stories, Taff."

"Ask the ladies down. There is more than one spare room in the house," was Dr. Westcott's addition.

"I'll be up in a day or two," and Pigott could not help a groan coming to decorate this assertion of his.

His prophecy was a false one.

When old May Day came, the sunshine and the garlands and the old May songs were lording it over the outside world of Greensmeade, but a very different order of things ruled within Dr. Westcott's house.

Lawrence Pigott lay dying, so they said. He was under no sleep of unconsciousness, but lay vividly awake mentally, yet so utterly prostrate under the exhaustion of fever that there was no hope of his rallying. So Dr. Westcott had told his mother, so two other doctors had agreed; there had been a young new comer called in, who, with the hardy assertion of youth, disagreed.

Madge Westcott had run downstairs with this young doctor, and, having seen him to the door, was back and on tiptoe entering the hushed and shadowed room.

One needs not to call up a picture of the room. There was a widowed mother there seeing her hope fade away before her eyes; there was the gentle young sister whose life was to have been glorified by the brother's glory; there were the friends—the new friends, but the tried friends surely now.

Now and again bits of sentences broke from Pigott's lips.

Then like an unnatural burst of sunlight upon a grey evening there broke the gay, quaint, minor chanting sing-song of some children under the window.

"A May song," said Lawrence.

"Send them away, Madge," ordered Mrs. Westcott in a whisper, but with decision.

"No, I like it."

So they let things go on as they might.

"So many days," were the next vague words. "Have I been ill so long? Twelve days you said."

"Yes," put in Madge with a bluntness she had taken up that morning. The girl was not unfeeling, but some people have an instinct which compels them to act in what looks like a stoical way. "Yes, you said you would not stay here for old May Day, and as you would not do it willingly, you have had to do it unwillingly." With this she turned hastily and went out of the room.

A slight flush came over Pigott's face.

He did not say any more, but after seeming to listen, his eyelids drooped as the children's song faded into the distance of the street.

The sleep of health had come to him.

One is not cured of rheumatic-fever in a day, so there was more time for Lawrence Pigott to stay in Greensmeade. However, he did at last go away with his mother and sister, and after that for a while the course of the existence of the two families drifted them apart.

Never again, though, could they be altogether two distinct families. Taff chose, and Mary Pigott chose, to enter upon what the old folks called an imprudent engagement. Taff had not even passed his final law examination, much less had he earned the money wherewith to keep a wife and to begin housekeeping upon. But these two trusted the future, and trusted each other.

Lawrence went off to India.

There he was for a year working on, but not, so far as the Greensmeade people knew, making a name for himself. Taff had told many things about his friend, many of them so prophetic of greatness that the most exalted promotion would have come as news of an expected sort.

Lawrence always wrote cheerily. But, if he told details to his mother, she kept them to herself, nothing but satisfied generalities went down to the Westcotts.

So a second year went by.

In that year Taff became a full-blown solicitor, and he also managed—he was a very lucky young man—to alight upon a good practice. Some people do happen to hear of the right thing at the right moment, and also they are often the owners of the right amount of decision to take the opportunity that comes. David Westcott was one of these people. It would not be long therefore before he would crown his good fortune by making Mary Pigott his wife.

The Greensmeade household was full of talk about Taff and his doings. Madge was still at home, and though just about that very time she also had what her prudent mother told her was a most flattering offer, and what no girl should refuse hastily or without due consideration, she still had refused it. To stay at home, and to take care of the old folks when they should be old, was, she declared, her vocation. She did not see the advantage of marriage—no, she would be Madge Westcott to the end of her days.

At this her mother said some words of motherly, yet worldly-wise contempt, and having said them—wondered. Was her daughter Madge setting her heart upon a dream, an imagination? Who had there been to catch her young girl's fancy?

So do mothers, even the clearest-eyed of them, grope in the darkness.

A little time more passed, and again the rejected suitor came forward. Again, too, Mrs. Westcott talked to Madge, bidding her think well and wisely, and, as she said, "not cast away an honest lover and a noble gentleman for any sentimental fancy."

Madge certainly did not look like a sentimental maiden; indeed, there was a blushing abruptness in her off-hand answer.

"I am not so foolish, mother," was her cry. "No Westcott yet was ever guilty of too much sentiment, so rest your dear heart in the belief that I have none at all. Not even the small amount that would be necessary before I could marry Mr. Ashurst. He'd want some love, and I have none—literally none."

"Stuff! You do not know what you are talking of, child!"

"Yes, I do, mother. And if you are kind, you will see Mr. Ashurst instead of me."

There was evidently no help for it, and the mother did see the gentleman, and gave her unwilling answer.

Into this family discomfort Taff's letters came like a healthy, vigorous breeze. One that had been full of his plans, and of his reasons for persuading Mary to marry him at once, ended with this sentence:

"First-rate news from Lawrence. He has got promotion, but sends word he is coming home. Queer, that; I should stay and take the work at once."

A week later there was more from Taff. Mary and he were to be married early in June.

"No more news from Lawrence; it looks as if he might have started. He is a touch-and-go fellow, and he may turn up any day. His mother is full of the idea of seeing him, but cannot see any more than I do why he comes. Like a woman, she has come to the conclusion he is ill."

She was wrong. Her son had never been better in his life.

By this time the second year was just completed since that May Day when our story began. The quaint old May songs had been sung more than a week ago, and the green meadows were parted and at the same time linked together by snow-white hedgerows. The May was out as it rarely was so early, but then April, that year, had absorbed the coldness of the young May, and had left her only the sunshine and the flowers.

Madge had been writing to Mary Pigott. She had been told what she was to wear as bridesmaid, but she wanted to change the order, and she wanted a little of her own way. So, you see, the trouble of her unwelcome lover had left her still practical, and by no means wounded.

Two years passing over her fair head had left some marks. Perhaps, after all, but vague marks. She was a bit graver, a degree softer; she could flash a gay word and sing over her work, but she could think better, and she could face life more wisely.

Now we see her again her round alert figure looked very much the same. Being so warm she wore a cotton dress instead of a warmer serge one, but it was still of the same dark-blue colour, and it still was of the same daintily trim compactness. Having finished her letter she sauntered out through the long garden, went out at its lower gate, crossed a by-lane, and was in a meadow.

One side of the meadow trended downwards to the river; in that direction ran a line of pollard-willows, the white greenness of their leaves showing in the play of the light breeze. In the opposite direction was a worn pathway, which led to other continuing paths and the high-road. This made a short-cut from the top end of Greensmeade to the railway-station two miles off. In the evening one would have seen a line of railway labourers making their way home to the Greensmeade cottages—not so in the middle of the day. No one was to be seen.

So Madge strolled on. The walk was entirely without an object, and simply taken in the sweet, leisurely love of being out in the fresh summer air. Sometimes her hands clasped together, sometimes they hung by her side, and swung as she walked.

All at once the sweet lazy freedom of her was gone, and she started.

A man had got over a stile at the far-off corner of the field, and was coming along the path. If her walk had been the perfection of laziness, his was the picture of decision and quick purpose.

It was Lawrence Pigott.

He had taken her hands before she had called up her practical common-sense. She was angry with herself for being so surprised; why should she be surprised?

Consequently she burst forth with some wild words:

"Is it your ghost, or is it yourself, Mr. Pigott?" she cried.

The hands answered. "Myself, I think," were the quiet words.

He had looked as quietly into her eyes, and the wildness was quenched out of her.

"Who ever dreamt of your coming?" she at last gasped, fighting hard for a careless manner.

"You knew I was coming to England, did you not?"

"I suppose we did—some time."

"And coming to England means coming to Greensmeade. Madge, you know why I come?" He had loosed her hands, but now seized them again.

Her old wild self leaped to the front.

"To be at Mary's wedding, I suppose?" she asked.

"You think that?" he smiled. "And yet I only heard that such an event was close at hand when I came home last night. Taff was there, and Taff was everybody."

"And you, poor man, were—nowhere! Kind of you to look us up under the circumstances."

"You do not believe for an instant that I had no reason of my own?" burst out the young man. How handsome he was; how the Indian sun had tanned his pale darkness and bronzed him into strength! He was a lover for a girl to be proud of. "Mother told you I had got promotion; that meant many things to me. One particular thing it meant which swallowed up all the other good things—you know, Madge?"

"Sir!" and she grew rosy-red. "What do I know? How do I know what—what—"

"I knew my wife was in England, so I came for her."

Madge was rosier. Her last flash was a very weak one.

"Indeed," said she, "I did not know—"

He loosed her hands, but he drew her to him.

"Madge, my darling, you know it all! I am sure you know it all! You will come back with me? I could not send and ask my wife to come to me; I must fetch her. You will do it?"

They walked in at the old garden gate soon after, and Madge, slipping her hand within his arm, said, with a toss of her fair young head:

"It is wonderful how you men take things for granted. Have I ever yet said I will be your wife? Now, have I?"

"I shall tell the doctor that you have given me to understand you will be—"

Lawrence did not seem to trouble himself about the mere form of a word.

Greensmeade that year paid no heed to its May Day merry-makings, for there was a greater topic to fill every mouth. Madge Westcott was engaged, and Madge Westcott would be married in less than a month.

Who can wonder that the people forgot politics, and even the prospects of the hay-crop?

Mary Pigott was a victim. Instead of having her own quiet little wedding in the London church, she had to make a second bride down at Greensmeade, and to accept Dr. Westcott as her father. How could her brother give her away when he had to stand and have his own bride given to him?

Greensmeade talks of that double wedding to this day!

The Editor's Note Book.

THE Times thinks that the second reading of the Franchise Bill by an overwhelming majority will be hailed by the country with great satisfaction, but it may reasonably be doubted whether outside of professional political circles the country cares very much about the matter one way or the other. And it must not be forgotten that the majority is considerably discounted by the fact that it included the whole of the irreconcilable Parnell party, and that the Bill has yet to be navigated through the dangerous shoals and quicksands of Committee, to say nothing of the House of Lords, before it gets safely into port.

POLITICAL authorities differ as to what will be the absolute effect of the Bill, but it seems to be agreed on all sides that electoral power in Ireland will be thrown more than ever into the hands of the worst and most ignorant class of voters. In this case we may look for the presence in the House of more men of the stamp of Mr. Healy, whose wilful disobedience last week to the orders of the Speaker—not to mention the rules which govern the conduct of gentlemen—was as disgraceful an outrage as can well be imagined. It is to be hoped that the House will take warning in time.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT's London Government Bill is too large a measure to criticise on a first introduction to it, but at first sight it seems a carefully-considered measure, and as well adapted to the particular circumstances of the case as could have been expected. The two most sweeping provisions of the Bill are those which deal with the abolition of the Court of Aldermen and of the Metropolitan Board of Works, and of these the former is sure to give rise to considerable opposition. The Gas, Water, and Licensing questions are all left to be dealt with by the new Municipality.

In the present state of public business it is almost too much to expect that the Bill can possibly become law this session. It is obvious, however, that the measure, possibly amended and altered, must pass before very long. It will then be for the citizens of the metropolis generally to decide how it is to work. If they send the right men to the new Municipal Council, there may be reasonable expectation of an improvement. If on the other hand the representation is allowed to fall into the hands of men of the ordinary vestry type the last state of London will be worse than the first.

In the interest of travellers on the Continent it is to be hoped that justice will speedily overtake the forgers of the fictitious bank-notes which have been put into circulation abroad. Bank of England notes, and especially those for ten pounds, are not only more convenient to carry than gold, and less troublesome than circular letters of credit, but command in many parts of the Continent a considerable premium in consequence of the facilities they afford for making remittances by post to England.

A QUESTION which was recently put in the House of Commons has again aroused the old controversy about prison labour between the economists who object to prisoners being employed on useless and unremunerative work, such as oakum-picking and the treadmill, and the champions of the outside labour market, which is declared to be grievously interfered with by the competition of prison manufactures.

THE largest firm of mat-makers in London, who are also the largest contractors for prison labour, have written to the papers, averring that the proper system is to let the labour of prisoners to a manufacturer, and stating that during the twelve years in which they have held such contracts, they have actually increased, instead of reducing, the numbers and wages of the free working-men in their employment. I think it would be very difficult to persuade any working-man that this increase is not in spite of, rather than in consequence of, the employment of convicts.

THE loss of the "Daniel Steinmann" steamer near Halifax, once more points a moral which repeated disasters have made very familiar. The captain says that the fog had been so thick for two days previously, that he had been unable to take any observation, that "there must have been an extremely strong easterly current," and that his "compasses must have been subject to some attraction," but it does not appear that until a light was sighted—which, by the way, the captain mistook for another—the thickness of the weather materially interfered with the progress of the ship.

UNDER these circumstances caution would seem to have suggested lying-to until the fog lifted, at all events enough to enable the captain to be sure whereabouts he was when he approached the land, but then the custom which regulates such matters does not look favourably upon skippers, whose caution overpowers their desire to get across the water in at least the average number of days.

ALL accounts of the University Boat Race last week agree in saying that a marked falling off, both in the attendance on the river banks and in the popular interest in the event, was noticeable. That this was to be attributed to the weather cannot fairly be said, as not many years ago the race was rowed in the presence of an enormous number of people in a blinding snowstorm. The fact is that the reaction, which was inevitable after the manner in which enthusiasm about the race was worked up and overdone by the newspapers, has come at last. It will not be long before people look back with absolute astonishment at the ridiculous fuss which was made about the race ten or a dozen years ago.

THE managers of the London theatres were placed in a somewhat invidious position on the occasion of the funeral of the Duke of Albany. On application to the Lord Chamberlain they were informed that no order would be issued, but that it would be left to each manager to do as he thought best. Almost without an exception, they took this as being the old story, "No compulsion, only you must," and closed their theatres.

WHY a particular class of public entertainers should in this way be heavily fined on such occasions is a puzzle to which no feasible explanation can be given, and it certainly seems hard upon London theatrical managers, and upon the many hundreds of people in their employment, that they should have to prove their loyalty at the expense of their pockets, knowing very well that large numbers of the people who would otherwise have furnished their audiences are simply being driven to pass the evening at the music-halls.

HOWEVER, if these things have to be done at all, it is just as well to do them with a good grace—a fact which Miss Mary Anderson might have remembered with advantage. The circumstances connected with the closing of the Lyceum Theatre on the day of the funeral showed a curious hesitation. First of all, Miss Anderson announced that the public would be so dreadfully inconvenienced by the closing of the theatre that it would be kept open; at the eleventh hour it was stated that the lady would be prevented from acting by sudden indisposition; and next morning the Observer contained a letter, signed "Mary Anderson," couched in somewhat gushing terms, and regretting that the melancholy event should have prevented her appearing on what was necessarily the last night of her engagement.

CONSIDERING that the American lady owed a great part of her fashionable popularity to the marked favour shown her by the Prince and Princess of Wales, it cannot be said that she—or perhaps I should say, her advisers—displayed on this occasion either tact or courtesy.

THE "sacred lamp of burlesque" seems to want cleaning, or trimming, or something of the kind, if its fire is to be kept alive by the ministering priestesses of the Gaiety Theatre. "Camaralzaman" had but a brief and sickly existence, and now "Our Helen" has come to terrible first-night grief. Has even the Gaiety public at last been educated up to the point of discovering that a three-act burlesque is about as tedious a form of entertainment as the ingenuity of man has ever yet invented?

Now that Mr. Irving's American tour has come to an end, the full measure of his success becomes apparent. Very conflicting reports reached this country, especially during the earlier days of the enterprise, and no doubt it was some little time before American playgoers accustomed themselves to the actor's peculiarities, but, as time went on, his artistic triumph became assured, and the financial success, which was never in much doubt, developed into something phenomenal.

AFTER a short summer season at the Lyceum Mr. Irving and his company will return to America; a policy which, except from the point of view of dollars, does not seem to me very judicious. Actors as great as Mr. Irving, and with quite as large a following, have found before now that it was unwise to leave their places vacant. There is no public in the world more loyal to its favourites than the London public, but it is quite capable of transferring its affections from a memory to a fact, and to take up with a new favourite if the old one withdraws himself for too long a time.

NOVELS and plays "with a purpose" are so universally distrusted, that the pill is usually gilded and made to look as much as possible like something else before it is presented to the patient, but artifice such as this does not commend itself to the management of the Standard Theatre. The Easter novelty at this house is described as "A Bitter Wrong. A Wife in England, No Wife in France. A Dramatic Protest Against the French Marriage Law."

It is to be hoped that this precedent will not be extensively followed. A five-act tragedy on the Deceased Wife's Sister, a farcical comedy on the Government of London, or a three-act burlesque drama to inculcate principles of teetotalism, would offer rather an appalling prospect to playgoers.

The Black Man.

THE vast continent of Africa is about five thousand miles in length, and more than four thousand five hundred in breadth. Its area is nearly thirteen million and a half square miles, and it is inhabited by upwards of a hundred and fifty millions of people, chiefly Moors, Arabs, and negroes, with many mulattoes, besides, in these days, a considerable number of Europeans. The mixture of races is most evident among the Felatahs, who occupy the country extending from Sahara in the north, to the Kong Mountains in the south, and from the sea in the west, to the kingdom of Borna and Mandara in the east—a space equal to a fourth of Europe or a tenth of Africa. From the tribes of Felatahs have been brought iron spear-heads with wooden shafts, heads of javelins, arrows, double-edged swords, ornamental beads, and pottery ware, exactly similar to the articles which were dug up at Canterbury and held to be relics of the Pagan time in Britain. Their rude manufactures, with double-handed bellows and a handleless hammer, still yield an iron so tough, that the best blades that come from Sheffield they call "rotten iron," because they will chip and break.

Africa contains civilised, as well as uncivilised negroes. The language of all negro races is, indeed, unwritten, but in Monrovia, the capital of the negro republic of Liberia, there are many natives who can read and write. To the commander of an English man-of-war, for example, when he entered the harbour, this letter was brought by a boat that put off expressly to bring it :

"GENTLEMEN OF THE MAN-OF-WAR,—I shall be happy to see you on shore. Mrs. H. sends her love, and will be happy to wash your clothes.—I have the honour to be, gentlemen, yours affectionately,
"J. H., Colonel of the Liberian Militia."

But on the whole this high degree of civilisation is not frequently attained.

The notion of a Deity held by an African negro on his own soil is utterly rudimentary, and wants even a name. The general idea is of a vague ghost, without personality or character, and the name may also mean the firmament or the sun. Of the suggestion of death there is everywhere extreme dread, though it is often blindly and fearlessly risked. "He is finished," say the East Africans of a dead relative. "All is done for ever," say those of the west. In Bonny, European intercourse has suggested the phrase "He is gone for devilly." Food is set by the grave, and in the case of a chief, slaves are killed for sustenance and companionship on the way to the spirit world; and for weeks, and sometimes, perhaps, even for years after a death, the place of burial is dreaded, because the ghost of the dead, always believed to be vindictive, is supposed to haunt it. A village has been broken up by the death of one whose ghost was an especial source of terror. But after some time there is no more faith in the ghost. In this matter, as in all others, there is no reflection, no reasoning out of conclusions. But the dead man is held to be altogether extinct. Ask a man where is the spirit of his great-grandfather, and he will reply that he does not know, "It is done." There is occasional particular belief as to a certain man's spirit, that it has gone into a bird or gorilla; but, attempt to get upon traces of a belief in transmigration generally, the answer is "No." It is beyond the ordinary power of a negro to reason from the particular to the general.

Everywhere is there a belief in witchcraft, which is as often regarded as the cause of a death as of a recovery. There is the utmost vagueness in the fetishism that ascribes a sort of divinity to serpents, birds, rocks, mountains, peaks, waterfalls, feathers, teeth, claws, skins, and brains of animals, etc. In Eastern Africa they have statues for idols, but only one tribe has been found in the west that has advanced so far as this—the Wanyka, and they say that their images came from the east. The tutelary deity of the Brass district is the boa-constrictor; of Bonny it is the iguana; and these creatures are held in such reverence that they are allowed to come into the houses and eat anything that comes in their way. It is death to injure one of these reptiles, and if one be found dead, it is rolled up in a white cloth and tied in a mat for solemn burial, attended by gun-firing and rum-drinking. By the same people a dead slave is only sewn in matting, and then hung without ceremony to the crocodiles and sharks of the river.

The ju-ju, king or priest, is the authorised fountain of superstition. The people of New Calabar had special reverence for a spirit supposed to live beyond the river borders in the Oru, which they describe as the long ju-ju country. The ju-ju of that place is a woman, who knows everything, and lives in a valley set about with hills. When a great crime has been committed, and the guilt of the accused is doubtful, accused and accuser are said to have been sent together to this oracle. Having reached the sacred ground, and arrived at a certain bush, the attendants remain behind, while the accused and accuser advance together. Accusation is then made in a loud voice, and a mysterious voice in the air demands whether he be guilty. Denial, of course, follows, and the accused is commanded by the strange voice to go back. If innocent, he is able to go home; but, if guilty, the superstition was that his feet are glued to the ground, and while he struggles to get away, water springs up beside him, and rises till it covers his head. When he has thus been killed, the water sinks into the earth again, sucking his corpse with it as far as the neck, but leaving the head above ground.

At the Egbo meetings, in the Old Calabar district, suspected persons are tried by the ordeal of the esere, or poison bean, which is supposed to kill only the guilty. It nearly killed Professor Christison, of Edinburgh, when he tried on his own person its properties, so that the risk of being found guilty and executed is much greater in this way than the trial trip to the long ju-ju country.

The negroes have no system of language, nearly every tribe having its own tongue. "The Tower of Babel," says Captain Adams, "might have been built in any of these districts;" yet in Western Equatorial Africa the tribes were found not sharply pointed by landmarks from each other, but with their villages intermixed. Interior to the Cameroons, the Old Calabar, and the Bonny districts, are a people called Qua. But the Quas of the Cameroons can't understand the language of the Quas of Bonny. As we speak of Equatorial Africa, let it be noted that negroes living under the equator are not blacker than those farther from it. In a damp and moist country, especially when it is mountainous, the negroes are less black, though not less distinctly marked with negro features, than in a dry climate. Damp also causes more hunger, and a longing desire for a meat diet, and tends, therefore, in Africa to the support of cannibalism. Mr. Hutchinson is reported to have said, that he had seen it stated in a Sierra Leone newspaper, by a missionary in that colony, not that he had heard of, but that he had seen, hampers of dried human flesh carried about on men's backs to be sold for eating during the progress of a war between two considerable negro tribes.

At Bonny, secretly, but within sight of our ships on the river, cannibal ceremonies were maintained at a comparatively quite recent period. The horrors of one, Mr. Hutchinson, concealed in a hut, was able to see unsuspected, and he says: "I can assure you of a fact in connection with one of their reprisal executions for cannibal purposes, that occurred during the temporary stay of Mrs. Hutchinson and myself at Bonny. We were stopping on board a palm-oil hulk, when one morning there came to the vessel, for some trading object, the very ju-ju man whom I had seen at his bloody work some time previous. It seems that he had repeated this operation on the day before the visit now recorded; and on Captain Shaw, who had charge of the hulk, asking him how he could dare to look in the face of a white lady, who had heard of his eating the head of a man the day before—for I must tell you that the head is a part claimed as a tit-bit by the executioner—he replied with the most imperturbable sang froid, expressive of profound contempt for all culinary art, 'I no eat him, for my cook done spoil him; he no put nuff pepper on him,' meaning that the sauce had not been to his taste."

The cannibals are generally tall and well made. The Wabembe, says Captain Burton, on the north-west shore of Taganyaka Lake, have abandoned to wild growth the richest land; too lazy to fish or hunt, they devour all kinds of carrion, grubs, and insects, and, like the Fans described by M. du Chailu, will eat the bodies of men who have died of sickness. A tribe living in the interior is said to come down to the shore to catch people living near the sea, whose flesh they suppose to have a brinier and choicer flavour. On the other hand, other tribes bury the dead bodies of their enemies for a week, to give them a gamy flavour before they are eaten. The love of putrid meats and the want of salt bring on leprosy, elephantiasis, ulcers, and other diseases of the skin. Scrofula abounds, and longevity is rare.

There are considerable differences in degree of intellect among the several negro tribes, and also among the people of the same tribe. They are generally skilful in making iron implements, but even among the best tribes of the interior—who possess looms and weave palm-fibre into a good cloth—there is little achieved by mental labour or forethought. They have imagination, with considerable power of speech, sharp trading, and an ingenuity for lying and cheating that cannot belong to a merely stupid people. Though often treacherous, they are hospitable, and have affectionate impulses, and their women show great tenderness of heart.

Polygamy is the rule, but it is accompanied with the most determined exclusion of blood marriages. The tribes are split into clans, almost always of the clan of the mother, and descendants of one mother to the remotest ascertainable degree are forbidden to intermarry, such marriages being held abominable. But this is the only recognised bar. A son inherits at his father's death all his mothers-in-law as wives, who must make themselves useful to him, the wife being bought, sold, and inherited, her position in West Africa being a sort of slavery. In East Africa, however, Dr. Livingstone tells us of a tribe in which the custom prevails that when a man marries a woman of a neighbouring village, that he should go to her house to live, and occupy himself in carrying home firewood to his mother-in-law. There, if a woman beats her husband, she is brought to be tried in the Palaver House, and if found guilty, is condemned to carry him home on her back. This is her triumph, because all the women along the road cheer her, and cry: "Give it him again! give it him again!" On the whole, where the virtual slavery of the woman is most certain, and she is liable to the domestic whip, her position is comparatively good. She has her way in the household, and seems to be the happier for the company of other wives. The husband being accounted a bad man if he shows partialities, the wives rarely disagree among themselves, although they and the women generally cause many wars and quarrels among the men.

The Africans are highly ceremonious, but in the personage to whom most ceremony is due—an African king—there is a special way of exciting relish for the reverence that is to come. Both Du Chailu and Captain Burton, writing of the west and of the east, met with occasion for describing it. Captain Burton, in the "Land of the Moon," writes "that the chief was travelling towards the coast as a porter in a caravan. When he heard of his father's death, he at once stacked his load, and prepared to return home and rule. The rest of the gang, before allowing him to depart, beat him severely, exclaiming partly in jest, partly in earnest: 'Ah, now thou art still our comrade, but presently thou wilt fine, flog, torture, and slay us!'" So, when one of M. du Chaillu's negro friends was voted king, some spat in his face, others beat him with their fists, some kicked and pelted him, whilst the unfortunates who could not join in this exercise, assiduously cursed him, his brothers and sisters, his parents and grand-parents, to his remotest ancestors. They exclaimed: "You are not our king yet, for a little while we will do what we please with you. By-and-by we shall have to do your will," this being the authorised coronation ceremony of an absolute king.

Balzac's First Book.

WHEN Balzac was at the beginning of his career, and known only to the few who had chanced upon his brilliant sketches in the Paris newspapers, it so happened that one of these sparkling effusions fell in the way of a Paris bookseller and was published. The bookseller had, or thought he had from long experience, a shrewd idea of what would take with the Parisian public. He folded the paper and laid it down with an air of decision, saying as he did so: "I will offer that fellow three thousand francs for a novel. I may have to pay more, but I'll try three thousand to start with." Next morning the bookseller started out to find Balzac. His quest took him into an obscure street in one of the oldest and poorest parts of the city. As he turned into the dingy thoroughfare, he said to himself as he looked about: "Ah, indeed, he must be a plebeian; I will offer him two thousand francs—no more." Somewhat weary, the bookseller at length found the house; it was high, dingy, and not too clean. "Oh, I shall say one thousand five hundred," was his resolve as he crossed the threshold. M. Balzac lived on the fourth floor, and his visitor climbed the rickety stairs. "Aha! one thousand francs; not a sou more," was his mental determination. But when he stepped into the shabby room and saw a young man dipping a penny roll into a glass of water, three hundred francs, just one-tenth the sum first intended, was the offer that sprang to his lips, and for this amount he received the manuscript of what was afterwards considered a masterpiece.

Cookery.

A FRENCH LITTLE DINNER.

THERE are times when in an ordinary English household it is difficult, if not impossible, to get even a small dinner properly cooked. During the spring cleaning, a little washing, the chimney swept, or the "day out" of one of the servants, it is generally found necessary to have cold meat for the family, and politely to request the master of the house to dine "in town." Indeed, the occasions on which this request is preferred become so frequent that he never feels able to calculate on dining at his own table. If the business of eating were as seriously regarded as it ought to be by English people, such a state of things would not be allowed to exist. It should be for no light cause that the master of the house is required to eat either club or restaurant dinners, or the mistress and children to exist on cold meat or scraps. It was once our privilege to dine with a French neighbour in what she called "gipsy fashion," and by way of showing what can be done under difficulties, we will relate our experience.

This French lady and her husband had lived in a quiet way, keeping but two servants, a French cook and housemaid, and were on the point of leaving England. Madame had been in town all day, and it was not until late in the evening that we were able to see her on some little matters connected with her departure.

"Now," she said, "do stay and dine with us in 'gipsy fashion'; the housemaid left yesterday, being placed; there is only cook to wait at table, and as she has been busy packing all day, she has not changed her dress. The wine-glasses are packed, and we have but one decanter left; but do stay, if you can put up with things."

We protested, but stayed, and, as will be seen, had a little dinner to remember, not to say some food for reflection. Every dish was perfect in its way, and if we omit the pâté de foies gras and the truffles, the cost of this exquisite little dinner would be considerably less than that of an ordinary joint and pudding at a well-ordered English table. We give the menu; it had been composed for two, but was amply sufficient for four persons. Probably the rechauffé for the morrow's breakfast suffered from the unexpected numbers of the dinner-party, but as madame's cook always had eggs and gravy in the house, there was no need to be uneasy on that score. With these materials a clever cook can always extemporise a little feast.

MENU.

Bread Soup.
Herrings with Mustard Sauce.
Pâté de Foies Gras. Brain Fritters.
Veal à la Casserole. Macaroni à la Milanaise.
Omelette au Confiture.
Stilton Cheese.

BREAD SOUP.

This was merely a good brown bouillon, perfectly clear, with some pieces of bread cut very thin and put into it just before serving, apparently only to justify the name of the soup. As a rule soups are not made so strong in France as in England, and are not regarded so much as nourishment as a preliminary to, and preparation for, the good dishes of the dinner, and no doubt from a dietetic point of view this is correct.

HERRINGS WITH MUSTARD SAUCE.

Put a tablespoonful of the finest salad-oil into a dish, pass the herrings through it on both sides. The fish must not be opened, and, with a little care, can easily be properly cleansed. Lightly pepper and salt the herrings, which should have soft roes, and let them lie for an hour. Place them on a gridiron over a very slow fire, turn them often until done; they will take from fifteen to twenty minutes. To make the sauce for four herrings, take half a pint of white stock, stir into it, whilst boiling, an ounce of fine flour and a teaspoonful of French mustard mixed smooth in a little cold water, continue stirring over the fire until thickened, add an ounce of butter, and a large pinch of parsley finely chopped, pepper and salt to taste. Stir the sauce until the butter, which should be broken into little bits, is dissolved, and be careful it does not boil after this addition. Lay the herrings on a hot dish, pour the sauce round them, and serve.

PÂTÉ DE FOIES GRAS.

"Whilst we wait for the fritters," said our host, "let us dally with this morsel of pâté." It was made by Humel, and was exquisite. We give the name of the maker, in case any of our readers should be tempted to indulge in this delicacy. "And now," continued monsieur, "we must have a glass of this Chambertin which goes so well with the pâté;" and, as we tasted, we came to the conclusion that those who can afford foies gras, must also afford Chambertin.

BRAIN FRITTERS.

Procure an ox brain, carefully wash it, and boil it for a quarter of an hour in well-seasoned stock. When the brain is cold, cut it into slices as thin as possible, dip each of them in batter, drop them as you do them into fat at a temperature of four hundred and thirty degrees, or that which will brown instantly a piece of bread dipped into it. To make the batter, mix two large tablespoonfuls of fine flour with four of cold water, mix in a tablespoonful of dissolved butter or of fine oil, the yolk of an egg, and a pinch of salt and pepper. Let the batter stand for two hours, and when ready to use, beat the white of the egg to a strong froth, and mix with it. Do not fry more than two fritters at once; as you take them up, throw them on paper to absorb any grease clinging to them; serve on a napkin or ornamental dish-paper. If this recipe is closely followed, the fritters will be light, crisp, delicate morsels melting in the mouth, and form besides a very pretty dish. Garnish with fried parsley. Take care the parsley is thoroughly dry; put it into a small frying-basket, and immerse it for an instant in hot fat. Turn it out on paper, dry, and serve.

VEAL À LA CASSEROLE.

For this dish a piece of the fillet, about three inches thick, will be required, and weighing from two to three pounds. It should be cut from one side of the leg without bone; but sometimes butchers object to give it, as cutting in this manner interferes with cutlets. In such a case a piece must be chosen near the knuckle, and the bone be taken out before cooking. For a large party a thick slice of the fillet, weighing about four pounds, will be found advantageous. With a piece of tape tie the veal into a round shape, flour, and put it into a stewpan with a small piece of butter; fry until it becomes brown on all sides. Then add half a pint of good gravy, nicely seasoned with pepper and salt, cover the stewpan closely, and set it on the stove to cook very slowly for at least four hours. When done the veal will be exquisitely tender, full of flavour, but not the least ragged. Take the meat up, and keep hot whilst the gravy is reduced by boiling, without the lid of the saucepan, to a rich glaze, then pour over the meat and serve.

MACARONI À LA MILANAISE.

Boil a quarter of a pound of the best Italian macaroni in a quart of water, with a little salt, until tender. When done drain it as dry as possible, put it into a stewpan with two or three spoonfuls of good gravy, an ounce of butter, and an ounce of grated Parmesan cheese. Stir over a slow fire for five minutes. Have ready some truffles, cut in slices, and stewed for a quarter of an hour in gravy; mix them with the macaroni, and serve.

OMELETTE AU CONFITURE.

Break three eggs into a basin, beat them with a small pinch of salt, a teaspoonful of sifted sugar, three tablespoonfuls of milk, and a few drops of extract of vanilla, for four or five minutes. Have ready in the omelet-pan, an ounce of fresh butter. When it is beginning to get brown, pour in the omelet mixture, hold the pan still over a moderate fire for half a minute, then, with a silver fork, keep stirring in the middle. When the omelet is beginning to set over the whole surface, and it is taking colour on the under side, shake the pan round and round, and when finished, spread a tablespoonful of apricot preserve on it. Shake the pan, hold it close to the dish, and slide half the omelet on to it. With a jerk turn over the other half, so that the omelet presents the appearance of an oval golden-coloured cushion. Take care not to cook the omelet too much. It is proper to have it rather underdone, or lightly set, on the inner side.

Epsom Races.

THERE is no certainty as to when racing began on Epsom Downs; but most antiquaries believe that it was in the reign of James I., who loved a good horse, and liked to sweep up a stake. Certain it is that in 1648, six hundred Cavalier gentlemen assembled at Epsom Downs, under pretence of a horse-race, and marched from there to Reigate. Major Audely, with five troops of horse and three of foot, overtook them at Ewell, had a skirmish with them at Nonsuch Park, and charged and routed them on a hill near Kingston. The Duke of Buckingham, a noble, brave, and handsome youth, set his back to an elm-tree, and there fought desperately at bay, till he was struck down. At Kingston the Cavaliers rallied, and drove back the Puritan cavalry.

The Epsom races can only be clearly traced back as far as the year 1780, when the famous Madcap ran and won, and proved the best plate horse in England. That was also the year of the first Derby, when nine started, the race being won by Sir C. Bunbury's Diomed, ridden by the famous S. Arnall, who won the race many times after this first victory. The races were at first held in the spring and autumn, and being then comparatively local, began at eleven, and were conducted in a quiet, leisurely way, the company usually trooping off to the town for a general dinner after the two first heats had been run, and returning to another tranquil race after having enjoyed their wine.

In 1825, sixty thousand persons were thought a grand assemblage at the Derby. The London, Dorking, Worthing, and Chichester coaches brought down a good many visitors, but there were no trains to pour their two hundred thousand at once upon the town. The day was not the carnival then it is now; no green boughs, false noses, or paper feathers enlivened the noisy, jostling procession. It must have been a sober trotting along of long-coated men in cocked-hats, out for a mere day's fresh air, and a picnic.

Durdans, near Epsom (once the seat of the Heathcotes, but now the property of the Earl of Rosebery), was built by Lord Berkeley from the ruins of Nonsuch, and very full of old memorials the place is. Pepys mentions (Sept. 16, 1660) going to St. James's, to see the Duke of York, and finding him starting with the king, queen, and Prince Rupert to dine at Durdans. Evelyn, too, mentions, in his quiet, amiable way, going to Durdans, in 1665, and finding an assembly of savans—Dr. Wilkins, Sir William Pelly, and Mr. Hooke—"contriving chariots, new rigging for ships," and of all things in the world—what was no doubt a sort of bicycle—"a wheel to run races in." He adds: "Perhaps three such persons together were not found elsewhere in Europe for parts and ingenuity." Wilkins was the man who tried to establish a universal language, and so nullify the fatal curse of Babel; Hooke was an astronomer, who was jealous of Newton, and claimed to have discovered the law of gravitation; and Pelly was one of the most active founders of the Royal Society.

The great days of Durdans were when Frederick, Prince of Wales, the son of George II., came to reside there. It was this patron of dancing-masters and toadies who first gave rise to the saying, "That whether there was peace or war abroad, there was sure to be family discord among the Guelphs." His sisters despised him; his strutting, little, demoralised father pronounced him a puppy, fool, and scoundrel; his mother cursed the hour in which he was born; and the prime minister described him as a poor, weak, irresolute, false, lying, contemptible wretch! While still a lad he drank and gambled. "Oh, the tricks of pages!" said his mother to his father. "No," replied the bear-leader; "I wish to Heaven they were—they are the tricks of lacqueys, rascals." One day, looking out from a window at St. James's, he saw Bubb Doddington, a noted character of the day, roll by. "There," said the estimable prince, "there goes a man they call the most sensible fellow in England; yet, with all his cleverness, I have just nicked him out of five hundred pounds." He joined the Opposition to spite his father and Sir Robert Walpole, and earned his father's undying hate by removing his wife when she was in actual labour from Hampton Court to St. James's, from whence he was very soon "quoited" to Kew. His mother, on her death-bed, refused to insult his father by seeing him.

During the '45 Rebellion, he showed some feeble desire to lead the army, being jealous of his truculent brother, the Duke of Cumberland; but the fool's ambition subsided into having a model of Carlisle Castle made in confectionery, and bombarding it with sugar-plums at the head of his maids-of-honour and mistresses. Eventually the poor creature died from a cold caught by putting on a thin silk coat in the month of March. In a fit of coughing he broke an internal abscess, cried out, "I feel death!" and almost immediately expired. The bitter Jacobite epitaph upon him was only too just:

Here lies Fred,
Who was alive and is dead;
Had it been his father,
I had much rather;
Had it been his brother,
Still better than another;
Had it been his sister,
No one would have missed her;
Had it been the whole generation,
Still better for the nation;
But since 'tis only Fred,
Who was alive and is dead,
There's no more to be said.

Some traditions of Fred still linger about Epsom.

An obelisk (the flint of which went to face St. Martin's Church, in the town) that formerly stood at the end of an avenue of walnut-trees in the Common Fields, marked the spot of Fred's only victory. The prince one morning, walking alone in his white silk coat, espied a specially sable sweep sitting contemplatively under one of the trees, perhaps fatigued with the ascent of the palace chimneys. Fred, indignant at such an unmannered churl coming between the wind and his nobility, bade him begone, and at once. The weary sweep, espying a top or a footman—he hardly knew which—refused point-blank. The prince flourished his clouded cane, which the sweep immediately wrenched from his hand and threw away, then stripped and offered combat. The prince, with a spark of the spirit of his grandsire at Dettingen, threw off his silk coat and fell to. Tradition, generally loyal, affirms that the sweep was beaten; but there certainly are calumnious reports that the sweep conquered, and set his black foot on the wizen neck of his royal antagonist. Other local historians make George III. (when a boy) the adversary and conqueror of the sweep—such is history. Certain it is that young Prince George was much here at the time when the populace were so jealous of his mother's unwise intimacy with handsome Lord Bute. Soon after Fred's lamented death, a Mr. Belchir rebuilt Durdans, but a fire destroyed the place, and one of the Heathcotes reared the present structure of red brick bound with stone.

Public Suicides in China.

THE most barbarous of all the death-rites which have been observed in China was that of immolating human beings at the tombs of the departed great. As many as one hundred and seventy-seven men have been buried alive in the tomb of a single individual. This horrible custom does not prevail at all now, of course, but the same false and inadequate notions of the sacredness of human life do prevail universally. But of all Chinese customs the most remarkable has been the prevalent, public, fashionable suicides, conducted in public with every show of pomp, and sometimes actually under the general direction of a mandarin. A gay procession would be formed, and a delighted throng would follow the prospective victim to a scaffold which had been erected with great care. The seats commanding the best view of the sacrifice would be sold, and there would be a grand turn-out of the suiciding party's friends, as well as of the public at large. Perhaps it would be a young widow, who had resolved to end her miserable existence on account of the death of her husband, a widow not being privileged to re-marry in China. The occasion would be treated as a regular holiday by the natives. For a time the woman would chat pleasantly with her friends, partaking of a bountiful feast with them on the gallows. Then, having caressed a little child that was placed upon the table before her, and adorned it with a necklace, she would take a basket of flowers and scatter the blossoms gaily among the crowd, after which she would cheerfully place her head in the noose and swing off into eternity. As a rule, suicides are now performed without such publicity, but they are very common.

Teaching at Home.

ENGLISH LITERATURE. PART II.

A GENTLEMAN was one day deploring to a lady friend, what seemed to him the very defective education of some young nieces, in whom he was interested. The young ladies in question had been most carefully brought up, were charming, amiable, and accomplished, but seemed to be utterly and hopelessly ignorant of the ordinary affairs of life, knew nothing about the value of money, and were quite unaware that an income, which was reckoned by hundreds, would not supply the same luxuries as one which was counted by thousands.

The lady, having listened sympathetically to her friend's complaint, remarked: "I should like to ask you one question. Do your nieces ever read novels?"

"Never," was the reply; "their parents do not approve of them, and have taken care that their daughters should never read any."

"Then," returned the lady, "the best thing I can suggest is, that they should go through a course of novels immediately."

I am not in a position to state whether the advice was followed, but my experience leads me to think it was sound; no young woman, I imagine, could read through, say, Mr. Trollope's novels, and retain such unconsciousness of the difference between hundreds and thousands.

THE value of fiction as a means of education is not always sufficiently appreciated; yet, when rightly used, there is no greater help to be had anywhere, than in the imaginative literature with which we are so richly blest.

NO doubt it is very proper that our children should learn about their forefathers and feel they are English down to their finger-nails, as they thrill over the Spanish Armada or Battle of Waterloo. It is well, too, that they should learn the outward aspect of the world they live in, and geography may be made a most improving and interesting study. But there is a certain direction to be given to the taste and feelings, which can not be made the subject of formal lessons, and here the help of literature is invaluable.

FEW habits of mind are stronger than that which betrays the child of refined bringings up into a feeling of scorn for the "common people" around him. A child of ten or twelve in the private box or dress circle of a theatre will sometimes look with a sort of contempt and disgust at what he considers to be the vulgar creatures in the gallery, indulging in oranges and ginger-beer between the acts; but granted that he has average quickness of feeling, and let him read how Kit's mother and Barbara's mother went to the play, and it will cure him of despising his fellow-creatures more than any direct moralising could do. His contempt will give place to amusement, and he may feel a touch of tenderness as he wonders whether some chubby-faced urchin aloft has any resemblance to "little Jacob."

I WOULD specially recommend Scott and Dickens as the two novelists who will be most useful for young people, and they will also be found more popular among them than any of our other first-rate authors. Dickens's works are particularly good for home-bred girls, who are apt to be deficient in the sense of humour, and are too often afflicted with a painful narrowmindedness, which disposes them to think everything wrong which they do not see done at home. The power of looking on the comic side of things is a great corrective to this frame of mind.

In both of these authors, moreover, vice is portrayed in a manner which would not sully the purest mind, and the love-scenes occupy a very subordinate position, and do not offend against the feeling of reserve, which is very strong on this subject among healthily natured boys and girls.

NOVELS consisting chiefly of descriptions of "society," in the narrow sense of the word, are not generally good reading for children. In many cases such books give a very one-sided and incorrect picture of society, and, even when well drawn, are not particularly interesting to quite young people. Miss Austen and Thackeray, for instance, can only be appreciated by those who have already some knowledge and experience of society beyond what children usually acquire.

THE books that children can enter into and profit by are those that give the universal rather than the temporary aspect of human nature, which, I suppose, explains how Shakespeare can be so largely understood and enjoyed by boys and girls.

THE modern tendency of making Shakespeare into a lesson seems to me rather a mistake. It is little good trying to give children anything like a critical knowledge of the plays—you only teach them to parrot other people's ideas; and, after all, the best use we can make of our greatest poet is to enjoy him. As Shakespeare wrote his plays to be acted, it seems probable that the stage will best enable us to understand them. Certainly this is the case as far as children are concerned, and where parents have it in their power to do so, I should recommend them to take their children where they have a chance of seeing one of Shakespeare's plays fairly well acted. The fashion of afternoon performances greatly facilitates this, especially in the case of delicate children, who cannot stand late hours.

IT is also a very good plan to encourage children to act among themselves. Of course no one would propose their acting through a play, but schoolboys of twelve and fourteen find the short scene from "Julius Cæsar," or "Pyramus and Thisbe," most interesting to act, and where there is a nice little sister to undertake Titania, the fairy scenes from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" are most effective, recruits being enlisted from among the "nursery children" to play the fairies. The statue scene from "A Winter's Tale" is a very telling one, and even bits from the "Tempest" are not beyond amateurs who bring a little ingenuity to the task. The preparation of two or three scenes will help to provide occupation for a holiday season; nor is it necessary to victimise one's acquaintance by inviting a party to witness the performance. A fond grandmother, or an indulgent aunt, added to the other grown-up members of the household, will be quite sufficient audience to give zest to the affair, and it is well that the children should get their pleasure from the acting itself, rather than from any admiration that their acting may excite. The praises of mothers and grandmothers are understood even by children to be chiefly the results of affection, and have a very different effect from the injudicious flatteries of chance acquaintances, who, for their parts, are only too happy to escape the infliction of looking on at the performances of other people's children, unless the said children are unusually gifted. The habit of reading aloud is an excellent one to cultivate, and children get a truer and more improving knowledge of literature by listening to what the great writers have actually written, than by learning any number of "primers" describing their works.

THOUGH I have dwelt so much on the advantages to be derived from fiction, I by no means recommend that the pupil be confined to it.

BOOKS of travel and adventure, like Miss Bird's most interesting volumes on the Sandwich Islands, Rocky Mountains, and Japan, or Kane's "Arctic Voyages," Waterton's "Wanderings," and parts of Wallace's "Malay Archipelago," may all be made interesting to children; not forgetting to have an atlas at hand to turn to in case of need. Where access can be had to an old library, many of the earlier travellers will well repay looking through. Captain Cook, for instance, and Mungo Park, having an abundance of interesting adventures.

SOME of the essays of Elia are generally liked by children. "The Vicar of Wakefield," Defoe's "History of the Plague," many of the papers out of the Spectator, particularly the allegorical ones, the one on popular superstitions, and the Sir Roger de Coverley ones, selections from Pepys's and Evelyn's diaries, "Don Quixote"—which though not English, may be termed European—and Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," are all specimens of our earlier literature within the compass of the understandings of children between ten and fifteen.

IN poetry, such pieces as Macaulay's "Lays of Ancient Rome," Aytoun's "Lays of the Cavaliers," Lockhart's "Spanish Ballads," are much preferred to moralisings over butterflies and buttercups, and other kindred subjects. Hood's poems, both comic and serious, are general favourites, and so is Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner." I never knew a child to read "Paradise Lost" of his own free will, though exceptional children may have done so; and the only writings of Milton that generally suit them are the "Allegro," "Il Penseroso," and "Comus." The last is one of the loveliest poems in our language, and a strong cast of amateur actors could hardly choose a better piece to revive than this charming old masque.

BYRON has such a bad reputation among English people that they are apt to deny he is our third greatest poet, a position unhesitatingly accorded to him on the Continent, where he is, moreover, generally looked on as a hero and a patriot. But though one might hesitate to place his works in a child's hands, there is no reason why one should not read to them such splendid stanzas as "The Isles of Greece" out of "Don Juan." "The Prisoner of Chillon," again, is quite unobjectionable, and I have known it to be listened to with breathless interest by quite young children.

THE great thing is to read with your charges yourself, whether they are your pupils or your children; enjoy together the generous sentiments and bright fancies with which our literature abounds; exchange confidences on the subject of your favourite authors, and while they get the benefit of your larger experience, you will find your own interest increased by contact with the fresh young minds whose enthusiasm and powers of enjoyment are as yet undiminished by the cares and disappointments of life.

Household Gardening.

THE time is approaching when many tender plants that are preserved in rooms and greenhouses during the winter will have to be transferred to beds, borders, or window-boxes for flowering during the summer months. Zonal Pelargoniums, Heliotropes, Calceolarias, Lobelias, Salvias, Ageratums, Verbenas, Petunias, and Golden Feather rank amongst the most popular of what are termed "bedding plants" for embellishing gardens from June to October. Hardy perennial border-flowers are attractive and interesting, but few of them flower continuously for three or four months, and they are not for certain purposes and positions so effective as the more tender plants referred to. Of these, Pelargoniums, or, as they are popularly termed, Geraniums, are the most popular, and in the majority of gardens indispensable.

ACCLIMATISING PLANTS.

All plants of a tender nature, no matter what they are, that have been wintered under glass, must have a gradation of temperature to prepare them for exposure to the drying effects of the sun in the day and the cold at night in the open air.

They should first be removed from the greenhouse or window to a frame, keeping them close for a few days, then admitting air more and more freely until the lights can be drawn off entirely, for an hour or two at first, then for a whole day, and eventually at night. In this way the plants are gradually inured to the change that awaits them, and do not suffer by a violent transition from heat to cold.

Those who have no frame in which to place the plants preparatory to full exposure, should take advantage of mild weather for standing them out of doors in the warmest and most sheltered position at command, shading them for a time from bright sun by day, and always from frost and cutting winds at night.

THE DANGER OF SCORCHING.

Many persons when they first place plants in the open air, think that the more sun they can have, the better. This is a great mistake. Numbers of plants are seriously injured, if not ruined, by the practice referred to, and a moment's reflection will show the reason of their collapse when what may be termed the philosophy of the subject is once explained.

The leaves of plants that have been long under glass during the dark days of winter, are naturally thin in texture, being comparatively destitute of that tissue and substance which are present in plants that grow under the full influence of light and air in the summer months.

Those thin or flimsy plants have only a small amount of moisture in the leaves, and this the sun extracts in an hour or two when the foliage is exposed to its rays. When this occurs the leaves first wither or turn limp, then curl at the edges, turn brown, shrivel, and die. They scorch just the same as a piece of paper is scorched by placing it in contact with the heat from a fire.

This scorching of the leaves of plants first placed in the open air must be avoided by shading them for a time from the heat of the sun; the leaves must, in fact, be kept green, and this will be evidence that they are not scorched, but in a condition to perform their functions in maintaining the health of the plants. This is an element in acclimatising plants, or preparing them for the open air, that is worthy of being kept in remembrance.

WATERING BEDDING PLANTS.

When plants are first placed in the open air, and the weather is bright, with brisk, drying winds prevalent, the evaporation from the soil in the pots, also from the foliage, is far greater than was the case when the plants were in a greenhouse, room, or frame, and consequently more water is often needed by the plants outdoors than in.

This is a matter that must be carefully attended to, for if the soil is permitted to get quite dry, and to remain so for any length of time, the roots of the plants will at once shrivel, and growth will be arrested. At the same time the soil must not be made soppy with an excess of water, or the roots will decay.

Early in the morning, say about nine o'clock, when the day promises to be bright, all plants that may be placed outdoors should be examined, and those, and those only, that show symptoms of dryness be given water. This will keep them fresh throughout the day, and at the same time any excess of moisture will pass off before night, extreme wetness then rendering plants liable to injury by even slight frosts, that often occur at this season of the year.

Thus it will be seen that the three main points to be attended to in acclimatising plants, or preparing them for a sojourn in the open air, are shading, sheltering, and watering. Those who act the most thoughtfully and judiciously in these matters will succeed the best in the important work in question.

A SLIGHT HOTBED.

Those who have the means for stacking up a bed of fresh horse-stable manure or leaves, or, what is better, a mixture of both, and can place a frame on it, covering the surface of the beds with sawdust, cocoanut-fibre refuse, or light soil, will have a great advantage in raising seedlings of such tender plants as Balsams, Egg Plants, Zinnias, Ice Plants, Tomatoes, Cucumbers, Vegetable Marrows, etc., for planting out in June.

When beds of fermenting materials are made in February or March, they have to be built four feet high for affording and maintaining the requisite heat, whereas, made now, a height of two or three feet will suffice, as only a gentle, not a powerful heat is needed.

If manure and leaves cannot be had, useful beds for the purpose in question may be formed with tan, or spent hops, which are plentiful in some districts; but hotbeds so formed must be enclosed with boards, as they cannot be built the same as with manure.

A deep frame half-filled or a little more with the refuse in question, leaving just sufficient space between the surface of the bed and glass roof or covering of the frame for pots to stand on, will be found very useful for raising a number of seedlings, also for afterwards growing to a fruiting state a Cucumber or Tomato plant.

RAISING TOMATO PLANTS.

Whenever a night temperature of from fifty-five degrees can be provided, and a very light house or frame, the raising of plants of this popular fruit is an easy process.

Fill a five-inch pot with light rich soil to within an inch of the rim, water it well, and an hour after sprinkle a few Tomato seeds on the surface, then scatter a little fine soil over them, and place a square of glass across the pot. In the temperature named, the soil being kept moist, the seed will germinate in a few days, and a number of young plants will soon be obtained.

When these are an inch or two high, they should be potted singly in small pots, which, however, should only be three parts filled with soil at first, and more can be afterwards added, and the plants will emit shoots from the stems, and will thereby be considerably strengthened. By the first week in June, the young Tomato plants will be strong yet sturdy, and in fine condition for planting either under glass or against a warm wall or fence in the open air.

The varieties of Tomatoes are now very numerous, and they vary somewhat in colour and quality. Three very good and distinct sorts are Carters' Dedham Favourite, crimson; Greengage, citron; and Stamfordian, scarlet. These, or any of them, well grown, will give satisfaction, being productive, handsome, and of superior quality.

Many persons have the means for growing Tomatoes if they have strong plants for planting at the right time; but they lack the requisite convenience for raising the seedlings. In such cases it is far the best plan not to attempt the work, as plenty of strong plants can be purchased in May or June at a trifling cost.

RAISING CUCUMBERS.

Plants of these cannot be successfully raised where the temperature falls below sixty degrees. This ensured, and a moist, genial atmosphere maintained, the seeds will germinate and the plants grow freely in fresh loamy soil, not pressed too firmly in the pots. Two or three seeds placed edgewise in the soil in a three or four inch pot, will suffice; the plants to be afterwards potted off as advised for Tomatoes. Purchasing strong plants is, however, often the cheapest and best plan for the adoption of amateurs.

Amongst the best and most productive Cucumbers for frames and houses, are Carters' Model, Cardiff Castle, and Telegraph. The best for growing outdoors is the Stockwood Ridge.

RAISING VEGETABLE MARROWS.

These are raised exactly the same as Cucumbers, but will succeed in a lower temperature, or similar to that recommended for Tomatoes. Strong plants are, however, plentifully offered in the markets towards the end of May, in case any persons who attempt raising plants for themselves fail in their object.

The most useful variety of Marrow is the Large Cream, but a new variety, Muir's Prolific, is of superior quality, the fruit being of medium size. Further particulars relative to the culture of the crops under notice will be given in a future issue.

A Lesson in Boxing.

JIMMYSON is very proud of his muscle, and the other day he took a friend from the country to the gymnasium to show him something about the manly art.

"Yes," said Jimmyson, "I may not look it, but when I get the gloves on I'm quite a slogger, an amateur Tom Sayers, as it were."

"You surprise me," said the man from the country. "I had no idea you were so proficient."

"I know a little about boxing," continued Jimmyson, "though I do say it myself."

Then he struck at an imaginary adversary, assumed a number of positions, offensive and defensive, and showed off to excellent advantage. Presently he saw a little, dried-up fellow, who had on a pair of gloves, but who looked awkward and uncomfortable.

"Do you see that chap?" remarked Jimmyson. "Watch me paralyse him. I'll show him something about boxing."

"My friend," he observed to the other, "those gloves don't seem to fit you; it seems you don't know how to put them on."

"Oh yes, I do," said the other.

"Are you sure?" asked Jimmyson.

"I believe so."

"You should wear them like this, and hold your arms thus. Let's have a little friendly bout, and I'll show you how," and Jimmyson winked to the man from the country, and whispered that the fun was about to begin.

"You want to box," said the little man.

"Yes, a round or two. I'll stop whenever you say so," and Jimmyson smiled again as he thought how he would knock the other out of time.

He made a blow at the little man, but missing him he found that he was almost knocked off his feet by a whack on the side of the head. Whew! how the other made his arms fly! Jimmyson was like a child, and in a moment his eyes were blackened, his nose was bleeding, and he imagined that some one was pounding him, under the impression that he was a beefsteak. Finally he received a blow that sent him sprawling fairly into the arms of the man from the country, who tenderly held him from falling.

"Now, look here, my hearty," said the little man, "the next time you offer to show a champion of the light-weights how to box you'll know it. You'll stop when I say so—eh? Very kind of you, I'm sure."

Jimmyson stayed at home next morning, in bed. He has resolved to quit the gymnasium if professionals are admitted.

Odds and Ends.

HERR JONAS LIE, in his biography of Ole Bull, gives, among many others, the following good story. A man who had a patent varnish for violins, brought his invention to Ole Bull and begged him to try it. He said that it gave ordinary instruments the sweet quality of a Cremona fiddle. Ole Bull tried it, and found that it did really improve the tone, and promised to use a violin prepared with it at a concert he had to give at the house of the Duke of Riario. There was a great deal of fashionable company collected at this concert, and the heat of the room melted the famous varnish, which was really a preparation of assafetida. The smell which it exuded was so maddening that an ordinary man would have stopped and have excused himself; but Ole Bull merely closed his eyes, turned his face away, and played with an energy which became more frenzied the more intolerable the stink became. He enjoyed an overwhelming success, and when the duke rushed forward to seize his hand in congratulation, the appalling odour of assafetida struck him in the face, and Ole Bull had to explain in what an agony he had been performing.

A CURIOUS personage died recently in Paris, the Count Napoleon Bertrand, son of the companion of Napoleon I. at St. Helena. The count was a very eccentric man, and every year he used to hire a room in an hotel, and go to bed for three months, after having given orders for food to be brought to him once a day, and not a word to be spoken by the servant. He was asleep during the siege of Paris. One day the bread was so abominable that he flew into a rage, and forced the waiter to tell him that the reason was that the city was besieged by the Prussians. The count was stupefied for a moment. At last he got up and wandered about the hotel for a time, saying to himself: "Paris besieged—besieged! What ought a Bertrand to do?" After a few minutes' reflection, he added: "I will go to bed." And he went to bed and slept out the siege.

It is very seldom you hear of a German having asthma, but we know one who had this ailment. He sent for the doctor the other day, and he gave him a prescription, and told him to take a walk on an empty stomach. But this part of the business he did not quite understand, and consequently got no better from taking medicine. The next time the doctor called he found his patient in a high temper. "I vash so sick as never vas all night. Now, doctor, I don't want no voolishness mit me; I dell you dat right away." "But I am not fooling you," replied the doctor. "Have not you taken the medicine?" "Yaw; but it vash no better ash water." "But have you taken the walk on an empty stomach, as I told you?" "There, there ish vere ter voolings comes in. Whose stomach must I walk on?"

A CERTAIN sea captain who had considerable interest, with his brother officers, and the cook aboard his vessel, were once to be tried for an offence against the laws of the navy, of such a nature as put their lives in jeopardy. The cook displayed every mark of fear and apprehension for his safety. The captain, on the contrary, seemed in very good spirits, and said: "Cheer up, man; why should you be cast down? I fear nothing, and why should you?" "Why, faith, your honour," replied the fellow, "I should be as courageous as you are, if we were to be tried by a jury of cooks."

SOME people are very stupid. There's Gragle, for instance. Good fellow, but woefully dull. In conversation with a friend, he remarked: "I regard the use of beer as the true temperance principle. When I work all day and am exhausted, nothing helps me like a glass of beer. It assists nature, you understand." "It makes a regular fool of me," the friend replied. "That's what I say, it assists nature." And even after the friend scowled at him, Gragle didn't realise that he had said anything inappropriate.

A COUNTRY fellow entered one of the banks, and, walking up to the counter, exclaimed: "Here I am, I want you to take a fair look at me." Without a word further, he strode out. The next day the same customer appeared, uttered the same words, and again disappeared. The third day, at about the same time, he walked in, and advancing to the teller's desk, threw down a draft payable three days after sight. "Now," said he, "you've seen me three times, I want the money for it."

A NOTED physician once sent his man with a box of pills to a patient, and a hamper containing six live pullets to be left at the house of a friend of his. Unluckily the messenger bungled over his errand and took the hamper to the patient and the pills to his master's friend. Imagine the consternation of the patient on receiving along with the fowls the following prescription: "Two of these to be swallowed every half-hour."

It is often easier to make great sacrifices than little ones. It is easier to do battle for a grand idea than to give up a prejudice. Yet it is the little things of life that contribute most largely to its fret and worry or to its peace and gladness; and he who possesses the true spirit of conciliation knows that no right is too small to be respected, no kindness too trifling to be rendered, no part of life too insignificant to command consideration.

PHYSICIANS assert that a well-balanced brain contributes to long life, while a passionate and turbulent one does much to abridge it, and that if persons knew how many dangers in life they escaped by possessing mildness of temper, instead of the opposite disposition, how eager would be the aim of all men to cultivate it.

As a part of the marriage ceremony in Servia, the bride has to hold a piece of sugar between her lips as a sign that she will speak little and sweetly during her married life.

JOHN PYM, the Republican statesman, said: "I had rather suffer for speaking the truth, than that the truth should suffer for want of my speaking."

ALL brave men love, for he only is brave who has affections to fight for, whether in the daily battle of life or in physical contests.

A MAN would never be too confident of anything if he always remembered how often he had been mistaken.

How different are the ready hand, tearful eye, and soothing voice from the ostentatious appearance which is called pity!

If the waves threaten to engulf you, don't add your tears to the amount of water.

THE French comedian Perlet was extraordinarily thin. At last he became such a skeleton that he consulted a physician, who recommended him to try some baths in the Pyrenees. Having obtained leave of absence from his manager, he betook himself to the mineral springs, where he bathed unremittingly, but all in vain; he did not increase in size. "Patience," urged the doctor; "there is nothing like our baths for making people fat." One day, as Perlet was waiting philosophically in his bath for an emboupoint which never came, he heard a conversation in the next room, from which his own was divided by only a thin partition, and which was occupied by an enormous woman, fat as the Hottentot Venus. "Doctor," said she, "I am getting tired of this." "Why?" asked the Æsculapius. "I have been here two months." "Well?" "Well, I am as enormous as I was when I came." "A little patience, madame," urged the doctor; "there is nothing like our baths for making people thin." Perlet, hearing these words, sprang out of his bath, dressed, rushed home to his hotel, ordered his bill, and left for Paris by the next train.

"I THOUGHT," said the senior Boggles, as he produced a suspicious-looking flat bottle from his son's valise, "that there was nothing but your surgical instruments in this bag." "That's what I said, dad." "Then, sir, what do you call this?" "That? Oh, that's my eye-opener, dad; very useful instrument, very useful; indispensable, I assure you."

"I DON'T understand why women dress that way," said a man, pointing at a lady who passed along the street. "I don't either," replied a bystander. "That woman," continued the first speaker, "is dressed ridiculously. Her husband must be a fool." "I know he is," said the bystander. "Do you know him?" "Oh yes. I am the fool myself."

A TICKET-OF-LEAVE man found in the street a gold bracelet set with emeralds. Next day he read in the papers a description of the article, with the additional notice: "Mademoiselle X. requests the finder to bring it to her address, as she greatly prizes it." "What bosh!" said the man; "as if I didn't prize it as much as she does!"

AN old fellow in Maine who had lately buried his fourth wife, was accosted by an acquaintance who, unaware of his bereavement, asked: "How is your wife, cap'n?" To which the captain replied with a perfectly grave face: "Waal, to tell you the trewth, I'm kinder out of wives just naow."

A YOUNG man went to call at a country farmhouse to see his sweetheart, who had charge of the dairy. When the old man opened the door he asked him timidly: "How is the milkmaid?" The farmer slammed the door and replied: "Our milk isn't made; it's got from the cow."

MODERN poets may well complain that all the similes have been used up before their time. "White as snow," "white as a lily," "white as ivory," are now general property; but a Welsh poet has an entirely new image. He boldly calls the maiden of his love "white as lime."

"WHAT is included in your curriculum?" Young Hopeful: "Our what, father?" "The curriculum of your college." "Well, to tell the truth, I don't know. You see, being the stroke oar and the captain of the boat club, I have not much time for botany."

A FRENCH lion-tamer quarrelled with his wife, a powerful virago, and was chased by her all round his tent. On being sorely pressed he took refuge in the cage among the lions. "Oh, you contemptible coward!" she shouted; "come out, if you dare!"

A PHOTOGRAPHER advertises: "In consequence of the daily increase of accidents by railway, the public are earnestly requested to call at —, and have their portraits taken, that some memento of departed friends may be left to sorrowing survivors."

"WHAT an appearance old Scrimp presented when he declined contributing towards the minister's salary!" said one church member to another. "Well," was the reply, "I thought he was too mean to present an appearance even."

ON leaving the theatre, Guibollard goes into the cloak-room to get his topcoat. "Your number?" asked the woman in charge. "My number? Oh, just look in the pocket of my topcoat; I put it there for fear of losing it."

A SCOTTISH student, supposed to be deficient in judgment, was asked by a professor, in course of his examination, how he would discover a fool. "By the questions he would ask," was the prompt and highly suggestive reply.

It is rather hard on the fair young autograph-collector to write to an absent-minded poet for his autograph, and then have him send her a nice little note in reply, all printed on a type-writer.

"ONE half the world don't know how the other half live!" exclaimed a gossiping woman. "Oh, well," said her neighbour, "don't worry about it; 'tisn't your fault if they don't know."

A REPORTER who attended a banquet, concluded his description with the candid statement that "it is not distinctly remembered by anybody present who made the last speech."

A LITTLE beggar-girl in London got hold of the wrong paper, which certified that "the bearer is a widow with five children, in destitute circumstances."

AN Irishman, having been told that the price of bread had been lowered, exclaimed: "That is the first time I ever rejoiced at the fall of my best friend!"

"THIS summer, ladies are going to dress their hair as they did a hundred years ago," says a newspaper. This makes some of the ladies pretty old.

A PHILOSOPHER who went to church where the people came in late, said it was "the fashion there for nobody to go till everybody got there."

SINCE there is no lead in lead-pencils, no soda in soda-water, and no relation of lamps to lamp-black, what is going to be done about it?

A MAN carries the borrowing principle a little too far when he asks us to lend him our ear.

THE man who made an impression on the heart of a coquette has become a skilful stonemason.

THE Hindoo widow is the only one that cremates. The others remate.

Correspondence.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Enquiries will be attended to as quickly as possible, but, as we have to go to press several days before publication, some delay is inevitable. In no case can questions be answered "next week," as some of our friends demand.

We have received several very unreasonable complaints of delay in attending to letters, which have been addressed to us by Correspondents who have paid no regard to the instructions which are given every week in this Journal.

The Editor is therefore compelled to give notice:

1. That all letters containing postage-stamps for copies of this Journal, or on similar business, must be addressed to the PUBLISHER.
2. That all letters containing enquiries for the Correspondence Column, or on literary business, must be addressed to the EDITOR.
3. That Correspondents are urgently requested to adopt distinctive pseudonyms, and not to use such vague signatures as "A Constant Reader," etc.
4. That Correspondents wishing to write on two or more subjects—say to send in an answer to a Correspondent, and to enclose stamps for a copy of the Journal—must send each communication in a separate envelope, properly addressed as above indicated.
5. That NO ATTENTION can be paid to any Correspondents who do not observe these rules.

ANSWERS.

BEATRICE.—The origin of mottoes of particular families is often of historic interest. It is said "Grip fast" of Leslie, Earl of Rothes, was gained by Bartholomew, the founder of the family, who was a noble Hungarian, and came to Scotland with Queen Margarine, 1067. He was much esteemed by King Malcolm Ceanmore, whose sister he married. He was Chamberlain to Queen Margarine. There being no carriages in those days, her majesty used to ride on a pillion behind him. On one occasion, while crossing a river, the queen nearly falling off, Bartholomew cried out, "Grip fast!" The queen replied, "Gin the buckle bide!" there being only one buckle to the belt by which she held on. After this his exclamation was given as the family motto, and two more buckles were added to the belt.

COUSIN LOU.—"Polenta" is made as follows: Put one pint of water in a stewpan; when it boils add a little salt and stir in with a stick sufficient coarse yellow maize flour to make it very thick; continue stirring till the mixture is well cooked, which you can tell by its rising in bubbles, then take it out with a spoon on to a napkin and mould the paste into the shape of a ball; let it cool a few minutes, then cut it in slices, which lay in a dish, sprinkle each layer with Parmesan cheese, and pour two ounces of dissolved butter over it; it may be eaten in this manner, or put in a brisk oven and baked. The polenta, when it comes out of the stewpan very hot, is nice served with sausages or little birds; the latter laid on the polenta, and gravy over them.

EXERCISED.—The Government would not interfere with any private mode of sepulture, provided it were not proved to be injurious to the health of surrounding inhabitants. In the case of the late Captain Hanham, the crematorium was erected in the grounds of Marston House, in anticipation of his death, by that gentleman himself.

EX-PUPIL TEACHER cannot do better than search the columns of the Schoolmistress, a weekly penny periodical for those engaged in female tuition, published at 15, Wine Office Court, Fleet Street. All books necessary for the purposes "E. P. T." mentions are therein advertised and recommended. Lessons on all required are continuously given in the Schoolmistress, and will furnish your friend with all she requires, of the best material, and in the best style.

G. B.—Whit Monday, 1st June, 1863.

G. D. L.—The word is spelled in both ways—Ailanthus and Ailantus—and is derived from Ailanto, the Malacca name for one species, signifying tree of heaven. The Ailanthus glandulosa is a handsome tree of India and China, attaining a height of sixty feet. It is planted in France and Germany to shade public walks, and has been called false varnish-tree. In Japan the produce of silkworms fed on this tree is very large, and the material, though wanting the fineness and gloss of mulberry silk, is produced at far less cost, and is more durable.

HARRIET H.—The following are two of the verses of the poem you want. It is to be found in a volume entitled "Wind Voices," by Philip B. Marston:

Pure souls that watch above me from afar,
To whom as to stars I raise my eyes,
Draw me to your large skies,
Where God and quiet are.

Ah, this I fear shall never chance to me,
And though I cannot shape the life I would,
It surely still is good
To look where such lives be.

MUSIOUS.—1. There is a very good little catechism of music published by Robert Cocks and Co., at a shilling. There is also a very good book on Harmony by Dr. Stainer, which contains questions at the end of each chapter. It is published at Novello's, in Berners Street, and is either 1s. 6d. or 2s. 2. "Piffarari," and "The Maypole Dance," by Sydney Smith, published by Edwin Ashdown, Hanover Square. "Spanish Album," and "Spanish Dances," by Mofkowsky, published at Augener's, in Regent Street. "A Village Dance," by Oscar Beringer. 3. We believe the "Limerick Races" is published by Chappell and Co., Bond Street.

OLD LADY.—We are glad to be able to print the little poem for which you ask. It is by Edmund Waller, and bears date 1645:

Go, lovely rose!
Tell her that wastes her time and me,
That now she knows,
When I remember her to thee,
How sweet and fair she seems to be.
Tell her that's young,
And shuns to have her graces spied,
That hadst thou sprung
In deserts, where no men abide,
Thou must have uncommended died.

Small is the worth
Of beauty from the light retired;
Bid her come forth,
Suffer herself to be desired,
And not blush so to be admired.

Then die, that she
The common fate of all things rare
May read in thee,
How small a part of time they share
That are so wondrous sweet and fair.

OPAQUE.—See "The Family Doctor" on "The Care of the Hands," HOUSEHOLD WORDS, No. 103.

PERPLEXED HOUSEKEEPER can darken her mahogany furniture by using a special polish, applied on the top of the French polish: One pint linseed-oil, one ounce rose-pink, one ounce of alkanet-root, beaten up in a metal mortar; let the mixture stand for a day or two, then pour off the oil, which will be found of a rich colour. To apply the staining polish, fold a piece of flannel into a sort of cushion, wet it well with the polish, then lay a piece of clean linen rag over the flannel; apply one drop of the coloured oil. Rub in a circular direction, lightly at first, then with the grain of the wood. Polish with old woollen rag.

SAVOURY.—There are several kinds of Ramequins. We give you two good recipes; the first is Gouffé's, the second Lady Harriet St. Clair's. 1. "Put in a stewpan two ounces of butter, half a pint of water, a seasoning of salt and pepper; boil, take the stewpan off the fire, mix in a quarter of a pound of flour, and stir with a wooden spoon over the fire for five minutes; then add a quarter of a pound of grated Parmesan cheese and three eggs, one at a time. Put the paste on to some baking-sheets in portions about the size of a small egg; brush them over with egg, and put a little heap of Gruyere cheese, cut in small pieces, on the top of each. Bake the puffs in an oven heated to a light brown-paper temperature, and serve them hot." 2. "Melt one ounce of butter; mix into it a spoonful of flour and a little salt; stir for a few minutes over the fire. Have ready boiled half a pint of milk and a quarter one of cream. Pour this on the butter and flour by degrees, and work it perfectly smooth. Take the pan off the fire and add half a pound of grated Parmesan cheese, a little pepper, a very little powdered sugar, the yolks of eight eggs, and the whites of two well beaten. When well mixed add the other six whites, beaten to a froth. It should then be about the consistency of cream. Fill paper cases, but not quite to the top, and bake in a slow oven eighteen minutes."

SEEKING D.—The words are spoken to Fedalma by Don Silva in "The Spanish Gypsy":

Dear, I trusted you as Holy men trust God. You could do nought
That was not pure and loving—though the deed
Might pierce me unto death. You had less trust
Since you suspected mine. 'Twas wicked doubt.

TURNCOAT.—

Their feet through faithless leather met the dirt,
And oftener changed their principles than shirt.

These lines occur in Young's "Epistle to Mr. Pope," line 277.

VEGETARIAN.—The Agaricus is a large and important genus of fungi, characterised by having a fleshy cap or pileus, and a number of radiating plates or gills, on which are produced the naked spores. The majority of this species are furnished with stems, but some are attached to the objects on which they grow by their pileus. Over a thousand species are known, and are arranged in five sections according as the colour of their spores is white, pink, brown, purple, or black. Many of the species are edible like the common mushroom, and supply a delicious article of food, while others are deleterious and even poisonous. Several treatises have been written on the subject of the Agaricus as an article of diet, but the difficulty of distinguishing those which are harmless from those which are poisonous is so great that there is little hope of their being brought into general use.

NOTICE.

NOW READY, PRICE SIXPENCE,

PART XXXV. OF HOUSEHOLD WORDS,

Containing Serial Story, entitled "My Lord Concelt;" "A Family Feud," a Story in Five Weekly Parts; and numerous Short Stories.

The Editor's Note-Book on Current Topics. Interesting Articles on Cookery, Gardening, The Family Doctor, Fashions, Music, etc.

AND SOMETHING SUITABLE FOR EVERY MEMBER OF THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

NOTICE.

The Fifth Volume of HOUSEHOLD WORDS, containing Nos. 106 to 131, bound in cloth, uniform with Vols. 1, 2, 3, and 4, can now be had, price 4s. 6d. Also Binding Cases (including Title and Index), price 1s. 6d. Title and Index may also be obtained separately, price 1d.

All back Numbers, Parts, Quarterly Divisions and Volumes, also the Extra Numbers, are in print; and may be had by ordering from any Bookseller, Newsagent, or Railway Bookstall, or should any difficulty be found in procuring from an Agent, enclose stamps for the amount, adding price of postage, addressed to the Publisher of HOUSEHOLD WORDS, 24, Great New Street, E.C., when the copies will be sent per return.

The Publishers of HOUSEHOLD WORDS will send Copies direct, post-free, to any address in the United Kingdom or the Continent, upon receipt of P.O.O. made payable at the Fleet Street Office, to Messrs. CHARLES DICKENS & EVANS, at the following rates:

Weekly.			Monthly.
	s.	d.		s.	d.
Three Months .. ..	1	8	Three Months .. ..	2	0
Six Months .. ..	3	8	Six Months .. ..	4	0
Twelve Months .. ..	6	6	Twelve Months .. ..	8	0

New Volumes commence the first week in May and November respectively.

All applications for Advertisements to be addressed to Mr. Joseph Smith, 24, Great New Street, E.C.

FAMILIAR IN THEIR MOUTHS AS HOUSEHOLD WORDS.—Shakespeare.

HOUSEHOLD WORDS,

No. 157.]

SATURDAY, APRIL 26, 1884.

[VOL. VI.]

Lisle's Courtship.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

CHAPTER I.

"AND now to see Lisle in all his glory," thought I as I swung up the avenue to Lisle's new abode, in Lisle's own new dog-cart, driven by Lisle's own new coachman, behind Lisle's own new bay horse. For since I had last seen him, Lisle's ship had come in, in the shape of a coffin for his old uncle, and George Arthur Lisle reigned at North Arlington in that uncle's stead.

"I am monarch of all I survey," he wrote to me; "the old chap's will there is none to dispute, so now that I have got things straightened up a little, just come down on the 15th and stay as long as you can. There is a fancy dress ball on the 17th, and if the frost holds, you will be able to skate the soles of your feet off."

Such an invitation was not to be resisted. Lisle as an Etonian, Lisle as an undergraduate, I had known; but Lisle as a man of property I had not known. He was evidently as much delighted with his new possession (left to him over his father's head by his crotchety old uncle) as a child with a new toy. He had, I heard, offered it to his father immediately, but that parent, emulating the generosity of the son, had insisted on his keeping it, being extremely satisfied with his own home in Cliveshire, and thinking, as most Cliveshire people do, that to leave it would be to leave the very focus of politics, enlightenment, and art, the one great centre on which the eyes of the inhabitants of all the other less favoured counties are enviously fixed.

It was a dark winter evening, and nothing was to be seen of the house as I drove up, save a blaze of ruddy light in the hall. In a moment Lisle had rushed out, and was shaking me warmly by the hand, a process which he continued for some time, and from which he only desisted to clap me with equal warmth upon the back.

In another moment I was swept into an armchair by a blazing fire, and Lisle was pouncing upon a tray in the corner, on which I descried a decanter and steaming jug of hot water, flanked by a promising looking tumbler with a spoon in it. Oh, a bachelor's house, what a comfortable thing it is! The reflection naturally suggested another, not so pleasant, and I said as I held my hands to the blaze:

"If a certain report is true, I suppose there will soon be someone here who will put a stop to this sort of thing, and introduce tea in its stead."

Lisle rattled the tumblers.

"Yes," I went on; "I heard a report that you were going to be married."

"Ahem!" said Lisle; "I've heard a report of the same kind myself, but I don't know if there is any truth in it."

"Not quite made up your mind, perhaps?" I hinted delicately.

"Not made up my mind! I should rather think I had, though!" retorted Lisle. "My mind has been made up some time."

"Young lady, perhaps, not quite made up hers?"

"Yes, I expect she has," returned Lisle with increasing warmth. "I expect she has made it up one way or the other. She has had time enough."

"Then where is the difficulty?" I enquired, for I saw from Lisle's expression that difficulty there was of some kind.

"Why, the difficulty is," growled Lisle, throwing himself into a chair, "to know what to do next."

"Well," said I courageously, "if I were you, my dear fellow, I should—it's a bold step, no doubt—but, upon my word, I should propose!"

"Propose!" repeated Lisle in great scorn. "Heavens above, Mostyn, do you take me for a fool? Propose! Didn't I propose to her last week in the drawing-room at South Arlington, with a confounded brute of a canary-bird making such a row I couldn't hear a word I was saying? Propose, indeed!"

I gaped.

"Parents?" I hazarded at last.

"Parents—no, she has no parents," replied Lisle. "That is," he added, correcting himself, "none except her mother. Oh, Mostyn," burst out the disconsolate lover in a melancholy tone, "I'm the most wretched fellow going! I have got into a hole, and there is not a soul to talk it over with. Hugh is here, of course; he came this afternoon; but what is the use of a fellow who thinks of nothing from morning till night but cog-wheels and iron cranks, and who is soldering a tin pail at this moment in the workshop? He's no good. Now, you, Mostyn, old fellow, friend of my childhood, and all that——"

"Well, fire away, then," I said, laughing, which he did immediately and at great length.

He confided to me, as if he were conferring a benefit upon me, the young lady's name. It was O'Neill—Miss O'Neill. Her christian-name was——

"Her christian-name," interrupted I with that innate knowledge of Irish character so peculiar to the free-born Briton, "is Patsy."

"Patsy!" retorted Lisle with a snort of contempt. "Patsy, indeed! Sounds like a bit of butter at the end of a knife. Her name is Averil."

"Averil—ah, beautiful!" murmured I.

"Ave for short, you know," added Lisle gravely.

"Just so—Ave for short. Go on."

Lisle went on to say that Miss O'Neill was the heiress of the adjoining property of South Arlington, and possessed of a mother with a mania for chickens and new-laid eggs, whose manner to her friends was cordial, or very much the reverse, according to the state of the poultry-yard.

If the hens had been laying well, she would be in a good-humour, but in the moulting season she was very uncertain, and if the cocks had been fighting—well, in fact, she was devoted to her fowls. She had just got a new one, a double-barrelled Brahama Poultra Cochinn Fowler—so Lisle said—which she seemed to care much more about than her daughter.

"What a hopeless sort of woman to have anything to do with! But to return to Miss O'Neill. You proposed to her last week?"

"Friday at three o'clock," replied Lisle. "Started from here at half-past two, got there at three. Shown into the drawing-room. Nobody there. Suddenly thought now was the time. No intentions at starting, merely afternoon call, you understand. Felt very undecided. Thought I would wait till another day. Door opened. Miss O'Neill without her mother. Thought I had better not wait till another day, but get it over at once. And really, Mostyn," continued Lisle confidentially, "once started, do you know, it was not half so bad as one would think. I was quite surprised at myself. I never thought I could have done it so well."

"And what did she say?"

"Oh, she did not say anything at first. You see I was talking all the time. And at last when I came to the point, she did not say anything either. I begged her to give me an answer, if it was only one word. I could hardly hear myself speak for the canary. Then she turned away her head and said something, and for the life of me, Mostyn, I could not make out what it was. At that moment the door opened, and in marched Mrs. O'Neill with an apronful of little chickens. They had all got croup or something, and she looked daggers at me, and sent Averil out for some chopped egg. I waited as long as I dared, and tried to take an interest in them, and said I had had an egg myself for breakfast. But she did not come back, and at last I caught up my hat and took my leave, not knowing if I were accepted or rejected."

"Of course you called next day and learned your fate?"

"Of course I called, but I did not learn my fate. I only saw Mrs. O'Neill, and directly she came into the room I knew by her face something was wrong. Whether it was only the chickens, or disapproval of me, I could not tell, but her manner was so icy that I dared not utter a word of what I had come about, and after ten minutes I could bear it no longer, and I bolted."

"Without seeing the young lady?"

"Yes; I heard her once in the hall, but she did not come in. That looked bad, didn't it? It's a confoundedly awkward position, Mostyn, not knowing if one is accepted or rejected. What am I to do?"

"Why, of course you must ask her again. It's the most obvious thing in life."

"I'll see myself at Jericho first," exclaimed Lisle with warmth. "Ask her again! Second edition of the canary-bird. No, I thank you. If you can't give a fellow better advice than that, you had better 'coil up,' as the Americans say."

"I don't know what else to suggest."

"Anyhow you must think of something, for I am not going to do that. I'll tell you what I'll do. She is sure to be skating at the South Pool to-morrow, and we will all three drive over, and you will see her, and notice how she goes on, and then after that (you always were a sharp fellow, Mostyn) you might be able to judge, or anyhow to suggest something, for you know I can't go on like this much longer."

"And this will be your first meeting since your interesting confession?" said I, flattered. "Yes, when I see you together, I don't think I can fail to make out which way the wind lies. All the same, Lisle, the obvious thing is to ask her again."

"Catch me!" growled Lisle under his breath.

CHAPTER II.

"NEVER mind the breakfast-bell," Lisle said to me, as we went upstairs to bed. "It does not mean that anyone is down. The old butler, who is a very punctual old chap, only rings it when breakfast is ready to come in and he is getting tired of waiting. He rang it five times the other day. It pleases him, and it doesn't hurt me."

Accordingly the next morning I allowed the bell to ring several times before I thought it necessary to go down. As I went down the passage I passed a door, from within which came the sound of a deep voice, singing in melancholy and sepulchral tones:

"Drink, puppy, drink, and let every puppy drink
That is old enough to lap and to . . ."

Here the voice failed to get up to the note required, and after a praiseworthy attempt, which was not altogether successful, began again.

I hurried downstairs.

"Good-morning, Mostyn. Splendid day. Eight degrees of frost," exclaimed Lisle in his cheery voice, stamping his feet and slapping himself the while, as he stood before the brisk fire in the dining-room.

"Oh, then it was not you who were singing in that entrancing manner as I came down!"

"Not I. It must have been Hugh. He generally tunes up in his bath. Eggs and bacon, Mostyn, or some fried ham, or one of these things—what do you call 'em?—fish puffs."

"What an eye you have for breakfasts," I said admiringly. "One might be at Cambridge."

"I rather pride myself on my breakfasts, certainly," replied Lisle complacently. "Now that is one of the things a woman can't understand. My dear mother used always to think that so long as there was cold meat on the sideboard, and a boiled egg, with a spoon beside it, on the table, it was as much as mortal man could require."

Here we heard a step in the distance, and a sound as of a funeral dirge.

"Hugh, I declare!" cried Lisle, as the door opened, and Hugh, a tall, pleasant-looking lad of nineteen, appeared.

"Good-morning, my boy. Have some eggs and bacon? Splendid stuff for filling up a vacuum."

"Good-morning, Mostyn," said Hugh with dignity, ignoring his brother's insulting allusion to his favourite hobby. "There has been a good frost. I hope you have got your skates with you."

"Oh, as to that," broke in the incorrigible Lisle, "I dare say if you have forgotten them, Hugh will turn you out a pair in no time, with this engine he has brought home. He will get a bit of old iron-railing, and the top of an Albert biscuit-box, and put them into the boiler, and get up steam, and the thing will be done in no time—eh, Hugh?"

"Shut up," said Hugh, elongating into a smile the largest mouth I had ever seen.

"He's such a fellow for iron," went on Lisle to me. "I know if ever he is in love he will make his fair one a cast-iron fan, or pave the way to her affections with a donkey-engine."

"I say, George, look here—shut up, I say," said Hugh again, whom nature had not endowed with much power of repartee.

"Unless," continued Lisle, unheeding, "he is prematurely cut off, owing to over-exertion of the inventive faculties. He looks pale, doesn't he? Just the sort of chap to invent a screw and die young—eh?"

Here Hugh, plunging suddenly into the conversation, managed after a desperate effort to change the subject.

After breakfast Lisle carried me off to the stables, and then showed me the house, of which, with its long, panelled passages, its pictured, octagon drawing-room, and its fine stone hall, any man might have been proud. But all the while that he was doing the honours inside and outside the house, I could see he was inwardly chafing to be off to the South Pool, where he hoped to meet Miss O'Neill, and he gave a sigh of relief when at last we were all three seated in the dog-cart, and he could gather up the reins, and tell the groom "to let go his head."

There was not much conversation, for Lisle was apparently intent on his driving, and Hugh began to sing to himself in a low, monotonous voice, softly keeping time with his woollen-gloves upon his knees.

"There is the pool," said Lisle at last, pointing to a large piece of water at a little distance, "and there she is on it too, by Jove!"

How Lisle could ascertain that fact, when the bank prevented our seeing anything but a number of heads gliding up and down, was to me miraculous, but on a nearer survey it appeared he was right.

"You get out with Mostyn. I'll drive the horse up to the farm," said Hugh good-naturedly; but Lisle, who seemed to have become suddenly nervous, said he would take the horse up himself, and join us in five minutes.

"Keep your eyes open," he whispered to me as I got down, and I nodded assent.

"Hugh Lisle, by Jove!" exclaimed a chorus of voices as we reached the bank, and in a moment Hugh was surrounded, and warmly shaken hands with.

All seemed to hail his arrival with pleasure. Young ladies came skimming up to shake hands; little boys on their skates for the first time, roared to him to come and see how they were getting on; while little girls, holding on to his coat, begged that he would devote his morning exclusively to pushing them up and down on chairs.

"And who is this lost sheep at whose return there is so much rejoicing?" said a clear, ringing voice. "Mr. Lisle, junior, by all that's wonderful! Oh, ye cranks and boilers! I have been taken by surprise. Support me, somebody. I feel faint."

"I would have written if I had thought," replied Hugh with a perfectly grave face, but with a twinkle in his eye. "But, cheer up, Miss O'Neill. Erin go bragh! There, I learned that especially for you. I don't know what it means, but I knew you would like it."

"You learned that?" cried Miss O'Neill, clasping her hands: "you learned that—by heart?"

"I did."

"And this," said Miss O'Neill, addressing the company in an emphatic manner, "this, gentlemen and ladies—I mean ladies and gentlemen—including the distinguished-looking stranger on the bank whom Mr. Lisle has omitted to introduce to us—this, I repeat, is the man who informed us that he could commit nothing to memory. What a touching instance of youthful modesty have we before us!"

"I never said I could not commit anything to memory," retorted Hugh, who seldom relished being made conspicuous. "I only said I could not remember it when I had."

There was a general laugh, and Miss O'Neill assured Hugh that she sympathised with him entirely, that having been precisely her own case in her youth, and that when once she had really got anything into her brain, wild horses could not extract it again from that retentive organ. A cynical young Cantab murmured something about that often being the case with women, when they had once harboured an idea, but he was not heard.

At this moment a small knot of boys made a rush at Hugh, demanding clamorously that he should come and show them some new figure—the last Birkenhead tip—in the way of skating. Hugh, be it known, was attached to a great shipbuilding yard at Birkenhead, where for a considerable premium he was having his eyes opened to the internals of steamboats, and machinery in general.

He accordingly leisurely proceeded to dazzle us by a suicidal exhibition mainly performed in the air, and on the toe of one skate, which took our breath away.

"It was only the 'hop threes,'" he explained simply, when it was over. He had seen a man do it at Birkenhead.

"I can't even do a common 'three,'" said Miss O'Neill, shaking her head. "I can only manage my inside and outside edges."

"Can you do your outside edge backwards?" said Hugh slowly, looking intently at her, as if her life depended on her answer.

"A little."

"Ah, then I can teach you a 'three' in no time. Come and try. There is better ice lower down."

At this moment Lisle came up to us on his skates, and raised his cap nervously.

"Let us go, then," she said, giving her hand to Hugh, and bowing to Lisle. Lisle and I watched them skate away together.

Miss O'Neill was a tall, fine-looking girl with neat ankles. She wore her hair, her female friends lamented, "just like a man," though anything more unlike the chevelure of a man than Miss O'Neill's curly crop of brown-gold hair could hardly be imagined, especially when surmounted, as it was on the present occasion, by a closely-fitting crimson cap, or, as my sisters would in their superior knowledge call it, a toque.

"Going off like that looks bad, doesn't it?" said Lisle grimly, watching the graceful retreating figure.

"Not in the least," replied I encouragingly; "perhaps she is—I do not stick at trifles, but for the life of me I could not suggest, as I meant to have done, that she might be shy!"

We followed them slowly down the pool to a quiet corner, where Hugh had begun his instructions.

"There is no difficulty," he was explaining eagerly; "you start on your inside edge forwards, and finish on your outside backwards."

"Just exactly what will happen, I should think," growled Lisle in an undertone. "I say, Mostyn, can't you call off Hugh, and stop him making a fool of himself."

I did not see that Hugh was doing so, but just at that moment Miss O'Neill, having been persuaded to try, and assured by Hugh that a fall was out of the question, lost her balance as Hugh roared, "Turn—now turn!" and turning with a vengeance, came down with a whack which made the ice ring, and caused several other inexperienced skaters to start, look round, and lose their balance also.

Miss O'Neill was up, and holding by Hugh's arm in a moment, and laughed merrily as we eagerly asked if she were hurt. She declared she should have been had she not fallen on her head, which, however, was proof against anything.

"I came a howling cropper though, as I suppose you would call it in your dreadful slang!" she said, turning lightly to Lisle, and addressing him for the first time.

"I have left off talking slang," replied Lisle dryly. "It has become too effeminate."

"That accounts then for your powers of speech having become so limited," laughed the young lady, and she joined a knot of children at a little distance, and was soon seen running races with Hugh, each pushing a child on a chair before them, while the interesting little creatures kicked their legs, and urged their drivers to greater exertions.

"What in the name of Fortune could have induced you to speak to her like that?" I said to Lisle, as she went off.

"Don't you see she is doing all she can to torment me?" growled Lisle savagely. "But I don't care, I won't go near her all the rest of the day;" and turning a deaf ear to my vehement expostulations, he joined the main body of skaters, and performed great vines and serpentine with a gloomy and fixed countenance.

When, however, after an hour or so, Miss O'Neill was observed to be taking off her skates, or rather, to speak correctly, to be allowing an ardent Eton admirer to perform that office on his knees, Lisle expressed an opinion that the ice was getting cut up, and we might as well be going home. I agreed, and Hugh reluctantly complied.

"Could not we stay just half an hour longer?" he remonstrated, wiping his brow. "I've been skirmishing up and down with those little Browns, and they have gone at last, the little beggars, and I want to practise my new cut."

"Just as you like" said Lisle, with an air of exalted indifference to anything or anybody. "I don't care if we go or stay."

After that, Hugh felt that further remonstrance was useless, and, after one heavy groan, unclasped his acmes with a fairly good grace, and floundered up the bank after us.

"Can I order your carriage for you at the same time?" said Lisle, acting for the first time that day like a reasonable human being, and approaching Miss O'Neill, who was now on the bank too, with her skates slung upon her arm.

"Thank you, I will walk up to the farm and get in there," replied the young lady briskly. "It is not far."

Lisle took her skates from her, and we started, I falling back a little immediately, and obliging the obtuse Hugh to do the same, by evincing a great interest in the mechanism of his acmes, and wishing to be instructed as to the principle on which they were constructed.

"Well, you see this bar," began Hugh, tearing off his knitted gloves, and forgetting everything in the interest of the explanation, "you see this bar running across the sole of the foot. Well——"

"And pray, Mr. Lisle, junior," said Miss O'Neill, stopping, and turning to Hugh, "pray in what character may you be going to appear at the ball on Friday?"

"Me! Oh, I'm going as a mechanic," replied Hugh, as we all four walked on together. "One of the foremen has just got a new working suit, and he lent it to me for a bit of iron tubing and half-a-crown."

"Elegance combined with economy," exclaimed Miss O'Neill; "and if you come in with a screw loose anywhere about you, the costume will be complete. Now, Mr. Lisle," turning to George, "it is your turn. In what character are you intending to dazzle us?"

"I have not yet made up my mind," replied Lisle in measured tones, and looking straight before him.

I thought he must have forgotten that he was expecting his dress from Nathan's that very day.

"Can I suggest anything?" said Miss O'Neill mischievously. "A clock is very nice, and very uncommon too; one of those tall, old-fashioned clocks, you know, that one sees in cottages. One has nothing to do but stand in a dark corner and strike now and then. Or, perhaps," she continued, "you might prefer a character out of ancient history. Let me see. Could not you go as Noah? That would be very easily done. You would never have to go into the ball-room at all, but simply install yourself in the boathouse on the mere below the house, and let off a dove at intervals."

"You have not told us yet in what character you are going yourself," I struck in, seeing with astonishment that Lisle, usually so quick at banter and repartee, was not even attempting to parry Miss O'Neill's thrusts.

"Ah, you will see when the time comes," she replied, laughing. We had reached the farm, where her pony-carriage was already waiting.

"Good-bye, gentlemen, till Friday night," she said gaily, as she got in and took up the reins.

"You're coming to the ice to-morrow?" asked Hugh eagerly.

"No, mon ami, I am not, but console yourself, the little Browns will all be there. Adieu, adieu!"

"Erin go bragh!" shouted Hugh, as the pony-carriage rattled away, and he was rewarded by a grand flourish of the retreating whip.

CHAPTER III.

LISLE had come home in such a bad temper, swearing at the horse, and blowing-up the unlucky groom sky-high who came to take it round, that I avoided all reference to Miss O'Neill and the events of the morning with the greatest care, and strolled off after luncheon to smoke in the workshop, and watch Hugh, who was putting the old lathe in order. He recounted to me in a fragmentary and rambling manner many adventures that had occurred to him at Birkenhead in the way of strikes, midnight attacks by navvies, and the like, all which he seemed to consider were in the natural course of events, which they may be at Birkenhead, for aught I know to the contrary.

"I would rather be caught by machinery than by navvies, any day," remarked Hugh deliberately, as if the choice had just been offered him, "though machinery can be very awkward if you don't take it the right way. I've been on trial trips when I had to take diagrams on a pair of perpendicular engines. That's dangerous if you like, especially if you're seasick, as I was. Perpendicular is not the word, though. But you know what I mean. Engines where the guide of the piston goes through the cylinder-cover."

Hugh's great mild eyes were fixed doubtfully upon me.

"Oh! ah! Yes. Just so," I said. "Cylinder-cover, don't you know."

"They were perpendicular, anyhow," resumed Hugh, "and there was a chopping sea, and I was awfully seasick and giddy. The cylinder-covers got black hot, and I had to crawl along the top of them to take the diagrams. Touchy work, that. You have to look pretty sharp, I can tell you; for, if you get above the piston guide, you will be knocked to smithereens by it through the skylight, and if you fall off you will get smashed by the crank."

With these and many similar anecdotes Hugh regaled me until I judged it safe to return to Lisle. By dinner-time the ill-temper of the latter had completely evaporated, and, though he remained somewhat silent and gloomy for one of his very cheerful temperaments, still he was able to take a healthy interest in the unpacking of his fancy dress after dinner, which Hugh did in the study, in order that we might inspect it by candlelight.

As the evening wore on, Lisle, at my instigation, and after repeated admonitions from Hugh to "boil ahead," summarily related to his brother what he had told me at greater length, and explained the difficulty in which he at present found himself. Hugh received the narration with an expression of solemnity, unbroken even by a "my golly!" (his favourite expression), while he glanced with a mixture of awe and admiration at his brother, who had been capable of such a feat as to make a proposal, "and to a woman too," as he afterwards confided to me. The subject of what was to be done was again discussed, and we both entreated Lisle to propose to her again, and, as Hugh expressed it, give her another chance; but Lisle was obdurate.

"Write to her, then," suggested Hugh, "and tell her to answer back one way or the other, and get her mother and the clergyman, or someone, to sign the letter. Get it in black and white, George. That is the way we do business at Birkenhead."

But Lisle turned a deaf ear to the voice of the charmer.

"What do you expect us to do," said Hugh sleepily. "I am sure, my dear fellow, I would do anything in life to help you, if I could only see my way."

Lisle growled, and we relapsed for a while into our pipes and silence.

"I have it!" said Lisle suddenly.

"What?" I cried, starting up.

"I've got it," went on Lisle, unheeding. "It's the simplest thing in life. He shall go to-morrow."

"Who? Where?"

"Hugh," replied Lisle; and, getting up, he shook his brother's arm, crying: "Hugh, I say, wake up, will you? I've thought of something."

"Well," said Hugh, rubbing his eyes, "what's the matter now?"

"I've thought of something," repeated Lisle, conscious that so notable a fact would bear repetition, "and you must do it, Hugh. Didn't you say, a few minutes ago, you would do anything in life for me?"

Hugh did not seem to recall it.

"You always were a good chap," said Lisle affectionately. "I know you will help me at a pinch."

"Oh, mercy!" gasped Hugh, wincing. "What is it you want me to do?"

"Only to drive over to South Arlington to-morrow," replied Lisle; "surely you won't stick at driving three miles for my sake, Hugh?"

"There's something behind," said Hugh uneasily.

"We'll talk that over to-morrow," replied Lisle. "I have not got it quite clear in my head yet. Of course it would be no good your just driving there and back. That would not help me much, I should think."

"I know there is something behind," said Hugh with a groan; "there is now, isn't there, George?"

"Good-night!" said Lisle.

The next morning as I dressed I could hear no matutinal dirge issuing from Hugh's apartment. His mind evidently misgave him on the subject of South Arlington. Presently, shortly after the second ringing of the breakfast-bell, a door banged, and I heard Lisle's brisk step in the passage. It stopped at Hugh's door.

"Let me in, I say," shouted Lisle, rattling the handle.

"Can't," came a deep response; "I'm in my bath."

"Bother! You're always in your bath. Look here!"

"Well!"

"Leave off that splashing, will you, and listen?"

"Look sharp then, it's precious cold."

"Put on your new brown suit with the giraffe buttons," said Lisle emphatically, with his mouth evidently and needlessly applied to the keyhole; "and mind you shave right up to your ear this time. You didn't yesterday. Do you hear?"

There was a growl of assent, and the splashing was renewed with a vigour that precluded any further conversation.

"What can your motive be in sending Hugh over to South Arlington, instead of going yourself?" I asked Lisle as we sat at breakfast, before Hugh had come down.

"My dear Mostyn," replied Lisle, who was in the most charming spirits this morning, "I intend by means of Hugh to find out whether Miss O'Neill has accepted me or not."

"You could do that just as well, if not better, by going yourself, or by writing."

"But I will not go or write, as I have said before. I won't give her such a pull over me. She would be always throwing it in my teeth when we were married that I had to ask her twice. And so," continued Lisle, "I mean to get to know, without having any hand in it myself."

"And how on earth is that to be done?"

"How!" repeated Lisle in a tone of triumph, somewhat muffled by buttered toast. "Ah, that is another thing. It has to be done, but how?"

Here Hugh entered in what he told me afterwards was his best Sunday-go-to-meeting suit, and with a chin which Lisle complimented him on being "as smooth as the top of the governor's head."

The exquisite shave, however, of Hugh's chin did not make the contrast between it and his upper lip as marked as could be wished. Hugh's moustache was in that stage in which it was quite invisible to the naked eye against the light, and in the light had the somewhat unhappy effect of leading the beholder to believe that the use of soap-and-water had been accidentally partial. Still, Hugh in his brown suit looked as pleasant and gentlemanly a lad as I have ever met. He was not handsome like his brother, but I doubt whether to many people Hugh's was not the pleasanter face of the two.

"When have I to go to South Arlington?" he asked uneasily, as he settled down to his breakfast.

"The dog-cart is already ordered to be round at half-past eleven," said Lisle, with an emphasis on the "already," as if to show the victim that all the arrangements had been made, and to struggle was useless.

"I don't care if I do go," observed Hugh with a very feeble laugh.

"That's all right," rejoined his brother cheerfully.

"Of course you'll come too?" continued Hugh doubtfully.

"I shall not have the pleasure of accompanying you," replied Lisle composedly. "I purpose showing Mostyn the grounds this morning."

"I think I'll stop and see the grounds too," said Hugh with great alacrity.

"There would hardly be time before you started," replied Lisle.

"But why should I go at all?" broke out Hugh. "What in the name of fortune am I to do when I get there, I should like to know?"

"Listen to me," said Lisle, and after explaining his reasons for wishing to find out how matters stood without applying to the young lady herself, he went on slowly: "What you have to do now in order to find this out is—to propose to Miss O'Neill yourself."

The egg-spoon on its way to Hugh's mouth was stopped in mid-career, and slowly lowered into his coffee-cup.

"Now don't speak, either of you," said Lisle, raising his hand: "but listen to me. I have been turning it over in my mind all night, and it's as simple as possible. If you are half sharp, Hugh, it need never get to a proposal. All I want you to do is to make Miss O'Neill think you have come to propose. What is the good of that, you want to know? The greatest possible good. You make a sort of beginning, say you have come for a particular reason—as you have—and drop something about your feeling sure she is aware of your attachment, etc., and then, seeing what is coming, she will stop you at once, and say: 'Surely you know I am engaged to your brother?'"

"A very good idea," I struck in, "and then, Hugh, you have only to say you were fully aware of this already, and had come to tell her how delighted you were, new sister, etc., and the thing is done, and you rattle home as fast as you can."

"But what if she doesn't stop me when I've got as far as that? Suppose she lets me go on?" suggested Hugh suspiciously.

"Well, in that case you would have to go on," said Lisle decidedly, "and make her a regular offer. You must get at the truth somehow. Of course, when she refuses you, you must try and look as cut up as you can, and then beg her to tell you if there were anyone else who had been beforehand with you, and to whom her affections were already engaged. If she owns as much as that, it is enough for me. If she does not care for me, I am at least certain she does not care for anyone else. I've watched her too closely."

"I won't do any such thing," broke out Hugh with a sudden burst of righteous indignation; "I vow I won't. Proposing is next door to marrying, and I don't want to marry her, or any woman living. Silly, screaming things, who hang on to you when they see a bit of machinery at work."

"And then," continued Lisle, "not a soul except Mostyn would ever know, and I would tell Miss O'Neill myself afterwards how you were put up to it by me, and make it all right. I can't face her at the ball to-night unless I know how the land lies. I can't, indeed. Come, Hugh, don't turn rusty, but help me at a pinch, there is a good fellow."

Hugh had risen, and was standing looking out of the window. Lisle went up to him, and put his hand on his shoulder. Hugh shook his head and left the room. Lisle followed him, and I remained alone. As they did not return, I dispatched my breakfast, which I had till then almost forgotten, and, unwilling to disturb them, lit my pipe and paced up and down on the terrace before the house.

It was an extraordinary idea, this. Would it succeed? I was naturally doubtful about any plan not proposed by myself, and yet—

I must have been pacing up and down some time when Lisle joined me.

"He has promised to go," he said, linking his arm in mine. "I wish to goodness he had gone and come back, that is all. I don't know what I shall do for the next two hours."

I, who had the prospect of passing those two hours tit-a-tit with Lisle, wished they were over too.

"I've lent him my gold pin," continued Lisle, "and my new dogskin gloves. I thought he ought not to go in those knitted things—eh, Mostyn?"

"Of course not."

"He is sure to find her in, I think," went on Lisle uneasily. "She does not often go out in the morning, and it is just the time her mother is always in the chicken-houses."

"It's uncommonly good of him to go," I said.

"Yes, he's a good fellow, is Hugh," replied Lisle carelessly. "I have never known him refuse to do a thing I have asked him; he thinks a lot of me."

As Lisle finished speaking, there was a sound of wheels, and the dog-cart came round to the front door.

"Bless my soul! I had no idea it was so late," cried Lisle, rushing into the house, and upstairs.

He presently returned with Hugh, who shrugged his shoulders despairingly at seeing me, while Lisle helped him on with his ulster, and told him he might drive himself all the way if he liked. But Hugh's mind was not in a state to receive comfort even from a box-seat, and he shook his head dismally. We watched the dog-cart roll quickly away, and then turned indoors.

Oh, Heaven, what a time I had of it that morning! It was in vain I suggested that Lisle should show me the grounds, as he had proposed. No; there was nothing to see at this time of year, and the fields were as hard as a bone. Would he have a game of billiards, then? No, he would not. The table was undersized, and a bad one into the bargain. What would he do, then? Would he try on his fancy dress? It might be as well to see if it were all right, and all the buttons on. No, he would not. Perhaps (with an awful frown) he might never wear it at all. Perhaps he might never go to the ball. No; he would do nothing but stand on the hearthrug, tread on the tails of the dogs, and effectually prevent any effort on my part to read a book, write a letter, or otherwise employ myself. At last he providentially remembered he had to write and blow up his tailor about his last suit, and he grimly set to work to indite an epistle which would have struck terror to the heart of a Poole.

"There, that will teach him to make them baggy at the knees again," he growled, throwing me the letter to read.

"Good gracious, Lisle," I said, "you mustn't send that. They'll have you up for libel."

I induced him to tear it up and begin another.

"Quarter to one," I murmured to myself. "Thank Heaven! Hugh may be here any moment now."

As Lisle closed and stamped his second letter the front door was heard to open and shut, and Hugh's step came across the hall. I looked at Lisle. He had dropped the letter, and was staring fixedly at the door.

It opened, and a shadow, a ghost of the former Hugh, entered, and sank into the nearest chair.

"Well?" cried Lisle and I both together.

"I did as you told me," murmured Hugh in a sepulchral and almost inaudible voice. "I asked her, and——"

"And what?"

"And she accepted me!"

CHAPTER IV.

AN awful silence followed Hugh's last words. I looked from Hugh to Lisle, and back again. Lisle was pale, but Hugh was paler. It might have been an hour, or it might have been three minutes afterwards (I expect it was somewhere between the two), when Lisle struck his fist on the table, and said—well, it was a short and expressive monosyllable, but I will not repeat it here.

"I must be saved," gasped Hugh hysterically. "I did not do it of my own accord."

"I cannot believe it," I said. "Thank Heaven, the plan was none of mine!"

"I don't believe it," said Lisle abruptly, but with an imploring glance at his brother. "Hugh, it's impossible."

"It's true, though," groaned poor Hugh. "I wish it wasn't. It's the most dreadful thing I ever heard of. Why, I suppose I'm engaged to her."

The thought was overpowering, and Hugh hid his face in his hands.

"What on earth is to be done?" said Lisle, looking at me as a shipwrecked sailor might be supposed to do at a sail on the far horizon. "Mostyn, what can we do?"

"You must do something, and that quick," broke out Hugh in a hoarse voice, without raising his head. "I won't bear it. I was led, I was pushed, I was driven into it by you two. You two got me in, and you two must get me out."

"I can't say I think you are the one to be pitied," remarked Lisle almost savagely. "I don't see what you've got to complain of."

"Yes, I am—yes, I have," replied Hugh, raising a pale, desperate face. "I never wanted to marry her. I don't want to marry her now. I don't want to marry anybody."

If Hugh's distress at this overwhelming calamity had been a shade less genuine I must have smiled.

"I suppose half the county will know it to-night," said Lisle sarcastically. "Of course at the ball you will dance with no one but her."

"I won't go to the ball!" almost screamed Hugh, running his hands wildly through his hair. "I won't see her. I'll go up to London and break my leg."

Why going up to London seemed in Hugh's mind to imply breaking his leg I do not know, except that, perhaps, being Clique-shire bred, he considered any journey beyond the limits of his county as preposterous, revolutionary, Whiggish, and fraught with more danger than the trip to Jericho, which we are all so frequently recommended to take by our friends.

At this moment, just when our feelings were wrought to the highest pitch, the door opened, and—I regret to have to write it, but the prosaic fact remains the same—the butler announced that luncheon was ready. Luncheon! what had we to do with cold pheasant, and veal pie, with Stilton cheese and Bath Olivers, at a crisis like this? It was an insult! Yet life is chequered, so to speak, with luncheons, with meals in general. They follow us through our whole life, and not unfrequently hasten us into the grave. A dish of lampreys has been known to have a deleterious effect, and the genus lobster has caused many an order for family mourning at Messrs. Jays'. Who, too, has not been dashed from the heights of romance to the dead level of prosaic existence by a dressing-bell? Who, when returning from a prolonged saunter in the Lovers' Walk with that nice girl in blue, has not been harassed by the thought that they will, on their return, be late for luncheon, and have to take their places with unconstrained countenances, after every one else is seated, and under the very eye of the blue girl's mamma.

On this occasion, however, I hailed the announcement of the butler with fervent thankfulness. The momentous subject was for the time abandoned, and I plied Lisle and Hugh with unimportant questions and remarks during the meal, gradually leading the conversation (if that can be called conversation which is sustained by one person) round to the subject of machinery, in the hope of interesting the latter. The mention of iron was to Hugh as the trumpet to the war-horse, and though he responded but feebly at first, he gradually took fire, and was soon deep in an explanation of the principle of something or other, and illustrating his meaning by drawing geometrical figures with his nail upon the table-cloth as he went on.

When, however, luncheon was over, Hugh recollected himself with a sigh, and his face settled into a look of the deepest dejection. Gradually we extracted from him a detailed account of the whole transaction—how he had arrived; how he was shown into the drawing-room where Miss O'Neill was trying over some new music; how she received him with great good-nature, and told him her mother was in the chicken-houses, and so she must try to make herself doubly agreeable. Hugh then related how, after waiting as long as he dared, he, as he styled it, began. How when he had got to the place where she ought to have interrupted him, he came to a full stop, and waited, but he waited in vain. Miss O'Neill said nothing. She looked up at him suddenly with a curious sparkle in her eyes, and then, fixing them on the ground, remained silent, though he could see she was smiling.

"At last," said Hugh with a heavy sigh, "I went on, and made her a regular offer. When I had done speaking I suddenly felt what an awful thing it was, and it came over me like a flash how attentive she had been to me on the ice the day before. If I had thought of it, I never would have asked her. She looked up, and just said 'Yes.' You might have knocked me down with a sledge-hammer."

"Are you certain?" I enquired. "Was not the canary singing?"

"I am quite certain," asseverated Hugh; "if you'll bring me the biggest book in the world, I'll swear upon it! And the canary was not singing at all. It was only hopping up and down on its perches. Miss O'Neill had covered the cage with a duster when——"

"When she saw you driving up, I suppose," said Lisle, "in order to prevent further mistakes. Go on."

"When she began to practise," said Hugh dubiously.

"And what did you say when Miss O'Neill accepted you?" I asked.

"I said she had better think it over before she quite made up her mind," replied Hugh simply. "I'm not sure I didn't advise her to take a day or two to decide, as she might think better of it."

"Really, Hugh!" I exclaimed, nearly choking.

"And I begged her to try and think if there were not anyone who had been beforehand with me, and whom she liked better."

"And what did she say to that?"

"Oh, she laughed, and said she had decided, and she was sure she should never have reason to repent her choice. She laughed a good deal, and she looked awfully pleased. I should really have told her how it was, if it had not been for that; but she looked so beaming I had not the heart to do it. And then," Hugh coughed, and cast a deprecating glance at his brother, "then, George, after that, I really could not help it, but——"

"You kissed her, I suppose?" said Lisle sharply.

"No, indeed, I didn't," replied Hugh eagerly. "I held on to a chair. She did it of her own accord."

I could bear no more. It was unfeeling, unkind, but I could not help it. I laid my head on the table, and laughed till the tears came into my eyes. When I recovered myself Hugh's mouth had lengthened almost to his ears, and though Lisle grumbled something about "an unsympathetic beggar," his face had assumed a more natural expression than it had worn since Hugh's return.

Little remained for the latter to tell. On taking his leave, he had again begged Miss O'Neill to take time, and desired that for the next few days she would not mention what had occurred to her mother, hinting that he had not consulted his own parents yet, and that most likely they would not consent. With this ardent and loverlike assurance Hugh bolted, and though he fancied he heard Miss O'Neill's voice calling him back, rushed out of the house, and into the dog-cart, and whipping the horse into a hand-gallop, returned the way he came.

CONCLUSION.

At North Arlington on that afternoon there were great searchings of heart. Of course the two brothers absolutely refused to go to the ball. A certain conjecture had, however, occurred to me as I turned over Hugh's narrative in my mind, which gradually became a settled conviction. I hinted it to poor Lisle, who was marching up and down between two lines of frozen pear-trees in the kitchen-garden in a pitiable condition. I whispered it to the still more wretched Hugh, who had sought solace from his woes among the shavings of happier days in the workshop, and with a trembling hand was rubbing up his little model engine with an emery-paper. I worked upon the feelings of both; I reasoned, I cajoled, I held out hopes, I promised to mount the breach myself in their behalf. I carried the point; I stood over Lisle while he ordered the dinner to be served half an hour earlier (for we had a long drive before us), and desired the butler to lay out in my room the fancy dress, outgrown by himself, which he had promised to lend me for the occasion. In short, I prevailed.

After dinner, which was a gloomy performance enough, I was with Lisle's aid soon transformed into a gentleman of the last century, and received the pleasing assurance that Apollo's back was nothing to mine, and that I was killing.

"You're quite correct," said Lisle admiringly; "canary waist-coat, blue swallow-tailed coat, lace ruffles, rapier, and black satin etceteras. Beware of the etceteras, and remember to sit down quietly. I took a chair too rashly once, and the result was that I had to buy another pair."

Lisle then rushed away to adorn likewise, and presently reappeared every inch an earl, resplendent in white satin slashed with crimson; an exactly similar dress, according to Nathan, to one worn by Essex, Earl of Leicester. He was followed by an intelligent but blighted-looking young mechanic, and we were soon comfortably installed in the brougham that Lisle had inherited from his invalid old uncle, and rolling luxuriously in the direction of Skipton Manor, the house at which the ball was being given. There was little or no conversation, the thoughts of each continually reverting to the very painful subject of which by some tacit agreement we avoided speaking, and I was glad when at last the carriage came to a standstill, and shoutings, and lanterns, and stamping of horses, and footmen in white silk calves prancing on shadowy flights of steps, announced that we had arrived at our destination.

Then came the usual rush up the steps, the usual "hustle" with one's coat, the usual bawling of one's name, the usual graceful slide forward to the entrance of the ball-room, the bow of introduction to the lady of the house, who on this occasion almost filled the door, clad in the richest iron-coloured satin, and evidently got up as a cannon-ball—a new and quite original style of dress for a stout lady, which might be more generally adopted.

A valse was being played as we entered the ball-room, and I looked round for Miss O'Neill. The room was already crowded, and I did not see her, and soon became absorbed in watching the dancing and the different costumes. Here, a tall feeble curate was timidly holding on to a great bouncing Dresden shepherdess; there, a strapping young mechanic—Hugh himself, I declare!—was whirling past with a handsome young Queen of Scots, barely escaping a collision with Mephistopheles and a charity-school girl.

At last, as the valse stopped, Lisle, who was not dancing, jogged my elbow, and I saw Miss O'Neill advancing towards us on the arm of a policeman. Though Miss O'Neill was not the sort of girl I admire, still even I could not deny she looked wonderfully handsome. There was a sparkle and a colour about her, and a look of Irish wit and mischief that would have made a plain face attractive. As she came up to us, and, after shaking hands, raised her pretty eyebrows, and enquired after Hugh, I felt more sure than ever that that certain conjecture of mine was not far wrong.

It is needless to say that nothing would induce either of the brothers to ask her to dance, and though she afterwards went up to Hugh, and in the most engaging manner offered him a dance, he assured her he was engaged—as indeed, in one sense, he believed himself to be.

I at once begged for the dance which he had declined, and as I spoke the music struck up. I offered my arm with some trepidation. I was fairly in for it now. As she took it, her eyes met mine with a bright, frank look that set me at ease with her at once, and before the dance was over we were rallying each other about our different nationalities as if we had known each other all our lives.

"And so you would have known anywhere that I was Irish?"

laughed Miss O'Neill, seating herself in a low garden-chair in the conservatory, whither I had led her when the dance was over. "Thank Heaven, I have not become so degenerate by living in England that I am mistaken for a native!"

"No, indeed; though I dare say many of your friends have grossly flattered you to the contrary."

"The Lisles don't," said Miss O'Neill. "Mr. Lisle once told me I was very Irish."

"He has made the same remark to me," I observed with nonchalance.

"Has he?" and Miss O'Neill flashed a sudden, enquiring glance at my face.

Our eyes met again. I do not know what there was about that mutual glance, but she saw that I knew, and that I knew she saw.

"You see, Miss O'Neill," I said, taking the bull by the horns at last, "I am entirely in the confidence of the Lisles. I know everything. As you abhor bloodshed, murders, duels, and suicides, I conjure you for Heaven's sake to tell me which of the brothers you honoured by accepting, and then to forget that I asked you such a question."

No one could have been more astonished at such brazen effrontery on my part than I am myself as I look back upon it. It makes me tingle still whenever I remember it. But it succeeded.

"Which?" replied Miss O'Neill with perfect frankness, and in no wise offended. "I accepted both, yet they neither of them seem very eager to come forward, do they?"

"I thought as much," I exclaimed, surprised, nevertheless, at the correctness of my own surmise; "but in that case may I ask—"

"No, Mr. Mostyn, ask nothing, but listen to me. I suppose not the least among my indiscretions is speaking to you now in this way, in a grove of white camellias, under a very insecure-looking Chinese lamp. Oh dear, I am afraid I have committed nothing but indiscretions all my life!"

I thought it most probable she had, but I murmured something unintelligible to the contrary, and she went on:

"And now, pray, don't judge me as you would a countrywoman of your own, with a pursed-up mouth, and a prim, 'Let me refer you to papa;' or, 'Pray enquire of mamma;' or, 'Gain first the affections of my uncle and guardian;' or, 'Before proceeding farther, give proofs of the soundness of your religious principles to my maiden aunt'—don't compare me with these exalted creatures, I beg."

"Oh, not for a moment," I replied hastily.

And so to my attentive ear, Miss O'Neill recounted how she had accepted Lisle, and how much amusement his embarrassment had caused her, which she had not been at any loss to trace to its true source. How, when Hugh arrived, and began to enter the first stage of a proposal, just at the moment when she was about to stop him, and inform him of her engagement to his brother, the idea flashed upon her that he had been sent for that very purpose, and she suffered him to proceed, and then accepted him; partly, as she said, to see what he would look like, partly because the idea was irresistible, and partly to bring things to what she termed a crisis.

"You certainly succeeded," I remarked.

"Mr. Mostyn, if you had seen Hugh's face you would have done the same," replied Miss O'Neill. "The look of suspicious horror—it was irresistible. And when the blow fell—oh, I shall never forget his face as long as I live, and how he begged me to think better of it, and assured me he did not think his parents would consent. I nearly died of laughing when he had left the house."

"It was no laughing matter when he returned home, I can assure you," I replied somewhat absently. My eyes were fixed on the door of the conservatory, where Lisle was standing, pale and irresolute, twirling a fan (evidently not lost by Miss O'Neill) in his hand. Her eyes followed mine. At last he came slowly towards us, tall and handsome, through the green foliage. The music had struck up afresh, and the conservatory was deserted. As he drew near I saw him suddenly start violently, and a look of horror come over his face. Miss O'Neill rose hastily. In a moment he had rushed forwards, and caught her in his arms, just in time to shield her and her inflammable dress from the paper Chinese lamp, which, a mass of flame, fell directly over where she had been sitting, striking him on the shoulder.

It was all over in a moment. There was a flare-up, and a quick stamping out, and a smell of burning, and when I looked up Lisle's moustaches were not a pair, and the white feather in his cap was singed and black.

Two little gloved hands were laid on his arm, and a trembling voice gasped out:

"George, George—dear George! you're not hurt?"

The pale, quivering face that was raised to his spoke volumes.

He turned to her, and read in the clear, anxious eyes a truth that any man might have been proud to read.

"Hurt!" he said rapturously, bending towards her, and imprisoning both the slender hands. "Hurt! No, my own, my darling, my—"

I thought my services were no longer required, and I fled, noiselessly closing the conservatory door behind me. Lisle was on the right tack at last.

Hugh came up to me as I left the conservatory.

"All right, old fellow," I said; "you're not to be married this time, but take care how you propose to young ladies in future."

I thought Hugh would have burst into tears, the relief was so great. His face worked, but gradually settled down into a smile—a radiant and peaceful smile.

"Oh, Mostyn," he said with a deep-drawn sigh, "if you only knew what being engaged felt like! It's an awful feeling. I fell asleep this afternoon in the workshop, and I dreamed that Miss O'Neill and I were married, and going away for our honeymoon on a pair of oscillating cylinders. Oh, Mostyn, old chap, you have taken such a weight off my mind;" and Hugh shook me solemnly by the hand, and begged me to come and stay with him at Birkenhead, that he might take me over the works, and show me the man-of-war undergoing repairs in the docks. I agreed to everything, and hastened off after my long-neglected partner for the time being, an angelic-looking nun, who was sitting on an ottoman, in a not too angelic frame of mind at my remissness. However, I succeeded in conciliating her by dancing with her a second time, and observed to my no small amusement Hugh mingling again among the dancers, but carefully selecting for his partners only married women, being evidently afraid for the time of ladies who were not, as he termed it, "bespoke."

After a time two more people in whom I was interested entered the ball-room, and began to dance. They made a tall and handsome couple, and not a few eyes turned to watch them, Hugh's among the rest, with a look of fervent thankfulness I shall never forget.

"I am an engaged man," said Lisle, as we drove away from the door an hour later. "Mostyn, I am an engaged man."

"And I'm not," came a deep response from the back seat, accompanied by a triumphant chuckle.

"And I am to go over there to-morrow," continued Lisle—"do you hear, Mostyn?"—and Mrs. O'Neill is to be told as soon as ever her next setting of chickens is off, which she is expecting every day, and— I say, Mostyn, I do believe you are going to sleep, you unsympathetic beggar."

"Mostyn is a brick," I heard Hugh reply as in a dream, "and I am going to give him my little model engine."

Hush!

HUSH, love, hush!
Surely the silence is fully blest,
Surely we may be content to rest,
We two alone, alone together,
In the golden hush of the summer weather;
Hark to the gurgle of the thrush—
Hush, love, hush!

Hush, love, hush!
Sweet and dear though the words would be
That the parting lips would say to me,
It is better, better far, to lie
And read them all in the dark blue eye,
And answer them only with a blush—
Hush, love, hush!

Hush, love, hush!
Since all too loudly and too soon
The voice of the world will jar the tune,
The perfect melody that makes
The silence thrill with the note it wakes.
See, sunshine sleeps where the grass is lush—
Hush, love, hush!

"My Lord Conceit."

(A SERIAL STORY.)

By the Author of "FRAGOLETTA," "DAME DURDEN," &c., &c.

Book VII.

CHAPTER III. "WILFUL MURDER."

THE sun has broken gaily forth, and driven away the rainclouds, and over the London streets and London houses he pours out his beams in a perfect flood of radiance.

He pours them, too, on all the dingy, dusky houses around Lincoln's Inn Fields, making them look only duskier and dingier by reason of such generosity, and the jocund rays flit hither and thither, and peep through cobwebbed windows, and play at hide-and-seek in mysterious passages, and seem to mock the frowning houses that look so close, and grave, and dismal, as if they were standing tomb-stones of men's secrets and men's lives, as perhaps they are. And dancing, and fitting, and prying in this fantastic fashion, the sunbeams come at last to that shadowy chamber with its dark and quiet windows still closed to the daylight, and all the dismal tragedy that daylight will unveil.

And following the sunbeams, comes the old crone who has charge of the chambers, and looks after her solitary lodger. She comes in, armed with brooms and brushes, and goes to the window and draws up the blind, and in rush the sunbeams like live things at play, and race and chase each other through the room, in very mockery of what their presence brings to light.

For the old woman does nothing to the chamber that day, but the brooms and brushes fall with a hideous clatter, and the quiet house and the quiet street seem alive in a moment with shrieks of terror, and tread of feet.

The news spreads far and wide; spreads only by the utterance of one hideous whispered word—a word that carries its own weight of terror along with it—a word that travels far and near throughout that day, and brings investigation, surmise, question, wonder, all in its train, and so leads on from point to point, from theory to theory, from evidence to inquest, from inquest to further evidence, from further evidence to proof, shadowy and impalpable at first, but growing, and strengthening, and widening the circle of its condemnatory history, as a pebble thrown into still water widens the circle whence it first touched that water's surface.

And what say the enlightened jury after duly investigating the body? And to what points the evidence hastily collected by enlightened members of the force, and whence spring the witnesses who appear on the scene?

The majesty of the law is at work again on behalf of John Marsden, and the mighty engine works faster and surer now than it did, or seemed to do, when he was a living man to benefit—not a dead man to be avenged. At the close of the previous day the living man had sat in his solitary chamber brooding over the wealth and prosperity in store for him; the close of this day sees only a dumb, helpless form lying stark and straight upon its narrow couch, over whom no tears are shed, no loving memories cherished, and whose fate will be briefly summed up by a coroner's jury.

What was the evidence collected by the intelligent member of the force, X 57, after the discovery of the body by the old woman who attended on John Marsden?

First, that the body had been stabbed in the back; second, that the wound had been caused by some long and narrow instrument—probably a dagger; third, that the deceased had been visited in his rooms the evening of the murder by two people—a man and a woman—the man a foreigner, who was in the habit of coming very frequently to see the deceased; the woman a stranger, closely muffled, who came in a cab, stayed for some quarter of an hour or twenty minutes, and then went away in the same cab.

The intelligent member of the force had pricked up his ears at the sound of a foreigner—it fitted in with the dagger wound. A burglar or a robber would not have had such a weapon in his possession; the intelligent, therefore, made a note of this, and proceeded to act upon his suspicions. The name of this foreigner? The woman did not know—had never heard it to her knowledge—knew he was a foreigner because he looked like one—had overheard her master call him Count.

His address?

Wasn't sure of his address, but once her master had said he was going to dine at the Travellers' Club with this friend. Thought he might be found or heard of at the Travellers' Club.

Evidence at the Travellers' Club.

A foreign count? Several there.

Did one of them ever bring a gentleman of the name of John Marsden to dine?

Can't say. So many strangers came to dine. Would ask the waiters.

Waiter produced who had heard the name. A gentleman had dined only last week with Count Savona.

Ah, thank you, my friend. We are getting nearer. The Count Savona's address, if you please?

Private address unknown. But the Count called every day for his letters. Was expected that morning.

The intelligent leaves another intelligent to inform the Count he would be wanted to give evidence at the inquest to be held next day on the body of John Marsden, deceased.

Does the count come?

Certainly he comes. He is shocked; he is grieved. He is desolated and astounded at the awful occurrence. Inwardly in a very raging fury of baffled wrath and vengeance. All his schemes to end thus! His careful plans, his beautifully-arranged project, to be foiled at the very moment of completion! Ah, could all the oaths in the Italian language or any other languages he knew, relieve his feelings or chain back the demoniacal rage in his breast! He tried them inwardly as a sedative. But he was outwardly very calm, very dignified, very collected. His evidence was the most important yet brought forward.

Did he know the deceased?

Certainly. Had known him for some months. Saw him last on the evening of January 16th. He was perfectly well, and in his usual spirits. He was about to become possessor of some considerable amount of property, and on the evening of his death had been discussing its details with witness. The property was to come to him through his wife.

Wife! There is a slight stir of curiosity among the jury. Deceased had a wife, then? Where was she all this time?

Witness could not say. They had not been living together for some years. Had been very unhappy, in fact.

The intelligent, who keeps his eye fixed on the foreign count's face, thinks to himself that he is a very artful card indeed.

The witness has a statement to make. Very well, let him make it.

The wife of the deceased called on her husband at his rooms on the evening of the 16th January. She came to bring some papers necessary to the establishment of her claim to this property—papers she had hitherto refused to produce. She and her husband were disputing violently when witness came on the scene. Subject of dispute? The husband asked his wife to return to him, and she refused to do so.

How did the dispute end?

The wife made use of some threats, and left, still declaring her resolve that she would not return and live under her husband's roof—unless forced to do so.

When did she leave the rooms?

As near as witness could recollect, it was about ten o'clock, or a little later. He wished to see her downstairs, but she declined his offer, saying she had a cab waiting for her.

Did he hear the cab drive off?

Not for some time. He had wondered at the delay, fancying that perhaps Mrs. Marsden was paying and dismissing the man.

Intelligent thinks: "He's a deep 'un."

Could he give information as regards Mrs. Marsden's address?

Not her present address. She had been staying with some friends at Vaux Abbey, in Devon. But he had been informed by her husband that she had come to London simply to deliver up these papers.

And had parted with the deceased in an unfriendly manner?

In a most unfriendly manner.

What time did witness leave the deceased?

At half-past eleven. He remembered looking at his watch as he left the house.

Did he shut the outer door?

Yes; closed it after him as he usually did. He supposed the woman was about to lock and bolt it.

Had he heard her about?

No; could not say he had. The night was stormy, and it was difficult to hear anything except the noise of wind and rain.

Could he specify any threat Mrs. Marsden had used in his presence?

He could not. It was more her manner—her desperate look, her anger, that had impressed him.

Could he swear positively that Mrs. Marsden had left the house before himself?

No. She had only refused his escort, and said she had a cab waiting.

Any more witnesses?

No.

Then telegraph to Vaux Abbey for Mrs. Marsden's address. Answer prepaid. More delay—more conjectures. The intelligent keeps still that watchful guard over the foreign count, convinced in his own mind that he is deeper than ever.

In course of time telegram arrives from Vaux Abbey: "Mrs. Marsden is at the Charing Cross Hotel."

Messenger dispatched to Charing Cross Hotel. Returns with Mrs. Marsden, to whom the intelligence has been communicated.

How does she behave? No scene, no tears, no hysterics. Only a sad-faced, quiet woman who hears what is required of her, and answers all the questions asked, readily and composedly.

What does she say?

Deceased was her husband. They had not met for three years.

Were they on good terms?

No; they had not corresponded or seen each other during the time she had mentioned. He had returned to England ostensibly for a reconciliation—really, because he had discovered that she was entitled to some property.

Was it true they had had a serious disagreement on the night of the 16th of January?

Yes.

Would the witness state the particulars?

The witness does so, corroborating Count Savona's statement in a remarkable degree.

The jury exchange glances, and begin to fidget nervously on their seats. Things began to look serious.

After leaving her husband's rooms, did the witness return to her hotel in the cab waiting for her?

For the first time there is hesitation in the low, clear voice. A flush of colour stains Beryl Marsden's white cheeks; then, very unsteadily and briefly, comes the unexpected answer: "No."

Any objection to state where she went in the cab?

She dismissed the cab, and went for a walk.

A walk—in the storm and rain of such a night as that night? Did she visit anyone—go to any other friend?

No.

What time did witness reach her hotel?

Is not sure. Thinks it must have been late. The hall-porter admitted her, and she saw no one else.

How late? Past midnight?

Yes; it must have been past midnight.

And she had been taking a walk through the wet streets, and in the pouring rain, by choice, until that hour?

Yes.

Any statement to make? Any reason to suppose the deceased had any enemies?

No—no reason. For the last three years had heard nothing of his life or doings.

Did she know whether he possessed any foreign weapons—such as daggers, knives, etc., used by natives?

Could not say so positively. In India he had possessed such things, plenty of them.

But she had seen nothing of the kind in his possession during any of their meetings since his return to England?

No.

Would swear to that?

Certainly, as well as to all the other statements she had made.

The coroner sums up.

"Well, gentlemen, you have heard the evidence of the deceased's wife, his landlady, his friend, also the medical opinion as to the cause of his death. There is no question of suicide here, gentlemen, it is a case of violence—a dastardly deed. The unfortunate man must have been stabbed in the back while sitting quietly in his chair. There is no question of robbery either. The state of the room and receptacles proves that. Also the fact that the money and valuables on the person of the deceased were untouched. Without doubt this is a crime with a motive, gentlemen, though what that motive was we have as yet no evidence to show. You will, therefore, gentlemen of the jury, find a verdict in accordance with the evidence you have heard.

Verdict found:

"Wilful murder, against some person or persons unknown."

The intelligent hears it, and resolves to keep his eye on that foreigner. Of course it was he who did it. The very fact of trying to throw suspicion on the murdered man's wife is only another proof of deep-laid villainy. A woman do such a thing, and such a woman—a slight, pale, fragile creature, who looks as if a breath of wind would blow her away? Preposterous! The intelligent isn't going to be hoodwinked like that. Perhaps this will be a Government affair, a reward, or two rewards, for the widow is rich, and may well be liberal if only to clear the slur from her own character.

The jury are dismissed, the coroner goes his way, and the intelligent walks thoughtfully through the streets, oblivious of little boys and area-beggars, as he ponders over what he will do next; whether he will apply for a warrant, or on his own responsibility arrest the foreigner. If he waits for the advertisement of a reward someone else may be beforehand. After all he had best interview the widow and discover if she is willing to offer one. To-morrow the case will be in the papers; to-morrow—perhaps even to-day—Scotland Yard will be eager for a finger in the pie. Yes, he had better go to the Charing Cross Hotel, state his suspicions, and see what is to be made out of the case. It must come to a trial, and then what a chance for him! All sorts of Alnaschar-like ideas float through his brain. He seems to tread on air, and reaches the hotel in a state of gentle elation.

Is Mrs. Marsden at home? She is.

The answer very short and snappish, for the hotel dignitary is offended at the idea of policemen coming to interview a visitor at their hotel twice in one day.

Will the dignitary kindly take up a note and say the bearer waits?

It is done. The answer? Mrs. Marsden will see the bearer. Kindly step up to her private sitting-room.

The intelligent draws a long deep breath, and a self-satisfied smile is upon his lips. The interview is very brief, but when he descends the stairs, and leaves the hotel and the offended dignitaries behind him, that bland smile has left his lips, and a dark frown knits his intelligent brow.

What has Mrs. Marsden said? Mrs. Marsden has listened quietly to his explanations, and annihilated his scheme by a few terse words.

"Count Savona could not have murdered my husband, for it is greatly to his benefit and advantage that he should live."

Blow number one.

"I have already sent to Scotland Yard for a skilful detective, and intend offering a reward of two hundred pounds for the discovery of the murderer."

Blow number two.

The intelligent thereupon takes himself off in a huff, swearing inwardly against all women as a set of impetuous fools.

CHAPTER IV. ACCUSER AND ACCUSED.

A SMALL, slightly-built man, with a pale face and a quiet manner, presents himself at the Charing Cross Hotel that evening, and is shown up to Mrs. Marsden's room. The quiet man gives his name as "Mr. Brough," and informs her that he has come in answer to her request at Scotland Yard.

As he speaks he takes in every detail of the face, figure, and manner of the woman before him. She asks him to take a seat, which he does, then she produces some papers, and opens the business for which he has been summoned.

"I have spent the afternoon," she says, "in making a few notes of the matter. Will you kindly read them?"

Mr. Brough takes the papers, draws his chair up to the table, and for the space of a quarter of an hour gives himself up to the task.

"A clever woman, and a woman who knows what she's about."

In those brief words he sums up Beryl Marsden's character, as he studies the notes she has made, and sees how the case stands.

"Well?" she says, as he looks up from the last page.

"You will allow me to put a few questions to you, madam?"

"Certainly, as many as you please."

"You must be aware," he says, "to whom this evidence points."

"I am quite aware of it," she answers calmly. "The man who has tried to throw suspicion on me is the worst enemy I have."

"You declare here that you have no knowledge of any person who could have had a motive for murdering your husband?"

"I have no such knowledge," she says wearily.

"And no suspicion?"

"None whatever."

"His papers and money were not in any way disturbed?"

"So I have heard."

"You have not been to the rooms since the inquest?"

"No," she answers with a shudder. "I—I could not."

"This Count—this foreigner was a friend of your husband's, and yet you say an enemy of yours?"

"Yes," she says simply. "He occasioned the—the misunderstanding that kept us apart those three years."

"He was present at the interview between your husband and yourself the night of the murder?"

"Yes. I left him there with my husband."

"You don't suspect him?"

"No," she says with a bitter smile, "for he has lost the stake for which he played, by the death of my husband."

The detective looks at her keenly. Is she wilfully bent on making her position worse by damaging statements?

He draws out a pocket-book, and makes some entries in it. She watches him gravely and silently, as if unconscious that she is launching herself into a sea of troubles, of all the possible shame and terror waiting to engulf her life.

"You give me unlimited powers to act as I think best?"

"Yes; I am rich enough to reward you, as well as to place any possible means that can assist discovery, at your disposal."

The detective relapses again into thought. He is bound to acknowledge that this is a puzzling case. The person to whom suspicion points, the only person to all showing who has any motive for the crime, is the person employing him to search for the criminal.

"A rum start," he says to himself, "a very rum start. Does she want to mislead me, or is she really anxious to have the thing sifted?"

"Have you told me everything that can throw a light on the matter?" he says at last.

"Everything, as far as I know."

"The weapon has not been discovered?"

"No, there was no sign of it."

"Very well," he says thoughtfully. "In the first place, I must go to his rooms and see what I can find out there. You will kindly give me your card and an order for admission. Is the—body—there?"

"Yes," she says with a faint shudder. "I am expecting a gentleman—a friend—for whom I have telegraphed. I must ask him to make all the necessary arrangements."

"Has anything been disturbed? I mean books, papers, drawers, etcetera?"

"Not to my knowledge. But you forget, I have not been there. The shock was very terrible to me, and we parted in so unfriendly a manner."

"Yes, yes," he interrupts hurriedly; "but I shouldn't say more about that than I could help if I were you. And now, good-evening. I'll look in to-morrow morning, and tell you if I've found any clue. I——"

What more he might have been going to say was cut short by a sharp rap at the door. It was opened so closely on the knock, that it seemed as if permission had been quite unneeded.

As Beryl raised her head and saw who barred the entrance, she started to her feet. Two men stood there—one, a policeman; the other, Count Savona.

The count advanced with his cold smile, and that evil glitter in his eyes that she knew so well.

"Constable, there is the woman named in the warrant you hold. Arrest her!"

Beryl looked at him, her face ashen pale, her eyes aflame.

"Arrest me!" she cried wildly. "You dare not; you——"

"Hush!" said the detective. "I expected this."

She sank back on the chair and covered her face with her trembling hands, as if to shut out some hateful sight.

"You had better come along quiet, ma'am," said the policeman, advancing. "It's my duty to tell you that any observations you make may be used against you."

She dropped her hands and looked wildly from one to the other of the three men.

"But I am trying to find it out," she cried. "I have offered a reward; I—— Oh, speak for me," she entreated passionately, as she turned to Brough. "Say it's a mistake—they can't mean it! Take me in charge! Oh, the shame, the horror of it! For Heaven's sake, don't do that!"

Count Savona only stood there with folded arms, and smiled at those agonised prayers. It was his turn to triumph now, and the triumph was very sweet to him.

Mr. Brough's sharp eyes were on his face, and Mr. Brough's sharp wits were at work, but he had seen the warrant, and he knew that interference was useless. Beryl Marsden might be as innocent as himself, but that innocence must be proved now throughout the length and breadth of the land wherever the news of the murder had spread. And to prove it would be as difficult a matter as the tracing of that real criminal, whose very existence was shrouded in mystery.

"She hasn't done it, and the foreigner hasn't done it," said the detective to himself. "But I'm blest if there's a trace of any third party who has. However, that's for me to find out. A queer case this, and no mistake, but it's harder than I think if it baffles John Brough!"

Then he went to Beryl's side and whispered something to her, and she looked up at his face with the stony quietude of despair.

"Do what you will," she said wearily; "I have ceased to struggle with misfortune!"

When Colonel Dunbar came up to town in obedience to that summons of Beryl Marsden, he was horrified to learn the course events had taken—horrified at the charge against Beryl—horrified at the stupidity of juries, detectives, and the police force in general.

He rails, and he rages, and he goes to the magistrate who has issued the warrant for Beryl's arrest and offers bail to any amount for her release. But the magistrate tells him quietly that the application is quite in vain, that it is impossible to allow bail upon such a charge as this.

The case is coming on next week. The best thing the friend of the accused can do is to procure witnesses and counsel to defend her. She will need it, he says significantly.

Colonel Dunbar then asks to see Beryl, and permission is given. It is a terrible ordeal to both of them, though she is the calmer of the two.

"I will bring Madge to see you," says Colonel Dunbar as he takes his leave; "she will cheer you up."

Beryl looks at him imploringly.

"No," she entreats, "not here, I—I could not bear it. I want to be calm. Heaven knows I have need of all my self-control, and to see Madge would upset me altogether."

"You may be sure I will do all in my power," Colonel Dunbar says earnestly; "you can trust me to set every engine of the law at work on your behalf. It will only be a question of—a little temporary inconvenience—your detention here," he adds huskily.

"I am sure you will do everything in your power," she says gratefully; "and believe me, I have no fear. Whatever they prove, they can't prove that I have done what they accuse me of."

"Of course they can't," he says cheerily. "Talk of justice, indeed! A pack of blind, self-willed fools running their heads against a brick wall—that's just what this case comes to."

"I—I want you to do something more for me," says Beryl, flushing and paling as she takes a slip of paper from her dress. "If you will go to this address, you will find someone there who is in great need and danger—someone you used to know in other days. You will understand when you see the—the person, what is to be done. Promise that you will go straight there when you leave me?"

"Certainly, if you wish it," he answers, turning the paper over and over in his hand in a puzzled way. "It—it has reference to this, I suppose?"

"Some slight reference," she says hesitatingly; "I don't think it is of any importance. If there is any mention of my name," she went on, "don't let this disgrace be known. If it becomes public I can't help it, but at present, while there is any chance of concealing it, let it be concealed; that is all I have to say."

"I will come again soon," says Colonel Dunbar eagerly. "Every day—six times a day, if they will let me. So keep up a good heart, my dear. We'll see you through this safe enough, in spite of juries, and lawyers, and witnesses, and foreigners. I should like to see that infernal Count strung up to a gallows himself," he adds with unwonted savageness; "and I dare say he will be some day. A nice, scheming, fraudulent brute he seems. And how he took us all in!"

Beryl grows white as death.

"He has been a bitter foe to me," she says with a nervous shiver that she cannot repress. "I—I can't help saying I am afraid of him."

"Nonsense!" says Colonel Dunbar heartily. "Afraid—you afraid! Don't let me hear such a thing! Now I'm off to see Brough. He's hard at work for you. Then I'll go to this address, and see what's up with your friend there. You—you're sure you won't like to see Madge?"

"No—no!" she cries almost wildly. "I told you I could not bear it."

"Very well," he says soothingly, and then they part.

It need not be supposed that Madge Dunbar, though forbidden Beryl's presence, could leave her friend in such a sorrowful and hazardous strait without some sign of sympathy. Cosmo's next appearance was signalled by a letter from the brave-hearted little woman; such a letter, so characteristic of the writer; so charged with love, pity, sorrow, indignation, wrath, that Beryl laughed and cried alternately over the closely-covered sheets which she read again and again.

"I—I have some more news for you," continued Colonel Dunbar. "I went to the address you gave, and I suppose it is needless to say whom I found there? I owe you a debt I can never repay for sending me in time."

"In time!" she cried, growing very white. "He—he was so ill, then?"

"Very—very ill; but there, don't look so alarmed. It's all right. I've had the best surgeon in London to him. The operation was over in a trice, and now there's every hope of his recovery. Poor fellow!" he adds sorrowfully, "he must have had an awful time of it, from what his man says."

"Does he know—of—this?" she asks slowly. "Had he heard?"

"No, nor is he likely to. It's easy to keep papers out of reach of an invalid. He's awfully weak, but with a good doctor and a devoted attendant like that Tom, he's sure to pull through right enough."

The slow tears are trickling through her clasped hands as they hide her face from sight. It strikes Colonel Dunbar as strange that she can weep for another's sufferings, yet care so little for her own peril. But to him women have been always more or less of a mystery, so he asks no question and makes no remark on her agitation.

He is glad she does not question him about herself and her position, for things are looking very black, and he cannot but acknowledge that all Mr. Brough's skill seems powerless to set aside the accumulation of facts that grow and grow into appalling magnitude, till they stand like a dead wall between Beryl Marsden and that liberty for which she looks with eager eyes and brave and hopeful heart, but to which, alas! the most sanguine of her friends can now no longer point.

(To be continued.—Commenced in No. 141.)

In the Flower Snow.

"T'WAS on a fair and summer day,
The blossom-time of hope and love;
The hawthorn-trees were white with may,
The lark sang in the blue above.
When straying by the brook to see
The lilies float upon the stream,
There softly fell a spell on me,
The dawn of life's most tender dream.
I felt the pain, the sweet unrest,
That Love, and Love alone can bring;
And to itself my heart confessed
That it at last had found its king.
The sun sank low, and from the blue
Dropped down to rest the panting bird;
The closing flowers were wet with dew,
The mellow bells of eve were heard;
And still beside the rippling brook
I lingered in the twilight grey,
And cast around a wistful look;
"Some one" might chance to come that way.
Oh, joy! a footstep that I know
Like music falls upon mine ear;
A form comes through the flower-snow—
Be still, my heart, for he is here!
The moon rose up with silver light,
And still we knew not how to part,
As there we stood, on that blest night,
Hand clasped in hand, heart pressed to heart.
And then, beneath the flowering trees,
A tale of love once more was told;
With none to hear save bird and breeze,
The story that can ne'er grow old.
Unbroken is the golden chain
That bound our two hearts on that day;
And never shall it break again,
Until our two lives pass away.

The White House.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

ON the confines of a small wood of oak-trees, where the bracken-fern grows wonderfully high and vigorous, low down in a deep hollow between two ridges of rising hills, stands a solitary house.

Round it lies a vineyard—for I write of a land where the vine both flourishes and ripens—and on one side a modest kitchen-garden, where cabbages, carrots, and garlic grow together in company with a few neglected flowers. A tiny gate leads from the garden to the road, which to the right ascends at once, and to the left goes still lower in the hollow to where a bubbling river runs under a rustic bridge. Beyond that the road climbs up the hill to the village of Thermae.

The house has been long known, for many leagues round, by the name of "The White House," but that name seems now a derision, for the building, including its tiled roof, is uniformly grey. Perhaps, long, long ago, when that house was new, its white-washed walls may have so contrasted with its red tiles, as to have rightly gained its appellation. But for many a long year it has been grey, and rains and storms have discoloured alike both the whiteness of the walls and the redness of the tiles. It is a very small house, and a very solitary one too, for the nearest habitation is a full ten minutes' walk from The White House.

But it was once quite large enough for its two lonely inhabitants, and sufficiently near the neighbours to satisfy old André Desbats and his idiot granddaughter.

Yes, Madeleine was "foolish," as they said. You could see it in the vacant gaze of her large dark eyes, you could hear it in her dreamy, expressionless voice, and you could understand it, too, when once you knew her sad story.

Madeleine was not born so. For six happy years intelligence had gleamed in her eyes, which now retained only their beauty of form and colour, but from which the life of reason had departed. For six happy years her pallid cheek had worn the glow and bloom of health, and Madeleine had been the joy, pride, and hope of her parents' home.

Then, in one second, the mysterious hand of God struck all to naught; the parents were dead, their orphan an idiot. A storm—one of those dreadful storms that gather their force on the summits of mountains to pour out their fury in the valley—broke one Sunday evening over the land.

There was no rain, but peals of thunder instantaneously followed red flashes of forked lightning. When the roll of one of these, more fearful than all preceding ones, had died away in the distance, there was a lull, then the rain fell heavily on the hot earth, and the storm swept farther on. But it had done evil work.

In a small peasant's house of Thermes a man and a woman lay on the floor stone dead, their faces disfigured and blackened by that last flash; a child lay near the corpses insensible, and to all appearance dead also.

When, after the storm had abated, a neighbour penetrated tremblingly into the lightning-struck abode, he came out staggering at what he had seen, and bearing in his arms Madeleine's lifeless form.

The child was not dead, only when she opened her heavy eyes, they were rayless; the mind had departed, or was sleeping, and never more, it seemed, would waken to this earth's joy or woe.

Old André Desbats, Madeleine's maternal grandfather, led the lonely orphan to his solitary home. She went passively, without a tear; the past was a blank, her parents, alive or dead, henceforth unknown.

Madeleine's father, like many other small landowners in that country, had mortgaged a good part of his land; for a succession of misfortunes—hail, frost, and a malady in the vines, which caused the leaves to fall in the heat of summer, leaving the uncovered grapes to be dried up and withered by the sun, before ripe—had made money scarce for many years.

The land was sold to pay the mortgage, as well as a few other debts, and the funeral expenses. When all costs were defrayed, Madeleine's inheritance was small indeed, yet sufficient to maintain her with what her grandfather would leave her after his death. The old man had made all the necessary arrangements in case of that event; his grandson, Robert Desbats, the child of his only son, had long promised that his home should be Madeleine's at the old man's death.

These two men were the orphan's only relations.

As Madeleine grew up she showed a preference for her cousin. Whether it was that his bright, genial voice struck some broken chord in her mind, or whether his young, handsome face raised some dead memory to life within her, she would vaguely show that his presence pleased her, and mark a prolonged absence if several days passed without his coming to The White House. Not that she would speak to him differently than in that dull, apathetic voice that was ever hers, or look at him otherwise than with her constant, vacant gaze; but she would steal noiselessly to his side, and follow him about like a faithful dog, sitting when he sat, and walking when he walked.

The young man had a kind heart; often he would speak to her gently, trying to make her understand his words, and sigh as he saw the uselessness of the attempt.

Once—Madeleine was then seventeen—he came upon her as she sat on a low bench, under an elm-tree, near The White House. Usually she heard his step, but this time she seemed to hear nothing. Her eyes, blank and lifeless, that would have been so beautiful had expression filled their orbs, were uplifted to the sky, where a trembling star had just risen, for the sun had set. Perhaps her gaze for a brief space had followed her mind into a far-off world, where perchance it dwelt.

Gently and pitifully Robert passed his hand over her long neglected tresses that fell darkly over her shoulders. She turned quickly, and it seemed to her cousin that an expression deep and earnest filled her eyes. It was dusk; astonished, eagerly he drew her towards him, when her idiot's laugh fell on his ear.

"The stars are very high," she said. "Madeleine would like to reach them."

Then she sighed, and as the young man heard the meaningless words, and saw the vacancy of her face, he thought he must have dreamt to have fancied expression could ever fill her countenance.

André was a peculiar old man, and his sorrows, which had been numerous—for of three children none were living—had made him taciturn and suspicious. He would have no woman about the place, and it was he himself who attended to his household duties and prepared his frugal meals; he would sweep both kitchen and bedrooms, and put the soup to boil, whilst Madeleine, in winter, sat crouching by the fire, and in summer wandered out of doors.

Sometimes she went to Thermes, where people invited her into their homes, and frequently setting food and drink before her, received her kindly, whilst she accepted their hospitality with her usual dull apathy. She was never violent or dangerous, and no boy in that quiet village would have dared to laugh at the idiot girl, whose calamity rendered her sacred, even in the sight of the most thoughtless. Only at the approach of a storm, and during its fury, her body would be shaken with nervous tremors. She would, at such times, throw herself on the ground, and hiding her face in her hands, moan piteously. Then, when the storm had passed, she would rise and go about as usual, and never since she had been an orphan had a tear been seen to glisten in her eyes or to fall down her cheeks.

One day towards the end of October—a day on which a high impetuous wind hurried the fall of the leaves, and dark threatening clouds alternated with glimpses of blue sky—Robert came to The White House. It was rather an unusual hour for the industrious young man to call; he generally came at the close of evening, and now it was but midday.

André and Madeleine had barely finished their silent meal, and the old man sat smoking his pipe, whilst the young girl, from her seat, dreamily watched the wind rapidly chasing the clouds, when her cousin entered. The half-smile which his presence ever called forth stole vaguely over her features as she heard his step, and she rose, trembling with pleasure, as he bade her gently good-day. He was the only person who ever stirred a feeling in her vacant mind. Not all her grandfather's kindness or solicitude ever elicited a smile.

After speaking about the vintage, which had been bounteous this year, and tasting the new wine, still sweet, but promising to be good, Robert owned that he had something particular to say, but looked awkward at speaking before Madeleine.

"Never mind," said the old man sadly, "you know you can speak before her; she's forgotten you are here."

And so it appeared to be, for Madeleine had left her seat, and stood by the window, evidently engaged again in dreamily watching the clouds. Seeing this the young man was reassured, and after making a cigarette and lighting it, he drew his seat nearer to André's and began speaking in a low voice:

"Grandfather, you have frequently asked me of late whether I intended marrying, and you have told me that it would please you to see me settled before your death; moreover, that you would then be more at ease as regards Madeleine."

"True, my boy, so I should. I can't expect strangers to feel for the poor thing as I do. You are good to her, but you're young, and you might take a wife who'd object to having a poor idiot in her house, though she's harmless enough, Heaven knows. If you were married before my death I should know whether to confide her to your care, or whether to seek another home for her instead."

"Well, grandfather," replied Robert, who had listened smilingly to the old man, "I think you will be satisfied, for the best, the loveliest, the kindest-hearted girl of Thermes will, please Heaven, be my wife next spring."

A slight noise, like a stifled moan, here startled him, but as Madeleine was still quietly looking out of the window, he went on:

"You guess, don't you, that I am speaking of Léonie Dufour?"

"Aye, aye," answered the old man; "she's a fine girl, though very young. Has she promised to be your wife, and do her parents consent?"

"Yes, she has; and we should be wed at once, but that her father wants her to wait till she's eighteen, which won't be before next May."

"Well, she's a good and a pretty girl too, and will bring her husband a good marriage-portion as well, which never does any harm either," added the old peasant.

Robert rose.

"I must go now," he said. "I have oats to sow this afternoon; only the matter was settled yesterday evening, and I wanted to tell you at once. May I bring her to see you next Sunday?"

"Yes, come by all means, and I'll uncork a bottle of old wine to drink to your happiness and hers."

Robert had already reached the door when he recollected that he had not said good-bye to Madeleine; he turned to do so, and perceived she had left the room.

"Why, where is she?" he asked, astonished. "I never heard her move."

"No," returned André quietly; "she makes little noise. I suppose she forgot you were here, and has gone out. You'll probably come across her on your road."

The young man went, and, lover-like, soon thought of no one else but Léonie. He was indeed so absorbed in happy thoughts that he scarcely noticed where he went, when a moan, such as had startled him at The White House, again smote his ear. He looked about him, and saw Madeleine at a slight distance crouching on the ground, her face completely hidden by her long black hair.

He stood on the rustic wooden bridge, beneath which the Midou, a small but noisy river, lies in its deep bed. The idiot girl was lying on the grass, so near the edge of the water that by a single unguarded movement, she might have fallen in.

Robert crossed the bridge, took a small path on the opposite side, and soon stood close to Madeleine. Without a word he bent down, lifted her up, and carried her a few yards from the dangerous spot. Then only he released her, and watched her face with some anxiety in his. But that none had ever seen her weep, he would have thought she had shed tears now, for there was a softness in her large dark eyes, so beautiful in form and colour, and a moisture on her pale cheeks, paler still than of wont. She trembled greatly, as she usually did when a storm brooded in the air, and yet no storm was to be presaged. Robert felt perplexed and troubled.

"What were you doing there, so near the river?" he asked gently.

Almost he fancied, owing to that unusual expression in her face, that she would give him a coherent reply; he was soon disappointed. She looked at him in her blank way, and said plaintively:

"Don't scold me, and don't tell the clouds you found me."

"No," he answered, sighing; "I won't tell them, only you must promise me not to lie so near the water's edge again. And now tell me, Madeleine, why you left the house so suddenly without even saying good-bye to me?"

"I don't remember," she murmured, touching her forehead; "unless it was because you said her name. You know—the name of the girl with the yellow hair, like wheat. I don't like her name."

"What! you don't like the name of Léonie? Ah, but you'll like it soon, Madeleine, and like the owner too, for she already loves you dearly."

Madeleine shook her head.

"And now," continued Robert, "go straight home like a good child; it is too cold to remain here."

He gently caressed her hair, and then stood watching her sadly as she slowly walked across the bridge, and afterwards climbed the road towards The White House.

The following Sunday Robert brought his betrothed to see André. He might well be proud of her, for Léonie was a very lovely girl. Abundant fair hair was plaited round her well-shaped head; her eyes were of a bright blue, and innocent as a child's in their expression; her cheeks were the bloom of youth and health, and when she smiled, which she often did, for hers was a sunny nature, she displayed merry dimples in their roses, and teeth that were dazzlingly white. She was not very tall, but although so young showed already signs of a not uncomely plumpness.

The couple arrived before dinner, but when the meal was ready and they drew their chairs to the table, it was discovered that Madeleine was not present. They called and searched for her in vain, she was nowhere to be found. This cast a shadow over their happiness; nevertheless, when old André drew a dusty bottle from his small cellar, and reverently drawing the cork, drank to the future welfare and health of the young people, they all three became a little brighter, and the poor idiot girl was forgotten for a while.

It was not till sunset that Madeleine returned. Robert and Léonie had left, and the old man was beginning to feel seriously uneasy at her prolonged absence, when, with a weary, tired step, she entered The White House.

Without a question, which André knew would be useless, he placed food and drink before her. She partook silently of both, but when her grandfather pressed her to drink the glass of old wine which they had left her, she refused it with so abrupt a gesture that the contents were spilled on the floor. She looked at it vaguely, murmuring, "It looks like blood," and then fell into her habitual silence.

André was both astonished and frightened at her petulance, for he had never known her other than gentle and submissive. However, as the following day she was the same as usual, he forgot the occurrence.

Shortly after, one day Madeleine went up to the village, and entered Léonie's house. The young girl was sitting in the neat clean kitchen by the side of a bright wood-fire, sewing some linen for her marriage-outfit. She offered her visitor a seat. Madeleine took it, and for more than an hour sat silently watching Léonie. To all questions she returned no answer, and her steady yet vacant look at last troubled Léonie so much, that she began gently singing so as to break the charm.

At last Madeleine rose, and went, still in silence, towards the door, but there she paused and turned:

"You will be happy, Léonie; you are good and pretty, and you sing like the singing of my dreams." Then, without another word, she left the house.

When Léonie related the visit to Robert, he said:

"You will tame her, dear, and do her good. You have already opened her mind sufficiently for her to see that you are good and pretty, and to hear that you sing divinely."

Still, Madeleine was rarely visible when the lovers came to visit André, and she never again addressed a word to the young girl. She seemed sadder and more silent than ever, and those that saw her only occasionally were surprised at her increased pallor and thinness; still, as she never complained, old André felt no anxiety on her account.

The winter came and passed. For that southern region the season had been severe; it had snowed, and ice had covered the ponds more than an inch thick. Even now—and it was nearly April—though the days were warm and sunny, frost lay on the ground in the early morning; and on the borders of the woods and thickets, the sun was not yet warm enough to melt it quite. Throughout the whole day a fringe of white edged the green meadows near the trees.

One morning Léonie came down from Thermes to The White House. She was the bearer of a message from her father for old André. The road that led across the wooden bridge, owing to the tall elms that bordered it, and whose young leaves were already sprouting, was in the shade, but on the meadows which lay on either side, the sun streamed warm and bright.

Lightly jumping across a hedge, the young girl was soon briskly walking on the grass towards The White House.

Like most peasant-girls of the country, she knitted as she went, and at the same time she sang a bright, sweet song, for her heart was light and happy.

Suddenly a terrific roar silenced her song and arrested both feet and hands in fear.

Léonie was not a nervous girl, and she was too much accustomed to being with cattle to be afraid of them. She milked her father's cows, she guarded the oxen in pasture, and had never even stood in awe of the wild young bull of her father's herd. Yet when she now saw a large-horned animal rushing madly across the grass in her direction, she first paused in utter terror and dismay, and then tore on at her utmost speed, for she had seen at a glance that the bull running thus wildly after her, was one known in all the country as so dangerous that he was never let free, and must now have escaped by force from chain and collar.

Robert Desbats had very lately purchased the animal, and had himself only yesterday evening told Léonie's father, in her presence, that it was of pure race and lineage, but dangerously wild at times.

Léonie ran on, terror lending her speed, and the bull followed, accompanying his impetuous course with wild roarings of rage. She measured the distance that lay between her and safety. Alas! no building stood nearer than The White House, and that was still barely in view.

She raised a sudden despairing cry for help. She felt that the call would be unheard, and that a few moments only separated her from a cruel death. Now she feels the bull's breath on her neck—a ghastly feeling makes her reel. Then suddenly she receives a shock, a strong impulse throws her to the ground and saves her. Almost simultaneously she hears the roar of the maddened brute, and a heavy fall.

For a moment stunned, she rises, feels that she is unharmed, but has a conviction that her safety has been purchased at a dire cost. Through her bewildered gaze she sees Robert and a labourer running at full speed after the bull; both carry heavy whips, and the former the strong chain and collar, from which the infuriated animal has escaped. She hears Robert's voice calling to her in a tone she has never heard before:

"For Heaven's sake run to her, Léonie, and see whether she is still alive!"

"She! Who?" wonders Léonie. She sees that the two men are mastering the bull, and quickly recovers her senses. "She" must be that form which she now perceives, lying motionless on the grass a few yards off. She hurries towards it, and begins to understand how she herself has been saved. The generous hand that thrust her from an awful death to take her place, was the hand of the idiot girl Madeleine.

She seems dead; her cheeks, her lips, are bloodless; she lies on her back, her lids are closed, and her long black hair falls over her shoulders.

Léonie touches her hands, they are cold as death. A sob rises to her throat, she thinks she will die too in looking on that ghastly figure, when Robert hastily rejoins her. His voice is husky with emotion, and his hand trembles as he places it on Madeleine's heart. Then he turns to Léonie:

"She is not yet dead, but Heaven knows what injury she has sustained."

Of outward harm there is no sign; yet, when the young man tenderly and carefully takes the light form in his arms, a groan of anguish escapes those lifeless lips. He carries her gently and silently to her home, Léonie sobbing by his side.

They lay her on her bed, and whilst André stands by her side, silent and tearless in his grief, and Léonie tries to restore life by chafing those cold hands, Robert saddles André's grey mare, and makes her trot to the doctor's house, which is full ten miles off, faster than the old mare ever thought to run again.

Neither the old man's silent despair, nor Léonie's fast-flowing tears, wake Madeleine from her death-like swoon.

The noonday sun declines ere the doctor comes. He enters, stoops over the sufferer, touches the stiffened limbs, and then ominously shakes his head. When with his hand he examines the spine, a moan escapes the poor girl's lips, and the doctor turns away.

"There is no hope," he murmurs, "the injury is in the spine; partial paralysis has already commenced, it will reach the heart, and then—"

A look says the rest. There is no need to do anything, for nothing can save Madeleine from a speedy, but not painful death.

Before leaving, the doctor asks to see the poor girl's clothes, and looks at them with Robert. The skirts are pierced, but the thickness of the home-spun woollen material has saved Madeleine's form and limbs from being gored. It is the fall from a height of perhaps fifteen feet after the toss, that has caused mortal mischief to the spine.

Tears are in Robert's handsome eyes as he returns from accompanying the doctor, and takes up his watch with the others by that inert body that seems already dead.

A priest has been sent for; he kneels by the bed, murmuring the prayers for the dying over Madeleine's unconscious head. His voice is the only sound that breaks the death-like stillness of the room.

The sun has sunk, a young moon has risen and throws a pale light on to the bed, when suddenly there is a slight movement in Madeleine's face and she opens her eyes.

They rest on Robert's, and their expression is no longer vague and wandering, but filled with such a light of love and tenderness, that it seems as though her soul had returned from a long journey to visit its mortal covering once, before leaving it again—for ever.

Robert bends towards her, and the voice that speaks to him, though very low, is no idiot's meaningless tones.

"I am glad I did it," she murmured. "I saw you coming, but I knew that you could not be in time, and then she would have been where I am now." She paused a moment, and then continued: "You are good and kind, and it pains you to see me here, but it would have been far greater pain had she been in my place."

The priest approached, but she turned her eyes away from him, and looked only at Robert.

"No," she sighed, "I have nothing to confess. My head has ached very often, and I have not always known what I did, but if you could have loved the idiot girl, Robert—only that could not be—the pain and confusion would perhaps have gone away."

She spoke no more, but with her hand clasped in Robert's till it grew colder still, and quite senseless, with her eyes fixed on his, till their first and last look of intelligence faded into death, she peacefully passed away.

A few days ago I passed by The White House. It was an autumn day, and the leaves were drifted to the ground by a cold wind. They strewed the path, and rustled under my feet as I walked, and I heard the river murmuring under the wooden bridge.

The house was deserted and closed, the garden neglected and overgrown by weeds. Old André, older, grayer, and more silent than ever, lives up in the village with Robert and Léonie.

In his happiest moments he rocks their child on his knees, but his thoughts ever seem absent, and are most often with the memory of the poor idiot girl—Madeleine.

Her name is sacred in Robert's home, and his child already murmurs a prayer for the peace of the soul of Madeleine.

The Editor's Note Book.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN has the happy faculty of always saying the right thing in the right way, and her touching and graceful letter of thanks to her people for the "affectionate sympathy" which they displayed on the death of the Duke of Albany will forge another link in that chain of personal good feeling, which, in this country, fortunately binds Sovereign and subjects together. So long as this family feeling exists, socialists, and republicans, and anarchists may rave against monarchical institutions in England without doing much harm to anybody.

THE arrests in connection with the dynamite infernal machines are of great importance, and perhaps some of the hasty people who cry out against the police and especially the detective department, if there is the slightest delay in discovering the most artful criminals, will regret their precipitancy.

THE American papers, by the way, appear to be very angry with our press for calling for some Government interference with Irish traitors on their side, and declare, firstly, that there is no proof that the dynamite came from the United States, and, secondly, that if it did it would be out of the power of any Government to prevent its exportation.

THIS, of course, has nothing to do with the matter. The point is, simply, that the American Government, by allowing Fenian agents to advertise publicly for subscriptions with the avowed intention of destroying numbers of innocent people, is practically conniving at murder, and that everybody knows perfectly well that the only reason why no American politician displays common honesty and humanity in the matter is that the Irish vote is looked upon as much too serious and important a political factor to be trifled with.

If the action taken by the Empress of China and her advisers may be accepted as a forecast of the future, it is very clear that the French, far from having finished their work when they captured Bac-Ninh, are on the threshold of a war with China itself—a very different matter to a buccaneering expedition in a remote province. Everybody in power who was connected with the Chinese disasters in Tonquin has been degraded and punished, and Peking seems full of fight. A Chinese war may please the Parisians—especially as there can be no fear of an invasion of Black Flags—but it seems an odd way of procuring that repose of which France stands so much in need.

LORD ROSEBERY has evidently made good use of his eyes and ears during his tour in the Australian colonies, and his remarks at Dundee on the subject of the relations which ought to exist between the mother-country and her offspring will be read with keen interest in Australia and New Zealand. It is so very seldom that statesmen at home take the trouble to learn anything about subjects of this kind for themselves, that Lord Rosebery's speech will come as quite a pleasant surprise.

ONE of the matters of which Australia grievously complains is the existence and extension of the French convict settlement at New Caledonia, and the somewhat apathetic manner in which protests and complaints have been received by the authorities at home. A remonstrance was, indeed, addressed by Lord Granville to the French Government on the subject, but no real objection was made to its being politely shelved in the usual way, and there seems to be no reason to hope that France has any intention of clearing out the hideous sink of iniquity which lies, so to speak, at Australia's very doors.

THE annals of our own early convict settlements do not afford very pleasant reading, but the story of New Caledonia as told in the Times of the 17th instant—on French authority, be it understood—is infinitely worse. It is not surprising that the Australians should look with dismay on this manufactory of demons, for it really is little else, and on the prospect of its inhabitants gradually overflowing among the Pacific Islands.

THE Easter Monday Volunteer Reviews, which appear to have been quite as successful as any of their predecessors, have been described in the newspapers, as usual, at extraordinary length and with elaborate detail, and the customary compliments have been lavishly bestowed upon the force.

THAT these compliments are not in the main thoroughly well earned, and that the men do not deserve every credit for their public spirit and for the pluck and energy with which they struggle with adverse circumstances, I should be sorry indeed to say. But there seems to be real danger that in the roseate glow of the congratulations of the reporters, the public should lose sight of the darker side of the question, and be led away by the fallacious idea that the collection of regiments that they occasionally see together represents in any genuine way anything like a real army.

THERE is not much that is either useful or practical in the idea of an army without camp equipment, without transport, without commissariat, without cavalry, and without field-artillery; while the arrangements in virtue of which the volunteers are armed with a weapon inferior to that entrusted to the regulars are of a kind to ensure disaster if a crisis should ever arise. Furthermore, the difficulty, which has for some time been felt, of procuring a sufficient supply of competent officers points to something very rotten in the constitution of the force.

THE real fact is that no Government has ever really looked upon the Volunteer Service as anything better than a toy; and that such official recognition as it has slowly and painfully attained has been due to the persistence of some of the more energetic of its commanding officers, and to the steadiness with which all ranks have worked in the teeth of the inert obstruction of languid opposition, rather than to any conviction in the minds of politicians that the thing ought to be taken seriously.

THE proposal to erect vast sewage works near Kew hardly seems to have attracted the attention it deserves, probably because the inhabitants of the immediate neighbourhood are not very numerous, but it is undoubtedly one of great importance. As one of its results would be to convert the Thames between Petersham and Kew into a receptacle for a great deal of the sewage of some twenty suburban parishes, the scheme is not altogether uninteresting to the enormous population which occupies both banks of the river for many miles lower down, and it is to be hoped that it will not be carried into execution until the new Metropolitan Council has had an opportunity of carefully considering it.

IN this connection it is interesting to bear in mind, as a correspondent of the Times pointed out the other day, that at this very moment a most expensive contest is being carried on between the Corporation and the Metropolitan Board of Works in respect to the sewage-pollution of the Thames. A stronger argument in favour of establishing one government, and one only, for the whole metropolis could hardly be found.

THIS being (as we are constantly being told by the writers of essays in the magazines and of leaders in the newspapers) a high-pressure age, when the race of competition allows nobody to stop and rest, and when the struggle for bare existence is so severe as to keep everybody continually strained to the highest pitch, it is not surprising that at Easter the country practically made holiday from Thursday night to Tuesday morning.

NOR is it any more surprising that a prodigious sum of money should have been spent (principally by the retail shopkeeping and wage-earning classes) during those four days, when we come to consider—on the authority also of our guides, philosophers, and friends, the essayists and leader-writers—that trade was never so dull, that there never was so little doing, and that there never were so many people either earning nothing at all or only just enough to keep body and soul together as at the present time. It is indeed a difficult matter sometimes to make facts and theories agree.

THE death-roll of men of letters for 1884 threatens to be terribly long, and to include an unusual number of names of more than ordinary brilliancy and interest. The list grew sadly in the first three months of the year, and last week were buried two men unlike in all things except their powers of sustained hard work and the obligation under which they had laid thousands upon thousands of readers and playgoers—Charles Reade and Henry Byron. What rank they will take in that Walhalla which is represented by the opinion of posterity, it would be as presumptuous as it would be vain to attempt to prophesy, but it seems certain that the earnest, eloquent author of "The Cloister and the Hearth," "Christie Johnstone," and "Hard Cash," must have his place among the immortals, and that "Our Boys" will long remain the typical comedy of its time. In each case private sorrow, and a deep sense among numerous friends of personal bereavement, will be as widely felt as the public loss.

ON Boxing Days and Easter Mondays, and on other such occasions, when new pieces are produced and there are many entertainments to be noticed, a great variety of reporters are pressed into the service of the newspapers, and, in the department of dramatic criticism more especially, a good deal is published next day which will reward careful study. One of the best things in this way that I have seen for some time appeared in a daily paper last Easter Tuesday, and was from the pen of a (presumably casual) dramatic critic, who described a scene in the new piece at the Standard as being "petitely presented and discreetly chastened." "Petitely presented" is a choice phrase, though I am not quite sure that it conveys any particular meaning. C. D.

The Trial of Lady Lisle.

IT was at Winchester, in August, 1685, that the detestable Judge Jeffreys began the butchery that King James so much desired with the trial of Dame Alicia Lisle, a venerable and respected woman of more than seventy, the widow of one of Cromwell's lords (one of King Charles's judges, some say), who had been assassinated at Lausanne by the Royalists. She was accused of harbouring John Hickes, a Nonconformist divine, and Richard Nelthorpe, a fugitive lawyer, who had dabbled in the Rye House Plot. The chief witness, a man named Dunne, living at Winchester, deposed that, some days after the battle of Sedgemoor (which was in July), a short, swarthy, dark-haired man sent him to Lady Lisle, at Moyles Court, near Fordingbridge, to know if she could give Hickes shelter. Lady Lisle desired him to come on the following Tuesday; and on the evening of that day he escorted two horsemen, "a full, fat, black man, and a thin black man." A Wiltshire man, whom they paid to show them the way over the plain, betrayed them to Colonel Penruddock, who, early the next morning, discovered Hickes hidden in the malthouse and Nelthorpe in a hole in a chimney. Lady Lisle's defence was that she knew Hickes to be a Nonconformist minister against whom a warrant was issued, but that she did not know he had been with the Duke of Monmouth. As for Nelthorpe, she did not even know his name; she had denied him to the soldiers only from fear, as they were rude and insolent, and were with difficulty restrained from plundering the house. Lady Lisle then avowed that she abhorred the Monmouth plot, and that the day on which King Charles was beheaded she had not gone out of her chamber, and had shed more tears for him than any woman then living, as the late Countess of Monmouth, Lady Marlborough, Lord Chancellor Hyde, and twenty persons of the most eminent quality could bear witness. Moreover, she said, her son had been sent by her to bear arms on the king's side, and it was she who had brought him up to fight for the king. Jeffreys, eager for blood at the first case of treason on the circuit, and seeing the jury waver, roared and bellowed at Dunne, who became too frightened to speak.

"I hope," cried this model judge, "I hope, gentlemen of the jury, you take notice of the strange and horrible carriage of this fellow, and withal, you cannot but observe the spirit of this sort of people, what a villainous and devilish one it is. A Turk is a saint to such a fellow as this; many a Pagan would be ashamed to have no more truth in him. Blessed Jesus, what a generation of vipers! Dost thou believe there is a God? Dost thou believe thou hast a precious and immortal soul? Dost—"

"I cannot tell what to say, my lord," stammered poor tormented Dunne.

Jeffreys: "Good God, was there ever such an impudent rascal! Hold the candle up, that we may see his brazen face."

Dunne: "My lord, I am so baulked that I do not know what to say. Tell me what you would have me say, for I am shattered out of my senses."

Placid Judge: "Why, prithee man, there is nobody baulks thee but thy own self. Thou art asked questions as plain as anything in the world can be; it is only thy own haughty, depraved heart that baulks both thy honesty and understanding, if thou hast any; it is thy studying how to prevaricate that puzzles and confounds thy intellect; but I see all the pain in the world, and all compassion and charity, is lost upon thee, and therefore will say no more to thee."

The jury were long in discussion, and three times brought in Alicia Lisle not guilty, but they succumbed at last to the judge's threats and denunciations, and the poor charitable woman was condemned to be burnt to death on the very next day. The clergy of Winchester Cathedral remonstrated against the cruel haste, and Jeffreys, not wishing to destroy the sociability of his visit, postponed the execution for five days. In the meantime there was great intercession made. But the only mercy James had the heart to show was to commute the sentence from burning to beheading. On the afternoon of September the 2nd she suffered death on a scaffold in the market-place, and underwent her fate with serene courage and Christian resolution. Her last words were forgiveness to all who had done her wrong. In the first year of William and Mary the attainder was reversed, and Lady Lisle's two daughters, Triphena and Bridget, were restored to all their former rights.

A Tale of Mid-Air.

IN a cottage in the Valley of Sallanches, near the foot of Mont Blanc, lived old Bernard and his three sons. One morning he lay in bed, sick and burning with fever, and watched anxiously for the return of his son, Jehan, who had gone to the village to fetch the physician. At length a horse's tread was heard, and the doctor entered. He examined his patient closely, felt his pulse, looked at his tongue, and then said, patting the old man's cheek: "It will be nothing, my friend—nothing!" But he made a sign to the three lads, who, in anxious suspense, stood grouped round the bed. All four withdrew to a distant corner, when the doctor shook his head, looked grave, and said: "'Tis a serious attack—very serious—of fever. The fit is now at its height, and as soon as it abates somewhat, he must have sulphate of quinine."

"What is that, doctor?"

"Quinine, my friend, is a very expensive medicine, but which you may procure at Sallanches. Between the two fits your father must take at least three francs' worth. I will write the prescription. You can read, Guillaume, and you will see that he takes it."

When the physician was gone, the three young men looked at each other in silent perplexity. Their whole stock of money consisted of a franc and a half, and yet the medicine must be procured at once.

"Listen," said Pierre, the eldest, "I know a method of getting from the mountain before night three or four five-franc pieces."

"From the mountain?"

"I have discovered an eagle's nest in a cleft of a frightful precipice. There is a gentleman at Sallanches who would gladly purchase the eaglets; and nothing made me hesitate but the terrible risk of attempting their capture; but that's nothing when our father's life is concerned. We may have them in two or three hours."

"I will take the nest," said Guillaume.

"No, no; let me," said Jehan; "I'm the youngest and lightest."

"I have the best right to venture," said Pierre, "as it was I who discovered the nest; but let us decide by drawing lots. Write three numbers, Guillaume, put them into my hat, and whoever draws number one will try the venture."

Guillaume blackened the end of a wooden splinter in the fire, tore an old card into three pieces, wrote on them one, two, three, and threw them into the hat.

How the three hearts beat! Old Bernard lay shivering in the cold fit, and each of his sons longed to risk his own life to save that of his father.

The lot fell on Pierre, who tenderly embraced the sick man.

"We shall not be long absent, father," he said, "and it is needful that we go together."

"What are you going to do?"

"We will tell you as soon as we come back."

Guillaume took down from the wall an old sabre which had belonged to Bernard when he served as a soldier; Jehan sought the thick cord which the mountaineers use in felling trees; and Pierre went towards an old wooden cross reared near their cottage, and knelt before it for some minutes in fervent prayer.

Then they set out, and soon reached the brink of the precipice. The danger consisted not only in the possibility of falling several hundred feet, but still more in the probability of attack from the formidable birds inhabiting the wild abyss.

Pierre, who had to brave these perils, was a fine, athletic youth of twenty-two. Having measured with his eye the distance he would have to descend, his brothers fastened the rope round his waist, and began to let him down. Holding the sabre in his hand, he safely reached the nook that contained the nest. In it he found four eaglets of a light yellow-brownish colour, and his heart beat for joy at the sight. Grasping the nest firmly in his left hand, he shouted joyfully to his brothers above:

"I have them! Draw me up!"

Already the first upward pull was given, when Pierre felt himself attacked by two enormous eagles, whose furious cries proved them to be the parents of the nestlings.

"Courage, brother! Defend thyself! Don't fear!"

Pierre pressed the nest to his breast, and with his right hand made the sabre play round his head.

Then began a terrible combat. The eagles shrieked, the young ones cried shrilly, the mountaineer shouted and brandished his sword. He slashed the birds with its blade, which flashed like lightning, and only rendered them still more enraged. He struck the rock and sent forth a shower of sparks.

Suddenly he felt a jerk on the cord which sustained him in mid-air. Looking up he perceived that in his evolutions he had cut it with his sabre, and that half the strands were severed.

Pierre's eyes dilated wildly, remained for a moment immovable, and then closed with terror. A cold shudder passed through his veins, and he thought of letting go both nest and sabre.

At that moment one of the eagles pounced down on his head and tried to tear his face. The Savoyard made a last effort, and defended himself bravely. He thought of his old father and took courage.

Upwards, still upwards, mounted the cord, friendly voices eagerly uttered words of encouragement and triumph, but Pierre could not reply. When he at last reached the brink of the precipice, still clasping fast the nest, his hair, which an hour before had been as black as the raven's wing, was become so completely white that his brothers scarcely recognised him.

What did that signify? The eaglets were of the rarest and most valuable species. That same afternoon they were carried to the village and sold. Old Bernard had the medicine, and every needful comfort beside, and the doctor was able in a few days to pronounce him convalescent.

Luncheon for Ladies.

WE have often observed ladies—especially ladies from the country, who are sight-seeing or shopping in and about the town—very hungry and very tired, looking about with wistful eyes for "some-where to lunch." "Is it the correct thing to go in here?" one will say, as she scans the outside of a grand-looking restaurant. "I wonder whether we can get a chop?" says another, and yet more anxiously a third, with a numerous following, to whom the price of a meal is of consequence, "Will it be expensive?" Not caring, however, to make a practical answer to this last question, some more or less unsatisfactory refreshment is snatched at the nearest pastrycook's.

IN order to be useful to ladies who may desire to take luncheon under these circumstances, it is proposed in this paper to give some information about the principal restaurants, the ruling prices, and some general hints on the subject.

IN his "Dictionary of London," the Editor of this Journal says that "ladies without male escort can safely visit any of the great restaurants," and this is confirmed by our own observation. Nevertheless, it is a great comfort to know beforehand that there is a room reserved for ladies—more especially is this a comfort for young ladies—who nowadays move about so much for purposes of study, literary work, business, and so on, and who are thankful for the quiet half-hour of comparative retirement. The very high rate of rents in the City makes every inch of space so valuable that one cannot wonder that the accommodation for ladies—as a rule, the least paying section of guests—is limited and far from satisfactory. This want it is which causes ladies to shrink from taking substantial meals in public rooms, and makes them glad to snatch a bun and wait until they can, at home, eat without an accompanying sense of suffocation. However, to many people it is an immense boon to be able to get, at reasonable prices, a really good hot meal within reach of their business haunts. No doubt in a few more years commercial enterprise will provide for women, as for men, more suitable rooms, and a greater degree of privacy than is at present the case.

FIRST upon our list must be placed the Holborn Restaurant, which, for its splendour, is unrivalled. It is true that luxurious surroundings are not necessary to a frugal meal, but when one gets them "into the bargain," they may be thankfully accepted. This truly palatial restaurant is conveniently situated for ladies visiting the British Museum, and is within easy reach of Oxford Street also. No one sight-seeing in London should miss seeing the Holborn Restaurant, and it is well worth the price of a luncheon, merely to see the taste and magnificence with which the place is fitted up. From the spacious and lofty vestibule, with its double flight of marble staircases and marble-lined walls, the visitor passes to the Grand Salon, through a doorway of statuary marble of rich Renaissance style. In the salon the tables are laid in the most faultless manner, with very beautiful glass and silver of perfect brilliancy; and no time is lost by the attendants in caring for the wants of the guests. For ladies unaccompanied by gentlemen the balcony of the Grand Salon will be found the most private and comfortable, and it may be stated that the tariff is the same in all parts of the house, and is as low as that of many very second-rate houses. For instance, a mutton chop is served for ninepence, a plate of roast beef for tenpence, a steak for a shilling. Those who desire it can choose from a large bill of fare a number of dishes of all kinds, at prices equally moderate with those quoted above; and there is always a variety of sweet dishes at from fourpence to sixpence each. The greatest care is taken in choice of provisions at the Holborn Restaurant. Everything is of the highest quality, and perfectly well cooked. The ladies' cloak and toilette rooms are on the left of the entrance to the Grand Salon, and are fitted up in so elegant and luxurious a manner as to afford a study in the art of furnishing.

THE excellence of Messrs. Spiers and Pond's luncheons and dinners is well known. At their Holborn Viaduct, as well as their other restaurants, the service is admirable. Everything on the table is faultlessly clean and bright, and you are provided with a serviette. A lady can perfectly well lunch here; still, you only see a few of the more staid and elderly enter at the busy time. You can, in dining-rooms, have a chop, with potatoes and bread, at a shilling. For a dinner of fish, or from the joint, with vegetables, cheese, and salad, the charge is two shillings. For this sum you have as much as you like to ask for, with all the usual accompaniments—for instance, with roast beef, Yorkshire pudding, delicious cheese, butter, and whatever salad is in season.

AN excellent place for ladies visiting the Cathedral, or shopping near to it, is the Cyprus Restaurant, 1 and 2, Cheapside. It is well for ladies to enter at the door nearest St. Paul's Churchyard, particularly at the busy hours, as thus they have no need to pass through the crowded refreshment-bar, but can go straight upstairs to a room for ladies. Gentlemen accompanied by ladies are admitted to this room, for, as the attendant remarked, "Husband and wife don't like to be separated." At the Cyprus you get a most excellent luncheon at a very moderate charge. The plate of meat from the joint, with vegetable and bread, for thirteen-pence, is all that can be desired, and more than a person of good appetite can eat. There is usually a choice at this price of five or six joints. A large plate of fish is supplied from ninepence to a shilling, and good soup at fourpence the basin. A number of nice light puddings are to be had at equally low charges. No alcoholic drinks are supplied here. The attendants in the ladies' room are young women, clever, quick, and attentive, and yet, as the bill says, there are no gratuities to waiters.

NEXT on our line of route we come to the People's Café, 61, St. Paul's Churchyard. Here a room is reserved for ladies only—we confess with shame that we don't know where the husbands are stowed away. The prices at this café are pretty much the same as those quoted above, and there is usually a choice here of three or four joints, and the Scotch broth at fourpence the basin is good. A fair-sized cup of what is known by the name of coffee, with unlimited milk, is supplied here at twopence. The young women attendants are attentive, and expect no gratuity.

PASSING out of St. Paul's Churchyard, and by the ancient book-selling establishment of Messrs. Griffith and Farran, and keeping a little way down on the same side of Ludgate Hill, we come to Brown's Refreshment Rooms, 16, Ludgate Hill. The accommodation for ladies is not all that could be wished, but the eatables are exceedingly good. Besides a variety of nice cold provisions, there is the usual choice of soup, fish, grill, entrée, or joint. Of this last we had an excellent plate at tenpence, with two vegetables at fourpence. It is with no small pleasure that we chronicle a good cup of coffee at the moderate charge of threepence.

WE now cross the road to "Wolff's Konditorei," 55, Ludgate Hill. Here is pretty much the usual pastrycook's room, which ladies and gentlemen use in common. Joints are not served here, but the entrées from a shilling to fifteenpence are good. A mutton chop without vegetables is charged tenpence.

As we have already spoken of the general excellence of the arrangements and provisions at all Messrs. Spiers and Pond's restaurants, it will be unnecessary to do more than remark that at Ludgate Station ladies can lunch either in the dining-room, or on light refreshments at the bar on the other side of the station, where sixpence is charged for a cup of coffee of the average quality.

PASSING down the Strand, and immediately opposite the Royal Courts of Justice, we come to the Palsgrave. This is a handsomely fitted up restaurant, with every comfort, the table-service being exquisitely clean, and in no way inferior to that of a well-ordered private house. The tariff is as moderate as that of the other houses we have mentioned, and the provisions of the first quality.

At Brettini's, immediately opposite Exeter Hall, where there is a quiet dining-room, ladies can obtain dishes nicely cooked in the French style, and the prices are exceedingly moderate.

THE restaurant of the Grand Hotel, Charing Cross, the luncheon-room of which is situated below-stairs, leaves nothing to be desired. Here you have every comfort, and a choice of good dishes from a shilling upwards. This is a particularly useful house for ladies visiting the National Gallery, and is within easy reach of many of the West End exhibitions and shops. Farther west again are the Criterion and St. James's Hall, both excellent for luncheon purposes, while at Nicols's Café Royal, opposite St. James's Hall in Regent Street, the best of everything can be obtained at fairly reasonable rates. Ladies should go to the upstairs room, as smoking is permitted on the ground-floor. Verrey's, at the corner of Regent Street and Hanover Street, is all that can be desired except, perhaps, in respect of price.

A Proposal in a Street Car.

THE bleak and uninviting interior of a street car, with the thermometer twenty degrees below freezing-point, was the scene of a proposal of marriage. The hour was half-past nine; the car one of the amber-hued chariots of the Thirteenth and Fifteenth Streets line, Philadelphia, and the interested parties a pretty girl of about nineteen summers, with dark eyes and rosy cheeks, and a young man of two or three and twenty.

"Are you cold, Amelia?" came in gentle tones across the car.

"Yes, Charley," was the half-whispered reply. And Charley snuggled up close and took Amelia's hand in his.

He then glanced at her in a loving way, looked across at the reporter, who was apparently asleep, noticed that the conductor was entirely occupied in keeping his feet warm, and, after giving one or two coughs, said with a smile:

"Do you recollect what I told you the first time I met you, Amelia?"

"No, Charley. What?"

"Why, that I had never been in love, and that it would be a cold day when I'd ask a girl to marry me."

"Oh yes, but why do you ask?"

"Well, this is a very cold day, Amelia, isn't it?"

"Yes, Charley; but why?" and she blushed as she glanced up at him, and his face drew nearer hers.

"Well, will you?"

There was silence for a moment but for the jingle, jingle of the bells and the shuffling of the conductor's feet upon the icy platform. Then she slipped her hand into his, blushed even rosier than before, and whispered, "Yes."

"Bless you, my children," exclaimed the delighted reporter; and as the lovers half started up, abashed at the unexpected discovery of their secret, the scribe shot out of the doorway and hurried away.

Fashions.

THE recent Court mourning, occurring so unexpectedly, altered all the arrangements made previously for the coming season by the dress-makers and milliners. The pretty dresses which were ready for Easter had to be kept until the sombre garments were laid aside, and now the weather allows of much lighter clothing, less muffling than was intended when the dresses were planned. The end of the Court mourning is a relief to the eye. Good feeling induced ladies, who could not afford new dresses, to appear heroically in black costumes which had known better days, and nothing looks worse than half-worn, dingy mourning, made up of many shades of black. The best feature was the second stage, with the beautiful shades of grey in soft woollen textures, which with bright colours can now be worn for the rest of the year.

THE term grey, as descriptive of a colour, is of very wide significance. Like the Smith family in England, it has many branches, and the relationships between each are difficult to trace. Slate, dust, lavender, dove, pearl, French, are all legitimate varieties. Then we come to the greys of secondary character, those in which other hues are blended. London smoke is a grey into which a suspicion of green enters. Another grey receives red and glides into violet, with mauves, and peach-blossoms, as colours by evolution. Another grey takes blue and becomes electric-blue, so that when fashion proclaims grey to be the colour of the day, we know not where it will land us. We know what it is, but we do not know what it will bring us eventually.

THE unexpected always happens, says a great authority, and this is exemplified in the blending of different greys in the same dress: smoke-grey, lavender-grey, and dust-grey, a mixture which, even a few months ago, would have driven an artistic person into idiocy; or pearl-grey, French-grey, and stone-grey, a more reckless mixture still, as these are all cold colours, very flat in tone. There was the same outcry a few years ago, when blue and green were worn together, it being considered that all the canons of art were outraged by placing these colours in close affinity. But the human eye is wonderfully docile to training, and if but opportunities are afforded of seeing any startling novelty frequently enough, it soon becomes accepted as a matter of course.

In the making of dresses we have as yet only modifications of old styles, nothing altogether original or striking. The skirts are still pleated, but less formally than last year; one broad fold, with several small between, or large box-quills with a plain part between each, and on this space ornament is placed, embroidery or braiding, not on the large quill as last year. The knife-pleated skirts have scarcely answered the anticipations of those who patronised them. Damp affects the regularity of the folds, and in order to make them remain in good order without a tape sewed at the back, the pleating is done with so sharp a machine, that only a very good material will bear the treatment. Silk and satin cut very easily; so do nun's veiling and the other cheaper textiles.

THE tendency of drapery is to return to depth and fulness, long tunics arranged in a series of graceful folds, like the robes on a classical figure. The tunic with one point in front, worn a little to one side, is draped very high up, being left plain at the side-seams for about half a yard from the hem. The puffings at the back are no longer absolutely necessary, as by the new arrangement the back is draped at the side-seams only. The treachery of the arrangement of puffs in drapery being tacked here and there to the lining, every lady has experienced more or less. To struggle through a crowd, or subject a skirt to any strain, but too often tore out the puffs, if the sewing were good, bringing a piece of the stuff with it, and if it were weak, the threads snapping in every direction.

THE modern tunic is made as before, in two parts, back and front; the front may be plain or pointed, the back quite plain. It is possible to join the side-seams and pleat up the tunic afterwards, but such skill is required for this that it is better to arrange the folds and then sew the seams. The tunic requires to be cut very long—twice the length it is to assume when finished—to allow of the folds being ample and flowing easily. The back is cut quite straight, and is neither more nor less than some long plain breadths; when sewed together, about one yard and three-quarters to two yards wide. As described for the front, half a yard from the hem is left plain, and from that to the waist pleated in large folds, turning upwards, making the waving lines from side to side describe an imperfect half oval. The arrangement of some tunics in front is on the same principle as muslin curtains are now draped on windows. Instead of the two lengths being hung up so as to meet in the centre at the top of the window, they are made to lap over, one on top of the other. When caught back about halfway down, they make a double festoon, which is graceful and yet leaves the window quite free from screening. The two fronts of the tunic are laid on over each other and caught back. The skirt for this design is generally of rich brocade or velvet, either frilled round the bottom, or out out in battlements and frills showing below, sewed on an underskirt.

CHENILLE spots on all kinds of woollen materials are fashionable; wafers, stars, leaves, squares, diamonds, being thrown up, and plain materials to mix with the spotted can always be had from the same manufacturer. For the plain fronts of skirts the machine-embroidered flowers for sewing on as appliqué are very much used for evening and dinner dresses.

SHOT-SILK is more obtrusive than any other in mantles and dresses, but always with some other material, for alone it would be very trying. Mantles and dress-skirts are slashed, some at the sides, the latter at the back, silk in a series of small folds showing below. The silk is also used for facings, collars, cuffs, full vest, etc.

THE dress bodices made last year with the very long coat-tails behind, which reached to the hem of the dress, had one great fault in being too narrow, and looking rather too much like a string. As the tails of this year are broader, and slope gradually from the seam under the arm, last year's bodices will require some remodelling. By opening the back seam quite up to the waist, and laying a folded back underneath, pleats turned towards the centre, a very modern effect can be given to an old dress. If the tails had been cut apart from the bodice, and added on, moving them round, about an inch each side towards the front, is another improvement. Bodices have still vest fronts, and there seems to be no limit to invention in making a variety of waist-coats. During the recent complimentary State mourning very pretty demi-toilette bodices were made by having a vest for morning wear separate from the bodice, worn underneath it, and thick silk cords buttoning across on gimp barrels. For evening wear white muslin in folds was substituted as a vest. With black velvet, grey silk gauze made a dressy habit-shirt. Stockingette bodices show still more improvements each season. The addition of a well-cut basque is one of the happiest steps in advance. Black stockingette powdered with jet, with garnet, with gold, or with silver dots, removes the bodice from all suspicion of being a mere jersey for economical use, and elevates it to the position of best dress bodice.

IN mantles, the dolman shape, with long ends in front and very short behind, tied in at the waist, will soon be too warm for walking out in. The little circular capes with high shoulders have the addition of long ends in front, rather wider than what are known as stole ends; while the back, shaped in to fit the figure, is carried down for about six inches below the waist, and finished with bows of ribbon and lace trimming. Chenille fringes are still in favour for mantles, long and thick. The newest have little gold balls at the end of each caterpillar. This fringe is usually added in order to suit a bonnet of gold-spangled net with lace-edged strings to match, and a row of gilt beads round the rim. The tulle fall would also be gold-powdered. The horse-shoe round crown, cut out to show the hair, still grows in favour.

PARASOLS are in endless variety, and the brilliant colours in which sateen is made bring sunshades to match summer dresses within the reach of girls with limited dress allowances. Bright red sateens, covered with black lace, are very effective, the cover being a circular, put on over the top, bordered with lace, and tacked at the tips to the red foundation. Red silk or sateen, with a large rosette of black lace on each division, and a bow and long ends of satin ribbon from the top, the ribbon being reversible, black and red, is very stylish. Ladies who have lace sufficient to make rosettes can buy, for about half-a-crown, a very good sateen sunshade, and trim it at home; but about a yard and a half of lace is absolutely required for each rosette, as they must be large enough to stretch from rib to rib. Mushroom-coloured parasols are similarly trimmed, and are more useful than red, as they match every dress. Black lace is a very sober trimming; red lace, red lining, red bows of ribbon, give a mushroom-coloured parasol a very gay and stylish appearance.

VELVET throatlets are ornamented in every possible manner, from diamond stars worn by great ladies, down to humble little buttons of quaint designs brought from the depths of some old lady's workbox. Fancy waistcoat-buttons, coral, pearl, silver, etc., the survivors of the day when men indulged in fancy vests, rarely number more than six, too few for a dress-front, but quite enough for a velvet throatlet. Black velvet is again tied in a bow behind, but these old buttons look better with antique snaps to match.

How to Sing Duets.

IF we have been much in the habit of going to musical evenings it is not unlikely that we have come to consider the vocal duet as about the most terrible of all the arrows that lurk within the quiver of the amateur.

WHEN a duet is badly sung, how very bad it is! No time, no sense of harmony, both the performers singing as if their object were to drown their companion's voice, a timid solo coming somewhere in the middle, sung as though the singer were quite overcome at the thought of her own temerity; a final reunion of voices towards the end, with a tremendous pause on the penultimate note which results in one singer losing breath before the other, and coming in unevenly at the commencement of the next bar, as if she had been running a race which she had just succeeded in winning by a neck. When this sorry performance has come to an end, the listener is apt to be slightly at a loss for words in which to express his sensations; if the duettists are sisters, he will do well to confine himself to the general statement that "sister's voices always go so well together"—a wise and not too compromising speech which is always accepted as a tribute of praise. Sometimes it is a young lady and young gentleman who sing together, and then you may well close your eyes in agony and prepare for the very worst. She has a shrill and slightly nasal soprano, he has a sentimental air, and a gusty tenor—you know it as well as if you had been told it, your prophetic gaze can penetrate through the Russia-leather music-case—you know it as well as if you saw it written in red letters on the wall—they are going to sing Mendelssohn's "I Would That My Love."

POOR Mendelssohn! What sin had you committed during your blameless life that this one song should have been selected out of all your writings as the special prey of the amateur? It is not the most beautiful, there are many others as fine; it is not the most easy, in point of fact its long phrases demand a peculiarly fine style of singing; yet something there is about it which is fatally attractive to bad singers; and beautiful as it is in itself, the fiat has gone forth that no musician may enjoy it evermore, because its chords bring memories of suffering.

THE odd point about it, to a musician, is the curious clinging to old and hackneyed songs on the part of the amateur. There are many good duets that are little known. Why not try them, instead of dragging out that ancient battle-horse again and again? And as good duet-singing is only to be attained by constant practice, there is every reason why duet singers should be constantly reading new things together. Some voices are very hard to sing with, but some seem to have the art of blending easily with others. A sympathetic voice is the great secret of duet-singing, and the power of self-suppression when the occasion demands it.

IT is all very well to make fun of amateur duet-singing, but when it is done artistically it is by no means to be despised. It is delicious to listen to the harmonies when two sympathetic voices are wedded together in a union as perfect as that of the flower and the leaf, when the deep tones show through the lighter ones like a rich-coloured lining to a silvery dress, when one sentiment guides the two singers. Singing like this is truly a musical treat, and makes a pleasant change in an evening, and a relief from hearing one solo after another.

IT is also very good for singers to practise duets, as it is always cheerful work to do any kind of music in company, and it is a great assistance to the cultivation of a feeling for time. The one who sings second should remember it is her place to be always subordinate to the first; no singing can be artistic when the second is trying to overpower the melody. Then when the soprano ceases for a bar or two the contralto must strike in firmly, coming in exactly on the beat; she cannot sing too strongly then, as she has to take the melody.

As crispness, lightness, and accurate time are some of the greatest beauties of duet-singing, it is important that each of the performers should know her part perfectly. A great deal of solitary practice is necessary before any perfection can be attained; each singer should know her part so well that she can render it almost mechanically, and be able to devote the greater part of her attention to what the other singer is doing. Finish is the great beauty of duet-singing. Nothing is uglier than roughness in a duet, and it is difficult to avoid it when both singers are almost reading from sight. They may make very praiseworthy efforts at keeping in time, but produce an effect like that of a scramble.

AFTER the parts have been studied separately, there must be an immense amount of practice together. The principal reason why sisters generally sing so well together is that they have the opportunity of so much practice. They sing together so often that their voices get to sound like one, and then, indeed, is duet-singing beautiful to listen to, even though, separately, the voices might not be fine.

ONE very common fault in duet-singing is a tendency to drag. If amateurs had their own way they would take everything too slow. This fault is particularly ugly in duet-singing. Mendelssohn's music is peculiarly susceptible of being spoiled by this treatment. Over-emphasis is fatal to it. "The May-bells and the Flowers" cannot be made too quick and light, yet how often we hear it sung in a ponderous manner. "I Would That My Love" is nearly always taken so slow and pathetically that it seems natural to conclude that the singers have never looked at the time-mark, which is actually "allegretto con moto." Mendelssohn himself is said to have played the accompaniment like lightning. Duet-singers should be particularly careful to avoid slowness, and should not hesitate to tell each other if they perceive any tendency to slackening.

A GREAT point in the effect is that the voices should be equally balanced, and sufficiently alike in quality. Nothing is uglier than to hear a heavy contralto coupled with a feeble soprano, or a soprano so powerful that it completely drowns the inner part. It is surprising how easy some voices are to sing with in comparison with others. Some are so sympathetic, and so true to time, that, however softly they may sing, they give you a kind of support; others, again, are unresponsive and heavy, so that it is like being tied to a log. But, once you get the voice that suits you, there is no end to the advancement you may make, particularly if you not only learn plenty of fresh music, but get it up with great care and finish.

DUETS for tenor and soprano sound very well. "Oh, That We Two Were Maying," by Mrs. Meadows White, is a charming specimen of this kind of writing. Its great beauty lies in its apparent carelessness. It is extremely graceful, and the voices dovetail over one another in a particularly charming way. Sir Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen" affords another example of the way in which these two voices can be combined. There is something particularly harmonious about duets for two equal female voices. Rubinstein's duets are wonderful, refined, and beautiful, and can hardly fail to give pleasure both to the listeners and the singers. "Der Engel" is one of the loveliest of the set. Mendelssohn's part-songs have been so frightfully hackneyed that one is afraid to mention them, still they are such excellent practice that it is well to learn them in private, though one would not choose the better-known ones to sing in company. Kücken and Keller have written many fine duets, and amongst modern music we often come upon charmingly-written duets, such as "Si t'adore," by Schira, for soprano and baritone; and "My True Love Has My Heart," for two equal voices, by Théo Marzials. Many of the operas afford delightful duets for various voices, and it is both pleasant and instructive to hunt through them for suitable pieces, as when one is looking for one particular thing, one often comes on many an unsuspected beauty by the way.

Household Gardening.

GARDENS in which fruit-trees are grown and orchards are now in great beauty by the wealth of charming blossoms with which the trees are clothed. There are few, if any, flowers more delicately beautiful than those of Pears and Apples, the former being blush-white, and now fading, the latter lovely pink, varying in shade and just expanding. For this spring beauty alone these trees are worth growing in the form of bushes or pyramids, for they are at least as ornamental and attractive as any other shrubs; yet those who plant fruit-trees naturally look for something more than blossom—fruit. It depends entirely on the weather whether they can have it or not—at least, in the case of large trees in the open; small bushes, also trees on walls, can be usefully protected from spring frosts, that are often so ruinous, by covering them with blinds, netting, or the branches of evergreens; and a choice Pear, Peach, Nectarine, or Apricot tree, laden with blossom or embryo fruit, is well worthy of the attention that is bestowed on it in the manner indicated. The young fruits that have set are quite as liable to injury as the blossoms, and can never be considered safe until they are protected by the expanding foliage towards the middle of May. It will be well, therefore, at the present time, to give a little thoughtful attention to cherished fruit-trees.

FASHIONABLE FLOWERS.

Only a very few years ago flowers, as a rule, were but little admired unless they were double, and florists were ever striving to raise new varieties with a multiplicity of petals. Single Dahlias were spurned as worthless, single Primroses and Polyanthus regarded as common, and even single Pansies were not considered good enough for the taste of the time; but all is changed, and single forms are in the ascendant.

PRIMROSES.

For some days past the "Pale Primrose" has been the most fashionable flower, and lanes and copses have almost been denuded of the pretty wilding to meet the great demand for bunches in cities and towns. It is really a charming flower, and is now largely grown in gardens and window-boxes. The plants transplant well, even when in flower, but those who wish to establish a stock should divide the plants immediately after flowering and plant them in good soil in a rather moist and shaded place.

PRIMROSES FROM SEED.

The quickest and cheapest method of raising a number of plants of various colours, also of Polyanthus, is by sowing seed, which can be had from seedsmen and florists, for sixpence or a shilling a packet, according to the quality of the flowers it was saved from, and the number of seeds in a packet.

Those who are tempted to purchase what are offered as "cheap" seeds, may be certain that they are inferior either in germinating power or the quality of the flowers from which they were saved.

As scarcely anything is more annoying than to grow plants for a year, and when they produce flowers to find them worthless, it is strongly advised that such so-called "bargains" be avoided, and that seed be obtained from a firm of repute, which cannot afford to do otherwise than to sell a good article at a fair price.

Artificial heat is not needed for raising Primroses from seed, which grow quite well in the open ground, though sown in boxes filled to within an inch of the top with light, yet rich sandy soil, and a sheet of glass laid over the box, germination is more certain, always provided the soil be kept constantly moist.

Whether sowed in borders or boxes, the position should be shaded, as if the sun is allowed to parch the soil occasionally, healthy seedlings cannot be expected. The seed should be sown thinly, and covered about a quarter of an inch deep with sandy soil.

If pots or boxes are used, they may be stood either in a cool frame or on the north side of a wall, as they will be far better out of doors than in a warm and dry greenhouse.

Plants raised now and grown well will flower next spring. Double kinds cannot be raised from seed, but only by dividing the plants and planting offsets with roots attached, keeping them damp and shaded till established.

DAFFODILS.

The bright and cheerful spring flowers, which "come before the swallow dares," were never so fashionable as now, and the singles are the favourites.

So great has the demand for single Daffodils become, that they are grown by the acre, especially in the Channel Islands, and the flowers are sent to London by the truck-load.

The varieties are very numerous and diversified in character, some being only an inch or two high, with flowers half an inch in diameter, while others are at the least six times the size and undeniably imposing.

Autumn is the time for planting Daffodils or Narcissus, and many were planted and potted as advised at the time. We have only to say now that those that were planted should remain undisturbed, and on no account must the leaves be cut off before they are withered.

Plants that have flowered in pots should, after removing the faded flower-stems, be planted out in positions where they can remain undisturbed to grow and flower year after year, and they should be watered, and shaded if needed to keep the foliage fresh as long as possible. This is a point of the first importance in strengthening the bulbs for another year.

By adopting the practice referred to, of buying a few bulbs every year and flowering the plants in pots, then planting them, a quantity of Daffodils can soon be established in gardens.

WHITE AND YELLOW MARGUERITES.

These extremely pretty white and yellow flowers rank amongst the most fashionable of window and greenhouse plants, and they also succeed well planted in the open air during the summer.

The flowers are flat and round, varying in size from one to two inches in diameter, and are composed of a number of ray florets, arranged similarly to those of the common Daisy.

Although round, they have somewhat of a star-like appearance; indeed, the yellow variety is named by the French growers who raised it, Etoile d'Or (Golden Star).

The plants are raised from cuttings inserted now in a moist, warm frame, and speedily commence flowering. Those who have not a heated frame at command can purchase small plants for a few pence each from florists, and they only need potting in ordinarily fertile garden soil, using four or five inch pots, and placing in a greenhouse or light window to grow and flower freely.

The plants are attractive in summer, grown either in flower-beds or window-boxes, and the flowers are in great demand for furnishing vases for the adornment of rooms.

SINGLE CHRYSANTHEMUMS.

For producing a grand display of colour in the autumn, the magnificent double Chrysanthemums are familiar to all; but during the past two years a new race with perfectly single flowers has been produced, and the varieties have created a small sensation in the floral world.

The flowers of this "new departure" type, as it is called, are perfectly single, like Cinerarias, and are both novel and attractive. To several of the varieties of star-like appearance names have been attached—some of them in honour of "stars" in the theatrical world. For instance we have Gus Harris, a rosy-lilac flower, described as "quite a gem," a designation which it is hoped the great man of Drury Lane will not disclaim; Henry Irving, silvery rose, and "very desirable;" Miss Ellen Terry, bright magenta, "one of the finest;" Mrs. Langtry, silvery blush, "a decided acquisition;" and Mr. Toole, clear yellow, "very free." It should be observed, however, that plants of these are four or five shillings each, but this, after all, is far below the price of a box at the theatre. Single Chrysanthemums are also raised from seed, and they will almost certainly become popular.

DAHLIAS.

Single Dahlias are raised from seed as easily and readily as Balsams are raised, but artificial heat is requisite, such as a frame on a bed of leaves and manure. Those who have not such convenience, and yet covet a few plants of these very fashionable and brilliant flowers, should purchase them about the middle of May. They are no longer expensive, except the new varieties, several that are almost equally good being obtainable for a shilling each.

Double Dahlias, than which there are no flowers more magnificent both in form and colour, must also be purchased, except by those who have roots, which should now be divided, potted, and placed in a frame or greenhouse for starting them into growth, and preparing for planting out towards the end of May.

Those who have Dahlias in a dry state, but no frame or other glass structure, may plant the roots in the garden during the first week in May, covering them about three inches deep. The growths will then appear in June, when they will be safe from frost, and the plants will flower freely towards the end of summer.

Odds and Ends.

DAVID, a Yorkshire musician, was one day returning home through a pasture in which there was a bull, who, seeing David with his red bag, made at him, bellowing loudly, with evident hostile intentions. The musician did not fly; it would have been undignified, and the bass viol that he carried might be injured by a precipitate retreat over the hedge. The bull came on with lowered horns. "Steady!" soliloquised the musician. "I reckon that was double B na'ral." Again the bull bellowed. "I am pretty sure it were B," said David again; "but I'll mak' sure;" and opening the bag he took out the bass viol, and drawing the bow across the string, he produced a sound as full of volume and of the same pitch as the tone of the angry beast. "I thowt I were reet," said David with a grim smile. At the sound of the bass viol the bull stood still, raised his head, and looked at the strange object before him. David thought it a pity to bag his violin without a tune, and began the violoncello part in one of Handel's choruses. It was too much for the bull; he turned tail.

THE son of a Pomeranian squire had been sent to finish his education in Breslau. He had not heard from his native village for a long time, when one day young Mat, the servant-man at the hall, made his appearance, and the following conversation ensued. Yonker (young squire): "Eh, good morning, Mat. Well, what news from home?" Mat: "Oh, nothing particular, except that the old crow is dead that used to hop about the house." Y: "That isn't much, certainly. What did he die of?" M: "Of eating too much horse-meat when the four carriage-horses died." Y: "The splendid team! How did they come to grief?" M: "With drawing water." Y: "But they had only the carriage to draw." M: "Nay, they drew the fire-engine once." Y: "On what occasion?" M: "When the hall was burnt down." Y: "What! is our house burnt down? How did it happen?" M: "It was set on fire by the wax tapers which were burning in your room after your mother's death."

IN his amusing "Recollections and Reflections," Mr. J. R. Planché, speaking of the great basso of times gone by at Her Majesty's Theatre, says: "Apropos of Lablache, it was after dinner at Gore House that I witnessed his extraordinary representation of a thunderstorm simply by facial expression. The gloom that gradually overspread his countenance appeared to deepen into actual darkness, and the terrific frown indicated the angry lowering of the tempest. The lightning commenced by winks of the eyes and twitchings of the muscles of the face, succeeded by rapid side-long movements of the mouth, which wonderfully recalled to you the forked flashes that seemed to rend the sky, the notion of thunder being conveyed by the shaking of his head. By degrees the lightning became less vivid, the frown relaxed, the gloom departed, and a broad smile illuminating his expansive face assured you that the sun had broken through the clouds, and the storm was over."

"COOKING," says Mr. Ruskin, "means the knowledge of all herbs, and fruits, and balms, and spices, and of all that is healing and sweet in fields and groves, and savoury in meats; it means carefulness, and inventiveness, and watchfulness, and willingness, and readiness of appliance; it means the economy of your great grandmothers, and the science of modern chemists; it means much tasting and no wasting; it means English thoroughness, and French art, and Arabian hospitality; and it means, in fine, that you are to be perfectly and always 'ladies'—'loaf-givers'; and, as you are to see, imperatively, that everybody has something pretty to put on, so you are to see, yet more imperatively, that everybody has something nice to eat."

THE late Dr. Macadam used to tell of a tipsy Scotchman making his way home upon a bright Sunday morning, when the good folk were wending their way to the kirk. A little dog pulled a ribbon from the hand of a lady who was leading it, and as it ran away from her, she appealed to the first passer-by, who happened to be the inebriate, asking him to whistle for her poodle. "Woman!" he retorted, with that solemnity of visage which only a Scotchman can assume, "woman, this is no day for whustlin'."

AT some religious ceremony at which Archbishop Whateley was to officiate in the country, a young curate who attended him grew very nervous at their being late. "My good young friend," said the archbishop, "I can only say to you what the criminal going to be hanged said to those around, who were hurrying him: 'Let us take our time; they can't begin without us.'"

HARRY and Charlie, aged five and three respectively, have just been seated at the nursery table for dinner. Harry sees that there is but one orange on the table, and immediately sets up a wailing that brings his mother on the scene. "Why, Harry, what are you crying for?" she asks. "Because there ain't any orange for Charlie."

WHEN President Arthur was a very small boy, his mother reprimanded him one day for some misdemeanour. Not knowing it, his father began to talk to him on the same subject. Looking up in his face, Arthur said solemnly: "My mother has tended to me."

THE philosopher Zeno believed in an inevitable destiny. His servant availed himself of the doctrine while being beaten for a theft, by exclaiming: "Was I not destined to rob?" "Yes," replied Zeno, "and to be corrected also."

ASKED if he did not think a certain friend followed his conscience, an eminent and witty prelate replied: "Yes; I think he follows it as a man does a horse in a gig—he drives it first."

THE best mathematics.—That which doubles the most joys and divides the most sorrows.

THE best navigation.—Steering clear of the lacerating rocks of personal contention.

THE best diplomacy.—Effecting a treaty of peace with one's own conscience.

THE best biography.—The life which writes charity in the largest letters.

THE best engineering.—Building a bridge of faith over the river of death.

ONE ought to remember kindnesses received and forget those he has done.

"WHEN I was a boy," said an old man, "we had a schoolmaster who had an odd way of catching the idle boys. One day he called out to us: 'Boys, I must have closer attention to your books. Let the first one that sees another idle inform me of the fact and I will attend to the case.' 'Ah,' thought I to myself, 'there is Joe Simmons that I don't like. I'll watch him, and if I see him look off his book, I'll tell.' It was not long before I saw Joe look off his book, and immediately I informed the master. 'Indeed,' said he, 'how did you know he was idle?' 'I saw him,' said I. 'You did? And were your eyes on your book when you saw him.' I was caught, and I never watched for idle boys again. If we are sufficiently watchful over our own conduct, we shall have no time to find fault with the conduct of others."

A STORY is told of a provincial theatre in Ireland where Macready was personating Virgilius. In preparing for the scene in which the body of Dentatus is brought on the stage, the manager called to the Irish attendant—his property-man—for the bier. Pat responded to the call at once, and soon returned with a foaming pot of ale, but was received with a string of anathemas for his stupidity. "The bier, you blockhead!" thundered the manager. "And sure isn't it here?" exclaimed Pat, presenting the highly polished quart measure. "Not that, you stupid fellow! I mean the barrow for Dentatus." "Then why don't you call things by their right name?" said Pat. "Who would imagine for a moment you meant the barrow when you called for beer?"

A DRAPER'S assistant in London, who was in the habit, with his master's cognisance, of attending a workmen's Socialistic meeting, neglected for a week or two to attend the meetings, and the following dialogue took place between master and man. Master: "Well, John, and how is it that you have not kept up your attendance at the Socialistic meetings?" John (rather confusedly): "Well, sir, I don't think I shall go any more." Master: "But how is that, John?" John: "I have found out, sir, that the scheme is not quite so fair as I thought it was. At the last meeting I attended we calculated how much there would be for every one when everything was divided up, and we found it would only be £105 each, and you know, sir, I have £150 in the bank."

A MEMBER of the Zoological Society says: "I once had a cat who always sat up to the dinner-table with me, and had his napkin round his neck, and his plate and some fish. He used his paw, of course, but he was very particular, and behaved with extraordinary decorum. When he had finished his fish I sometimes gave him a piece of mine. One day he was not to be found when the dinner-bell rang, so we commenced without him. Just as the plates were put round for the entrée, puss came rushing upstairs and sprang into his chair, with two mice in his mouth. Before he could be stopped he dropped a mouse on to his own plate, and then one on to mine. He divided his dinner with me, as I had divided mine with him."

A GENTLEMAN, who has been diverted by the fun extracted from the names in the Clergy List, has compiled Ye Medical Directory. For instance, under the head of "Beverages," one finds doctors named "Beer, Porter, Perry, Mead, Port, and a Pickup Tipple, besides Cream," while under "The Human Frame," there are "A Body, five Heads with Hair, one Brain, and two Beards, but only one Legg and one Foot with Corns, two Hands and Palms, a Tooth, a Bone, and two Joynts."

A QUAKER was negotiating with an insurance company as to effecting a policy on a vessel overdue. At this juncture he heard of the vessel's loss, and wrote at once to the company. "Friend, if thee hasn't filled up the policy, thee needn't, for I've heard of the ship." "Oh," said the officer, "cunning fellow, he wants to do us out of the premium." So they wrote the Quaker: "Thou art too late by half an hour—thy policy is filled up."

WHEN Samuel Lover was out with a tourist party off the Welsh coast, the band on board struck up the lively air, "Rory O'More," and when one of their number came round with the cap, the musician, on the strength of having done so, asked Lover for something to drink his health with. "Bedad," said Lover, "that's square, anyhow, to make a man pay for hearin' his own music!" and good-naturedly gave him half-a-crown.

A DISTINGUISHED foreign diplomatist, a very genial and social being, soon after his arrival in London, made the round of the sights, Madame Tussaud's among the number. "And what do you think of our wax-works?" said a friend. "Well," replied the general, "it strikes me as being very like an ordinary English party."

THE Police Commissioners of Broughton Ferry, near Dundee, have been compelling house-proprietors to lay down concrete on the foot-path in front of their properties. An old lady residing in a cottage, proudly told a friend the other day that the front of her house had been "consecrated up to the vera door-step."

AN American court has decided that marriage contracts made on a Sunday are valid, on the ground that they come under the head of "works of necessity and charity."

A GREAT philosopher says: "In the economy of nature nothing is lost. The inside of an orange may refresh one man, while the outside of the same fruit may serve as a medium for breaking another man's leg."

"I WISH you'd let me go to the city with you," said a young wife to her financial husband; "I should so like just for once to take a stroll through the money market."

A MODEST young editor says: "Our editorials have been crowded out this week by a pressure of interesting reading matter."

THE dates on some of the rare old books offered for sale in Paris show that they were issued before the invention of printing.

WHY is lighting a cigar a second time much the same as declining to accept one from a friend? Because you re-fuse it.

IT is said that artichokes are good for rheumatism, and there is no doubt that hearty jokes are good for dyspepsia.

NEVER judge by appearances; but, in case of a heavy defalcation, it is generally safe to judge by disappearances.

MAN is the picture, his clothes the frame. The frame is often worth more than the picture.

A THORN in the bush is worth a dozen in the hand.

Correspondence.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Enquiries will be attended to as quickly as possible, but, as we have to go to press several days before publication, some delay is inevitable. In no case can questions be answered "next week," as some of our friends demand.

We have received several very unreasonable complaints of delay in attending to letters, which have been addressed to us by Correspondents who have paid no regard to the instructions which are given every week in this Journal.

The Editor is therefore compelled to give notice:

1. That all letters containing postage-stamps for copies of this Journal, or on similar business, must be addressed to the PUBLISHER.
2. That all letters containing enquiries for the Correspondence Column, or on literary business, must be addressed to the EDITOR.
3. That Correspondents are urgently requested to adopt distinctive pseudonyms, and not to use such vague signatures as "A Constant Reader," etc.
4. That Correspondents wishing to write on two or more subjects—say to send in an answer to a Correspondent, and to enclose stamps for a copy of the Journal—must send each communication in a separate envelope, properly addressed as above indicated.
5. That NO ATTENTION can be paid to any Correspondents who do not observe these rules.

QUESTIONS.

S. D. D. will be glad to know who wrote the following verses, and where he can find them:

The Virtues were invited once
To banquet with the Lord of All.
They came—the great ones rather grim,
And not so pleasant as the small.

They talked and chatted o'er the meal,
They even laughed with temperate glee,
And each one knew the other well,
And all were good as good could be.

Benevolence and Gratitude
Alone of all seemed "strangers yet,"
They stared when they were introduced—
On earth they never once had met.

ANSWERS.

ABDERITE.—The two most celebrated Stylites or pillar-saints are Simeon of Syria and Daniel of Constantinople. Simeon spent thirty-seven years on different pillars, each loftier and narrower than the preceding. The last was sixty-six feet high. He died in 460, aged seventy-two. See Butler's "Lives of the Saints."

A. C.—A description of such a box was contained in HOUSEHOLD WORDS, No. 2.

ALMA.—You will probably find the biography in the "Eminent Women Series," 3s. 6d. (W. H. Allen).

AN ANXIOUS ONE.—1. Common-sense tells us that it is an idle saying that "It is seven years' bad luck to anyone that breaks a looking-glass." No doubt it is bad luck to break a looking-glass, but there the misfortune ends. Surely you must be careless to have a second accident of this kind. 2. We do not see that your handwriting requires improvement. It has good style and is legible. You might, however, keep the lines at more equal distances.

C. J. E.—The best private School of Telegraphy is that in the Uxbridge Road, W. To obtain particulars of Government School, write to the Postmaster-General, St. Martin's-le-Grand, E.C.

DEUX CŒURS AIMANTS.—No; we do not give names.

E. W.—The seeds you have sent are no doubt those of the Honesty (Lunaria biennis). Sow them thinly, in light soil, in the open ground, in May, covering half an inch deep, and when the seedlings are large enough to be handled, transplant them a foot apart. Further cultural particulars will be given in due time.

G. B. G.—The King's and Queen's College of Physicians of Ireland, the University of London, and the Royal University of Ireland, have opened their examinations to women, and have recognised the London Medical School for Women, 30, Henrietta Street, Brunswick Square, and the Royal Free Hospital, Gray's Inn Road, as institutions from which certificates of attendance can be received. All information on subjects connected with the medical education of women, or respecting scholarships, can be obtained on application to Mrs. Thorne, Hon. Sec., 30, Henrietta Street, Brunswick Square, W.C.

IGNORAMUS.—1. What could follow on "hot salmon and hot plum-pudding" at a birthday supper but indigestion and nightmare? The idea of such dishes at an "otherwise cold supper" is really too dreadful to contemplate. 2. The crust for a "roly-poly" pudding can be made either of butter or suet. Well flour the cloth and take care the water is boiling when you put the pudding into the pot; these precautions should prevent sticking of the cloth. Have you seen the cloths which are knitted with coarse cotton, expressly for roly-poly pudding? They leave the pattern on the pudding, which thus looks more inviting than when boiled in a plain cloth.

J. F.—We regret to find that in a paragraph in No. 154 of this Journal, the name of Dr. Jackson is given as retiring Bishop of Chester. It should, of course, have been Dr. Jacobson.

MICROSCOPE.—The actual focus of your object-glass would be about one-sixteenth of an inch. Have you tried it at that distance from your object? If so, and still without success, take it to an optician. Do not attempt to doctor it at home.

PUNCH.—A Red Cross nurse wears a plain black dress, high-necked, and with long sleeves, and rather short in the skirt, a white cap, and bibbed apron, and white lawn sleeves, worn over the black ones, and reaching to a little distance above the elbow. A red cross of some soft material, such as merino, is neatly stitched on the body of the apron. There were some "Red Cross Nurses" at the Peasant International Fête at the Albert Hall lately. If you will look in the illustrated papers of that date, you will see very correct pictures of them.

SIGNA.—1. We cannot find any trace of an opera called "Native Land." There is, however, a cantata of that name, composed by Alfred Gaul. If that is what you want, you had better write for it to Novello's, Berners Street, Oxford Street, London, W. They do not publish it themselves, but say they will procure any of the works of Mr. Gaul which are published at other houses. Mr. Gaul is a Birmingham man, so most likely "Native Land" was published in Birmingham. 2. "Ahn's French Phrase Book" is an excellent one for beginners. It is in three parts; the first one, 1s., the other two 1s. 6d. each.

SOAP.—As we do not know of what kind of fat you make your soap, or the quantity of alkali, etc., you use, we cannot tell you the cause of the mildew. The description of the process of soap-making would take up too much of our space. You will find excellent articles on the subject in Parts III. and VIII., "Amateur Work" (Ward, Lock and Co.).

S. S.—"Walton's Argentine" can be had of the maker, Haverstock Hill, or be ordered through any silversmith or ironmonger. Full directions are given with the preparation.

NEXT MONTH WILL BE COMMENCED A NEW SERIAL STORY, ENTITLED,

"JUDITH WYNNE."

SOLD EVERYWHERE.

Price One Shilling Each, or Bound in Cloth, 1s. 6d. Each.

DICKENS'S DICTIONARIES,

REVISED, CORRECTED, AND BROUGHT UP TO DATE.

DICKENS'S DICTIONARY OF LONDON.

WITH MAPS.

"We have been shown how abounding is our own world of a city with objects of interest, and if we only took the little trouble necessary to find them out, the reward would be much greater than we dream of. Whatever guide be chosen for this purpose, Dickens's well-known 'DICTIONARY OF LONDON' will be found a valuable supplement to them all."—The Times.

DICKENS'S DICTIONARY OF THE THAMES,

FROM ITS SOURCE TO THE MOUTH.

WITH MAPS, PLANS, ETC.

DICKENS'S DICTIONARY OF PARIS.

WITH MAPS, PLANS, ETC.

"There is, it is not too much to say, not a want which may be reasonably felt by a stranger in Paris which has not been foreseen by the dictionary-maker. The little book, besides its great usefulness, is one which may be safely taken up with the certainty of its pages affording some curious information."—Saturday Review.

PUBLISHED MONTHLY, PRICE ONE SHILLING,

DICKENS'S CONTINENTAL A B C RAILWAY GUIDE.

"I puzzled and suffered severely over my Continental 'Bradshaw,' and got deeper and deeper into perplexity. I tried my 'Dickens,' almost in despair, and at once found the particulars I wanted explained in the most concise and unmistakable manner."—Sporting and Dramatic News.

MACMILLAN & CO., LONDON, W.C.

NOTICE.

NOW READY, PRICE SIXPENCE,

PART XXXVI. OF HOUSEHOLD WORDS,

Containing Serial Story, entitled "My Lord Concelt;" "Aunt Clare's 'Old Story,'" a Story in Two Weekly Parts; and numerous Short Stories.

The Editor's Note-Book on Current Topics. Interesting Articles on Cookery, Gardening, The Family Doctor, Fashions, Music, etc.

AND SOMETHING SUITABLE FOR EVERY MEMBER OF THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

NOTICE.

The Fifth Volume of HOUSEHOLD WORDS, containing Nos. 106 to 131, bound in cloth, uniform with Vols. 1, 2, 3, and 4, can now be had, price 4s. 6d. Also Binding Cases (including Title and Index), price 1s. 6d. Title and Index may also be obtained separately, price 1d.

All back Numbers, Parts, Quarterly Divisions and Volumes, also the Extra Numbers, are in print; and may be had by ordering from any Bookseller, Newsagent, or Railway Bookstall, or should any difficulty be found in procuring from an Agent, enclose stamps for the amount, adding price of postage, addressed to the Publisher of HOUSEHOLD WORDS, 24, Great New Street, E.C., when the copies will be sent per return.

The Publishers of HOUSEHOLD WORDS will send Copies direct, post-free, to any address in the United Kingdom or the Continent, upon receipt of P.O.O. made payable at the Fleet Street Office, to Messrs. CHARLES DICKENS & EVANS, at the following rates:

Weekly.				Monthly.
Three Months	..	..	1 8	Three Months	..	..	2 0
Six Months	..	..	3 3	Six Months	..	..	4 0
Twelve Months	..	..	6 6	Twelve Months	..	..	8 0

New Volumes commence the first week in May and November respectively.

All applications for Advertisements to be addressed to Mr. Joseph Smith, 24, Great New Street, E.C.

THE CHRISTMAS NUMBER OF HOUSEHOLD WORDS.

EDITED BY CHARLES DICKENS.

CHRISTMAS, 1883.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

Haunted.

By "RITA."

CHAPTER I. AN INTERLOPER.

"WHAT are we to do with him?" said the Rev. Amos Milroy, and he rubbed his thin grey hair up on end, as was his way when perturbed in spirit, and looked helplessly across the breakfast-table at his wife.

Mrs. Milroy was a meek little woman, cumbered with the care of many olive-branches and small means. Her eyes met those of her lord and master with a bewildered stare that gradually changed into deprecation.

"My dear," she said, "it is impossible. We have more mouths now than we can afford to feed. We can't possibly have him. You must write to these people and tell them so."

The Rev. Amos Milroy smiled grimly.

"I have been appointed guardian, and I cannot well refuse the office," he said, "and you see they offer a hundred a year. It will be no additional expense."

"And where are we to put him?" asked his wife, who had a woman's own gift of raising obstacles in the way of things that, to her, were undesirable. "You know how cramped we are already for room; and the boys won't like it, and what will Opal say to a young savage?"

"He may not be quite that, and Opal will have to get used to him."

"Six boys," sighed Mrs. Milroy. "Oh dear! If it had been a girl now—"

Her husband smiled faintly; he was accustomed to her laments, and generally ignored them. He laid down the letter which had been the subject of these remarks, and rose from the scantily-appointed breakfast-table.

"You must do your best" he said quietly. "He is on his way by this time, and may arrive at any moment. He can share Harold's room, and if you had a few extra things—you can get them from N—. I can spare you two or three pounds. A little chintz and muslin and some new ware will make the bed-chamber quite presentable under your clever management."

The door closed on the bent, shabby figure, and his wife's eyes followed him somewhat wistfully.

"Two or three pounds," she murmured, "and he does so want a new warm overcoat. Could I manage it, I wonder?"

The thought of bargaining and contriving brought a faint colour to her worn and faded face. She rose and took the letter, and then went to the window overlooking the neglected garden. The children were playing there. Five great, noisy, boisterous boys and one girl, their sister.

The mother's eyes looked out on them with more of wistfulness than pride—seeing the shabby darned clothes, the torn hats, the worn-out boots, and taking more note of them than of the rosy, handsome faces, and blithe, strong young forms, which bespoke abundant health and strength.

"I had better tell them," she said, and taking up a shawl which Opal had knitted for her, she put it over her head, and went out into the chill autumn air.

The children were round her in a minute. Opal, a girl of some thirteen or fourteen years, with a face like a spring morning, it was so fresh, and fair, and sunny, linked her arm in her mother's, and impudently demanded the news.

"Is it the letter?" she asked quickly. "Yes, of course it is. Has some one left us a fortune?"

"Has the bishop remembered father at last?" asked Tom, the eldest of the six.

"This letter is from abroad," said their mother. "From the lawyers of your uncle Sebastian. He is dead."

"They do not want us to go into mourning, do they?" said Tom.

"Bosh! when we've never even seen him, or he us," cried Bertie, who was the youngest of the boys, and the special favourite of his sister Opal.

"Do let mother speak!" cried Edgar impatiently. "What's the use of guessing when we can hear the real facts at once?"

"You see, my dears," resumed Mrs. Milroy, "your uncle Sebastian went out to Spain when he was quite a lad, and your father and he have never met since. He married there, but his wife died long ago, and now he, too, is dead, and he has left an only child—a son. This son he wishes your father to educate and bring up. He has been very much indulged—he is very ignorant—and when he is twenty-one he is to come into a fortune of thirty thousand pounds. That is the story we hear of him, and the boy himself is on his way, and may arrive at any moment. Your father wishes me to prepare you all for this new companion, and hopes you will welcome him kindly. Of course he will feel very strange and lonely, but—" She stopped abruptly.

There was an ominous cloud on the six bright faces. The news had evidently not pleased them.

"What a nuisance!" "Disgusting!" "The idea of another fellow coming here." "Why couldn't Uncle Sebastian leave the young savage in his own country?"

These remarks fell low, like smothered thunder, from the various mouths.

Opal only was silent. She was looking at her mother's face.

"Will it be any help to you? Will they pay?" she asked softly.

"Yes," said Mrs. Milroy, colouring, as if half ashamed of the one welcome item in the news. "They are to pay one hundred pounds a year."

"Well, that's good," said Opal emphatically. "At least it will provide his food."

"He'll only want oil and garlic," interposed Tom loftily. "You had better look up some Spanish messes in the cookery-book, Opal."

"I wonder how he'll be dressed?" said Bertie. "Don't they wear sombreros and knee-breeches out there?"

"You haven't told us his name," said Opal curiously.

"Alfonso, or Pedro, or José, of course," said Edgar. "I suppose he'll carry a dagger in his belt—or sash, whichever he wears—and give us a gentle reminder of his Spanish blood every time we disagree."

"His name," said the mother, when her voice could be once more audible, "is Ruiz. And I hope, my dears, you won't disagree, for after all he is your cousin, and your father's only living relative. Besides, you must remember he is an orphan, and we should all try our best to make him feel at home with us. And now I am going into N— to make some purchases, so I trust you won't get into any mischief. I may not be home till tea-time, and if by any chance your cousin should arrive, I must trust you to show him all kindness and attention."

"Where's he to sleep?" asked Opal.

"In Harold's room. I am going to make a few additions to it. It is woefully shabby; still, it's the best of the bedrooms," sighed the harassed woman. "And we must make it do. Perhaps your cousin won't be very particular."

She moved away then, and went back to the house to give her orders. Opal slowly followed. The boys lingered a few moments to discuss the advent of the new cousin, and then went to their father's study for the morning lessons that were the torment and delight of his life. Torment, because of the wild spirit and insubordination of the young crew; delight, because teaching was really a pleasure to him, and his mind was as gifted and intelligent as it was gentle and patient. The morning hours were always devoted by him to teaching his children; indeed, there was no other prospect of education for them except what he could bestow. The town of N— was far away, and schools there were expensive as well as unsatisfactory. It was his great ambition that Tom, his eldest son, should go to Oxford; but that idea looked very impossible, and very far off; indeed, insufficient finances stood as a bugbear to most of the family's ambitions or desires, for the Rev. Amos Milroy was only the rector of a small and poor parish in a remote district of Lincolnshire.

Opal usually shared her brothers' studies. Indeed, she was nearly as good a Latin scholar as Tom, and better at Greek than Edgar; the boys themselves acknowledged that at English literature none of them "were a patch on her," which was high praise in their phraseology. This morning, however, as her mother was going to the town, Opal took the household duties off her hands. That is to say, she dusted the rooms, and gave out the stores, and helped the one servant of the household in preparing the early dinner. When that meal was over and her father had departed on his parish rounds, and the boys started off with wild whoops on an expedition of their own, she put on her hat, and went out for one of the lonely rambles in which she delighted.

The roads and lanes were already wearing that look of melancholy and desolation which Nature puts on at the fall of the leaf.

The tints of autumn had changed into its season of decay and desolation—that season of grey sky and bare trees, of dull mists and sodden leafage, when it is difficult to feel bright or hopeful, or out of harmony with one's dismal surroundings.

There had been a great deal of rain, and the low-lying grounds for miles around were more like marshes than anything else. But Opal did not mind weather. She flitted along through the dreary lanes, and shook off the withered leaves as they showered themselves on her bright hair, with a smile that might have repaid them for their trouble.

A walk of two miles brought Opal to her destination. She was then outside a low and broken stone wall, so thickly covered with ivy and creepers, and surrounded by underwood of all descriptions, that it was hardly more than outlined.

This wall was the boundary of Chalford Hall, or, as it was mostly called, the Old Hall, and from the rising ground where the girl stood, the beautiful, half-ruined building was distinctly visible.

Beautiful it was still, despite the ravages of time and the cruelty of neglect and desolation. It was a grey old Gothic building with lancet windows, pointed gables, and carved buttresses, and it stood in a park of vast extent, that was now a mere wilderness of trees, and tangled grass, and briars, and wild trailing ivy.

At a short distance from the wall by which Opal had halted was a small iron gate. It was broken, and hung on but one hinge, and the pillars too had fallen and crumbled into that same semblance of decay which made every one call the old Hall a ruin. On the inner side of the gate a great oak stood; it had been blasted by a lightning-stroke some score of years before, so the villagers said, and yet it stood firmly there—naked, leafless, with outstretched boughs, like skeleton arms that seemed to extend themselves threateningly over the portals it guarded. On the outer side was a small, deep pool, fringed by reeds and rushes, and with the trailing leaves of hidden water-lilies floating over its dark surface. By the side of the pool was a solitary heron.

Opal knew the bird quite well, and used to bring fragments of bread to feed it with. She used to wonder if it ever stirred from that spot. She never came there without seeing it, the only living thing among the general loneliness and desolation.

The Old Hall was burdened with a host of traditions, and not a few crimes. From times immemorial the lords of Chalford had been cruel, evil-living, and spendthrifts. Every generation had but added more debts, and wrung more money out of his inheritance, until at last the place stood as it stood now, a gloomy indication of fallen fortunes, and a byword of neglect and shame.

Some said it was in Chancery, some that it was mortgaged to ten times its value, but all that was known of it was that it was tenanted by one solitary and uncanny being, a man full three-score years of age, an ill-conditioned, morose recluse, who had dwelt there for many years, seeing no one, going nowhere, existing people scarce knew how, occupied, it was whispered, with strange and diabolical pursuits.

Rumour is many-tongued, and what it gathers from one source is filtered through so many, that the last account bears little resemblance to the first; so the stories told of the inmate of Chalford Hall were many and strange. Opal had heard some of them, but she paid little heed—as little as she did to the ghostly legends of the old Hall itself.

She had been used to go there from quite a child. She thought now, as she stood gazing on the dreary old building in the dusk of the autumn afternoon, of how often she had crept through those broken iron rails, or climbed the ruined wall, and wandered through the vast old pleasure, or over the moss-grown paths, where the rabbits flitted by, and the wild game whirled and flew across her feet.

She had never met a living thing beside the animals and birds, and had grown to disbelieve in the tale of the solitary inhabitant.

Often, too, she had wandered through the ruined portion of the Hall, and looked out through the windows of the haunted chamber; but in all these expeditions she had invariably been alone, for—though she could not have explained why—a strange disinclination had always been with her to introduce that noisy, boisterous crew of brothers to the weird solitude and mystery of this deserted place.

In Opal's nature there was a strange mingling of lightness and mysticism, reason and romance. Not even those who loved the girl best could have understood this inner part, as it were, of her nature. The stories of the Old Hall and its mystic legend had always impressed her greatly, but she never said so, and, indeed, rather shunned the subject if any chance remark led to its discussion. What she loved best was to come here by herself, to wander through the desolate rooms, or the great wilderness of the garden and park, and invent histories of the dead-and-gone Chalfords, or dream over the romantic episodes of their lives.

It seemed so sad to her that not one of the family remained—that the beautiful, stately old pile had passed into strange hands, and no one heeded its decay. It had never looked more melancholy and dreary than it did now, with the chill mists rising like faint vapour from the damp ground, and the dull grey sky brooding over the leafless trees and rotting stonework. The girl stood by the heron-pool, and rested her arms on the broken wall, and, leaning there, gave herself up to the luxury of thought so often denied her in the noisy and care-encumbered household at home.

She must have stood there for a long time—how long, indeed, she scarcely knew, only that the faint dull daylight had deepened into dusk, and the sky grown more colourless and the wind more chill.

Then she roused herself with a start, and remembered that she had two miles to walk before she could reach her home. As she looked up, she saw, standing some few paces off, a solitary figure. The sight was so unusual a one in this lonely spot that it was little wonder she started. But the start was one of surprise, not fear. The figure was a strange one—that of a youth dressed in most un-English garb, with a wide, drooping hat which half concealed his face.

She stared at him in unfeigned astonishment, and he returned the look. She saw a tall slender figure, a pale face, lighted by large pathetic eyes, sombre as night, yet with a strange light in their depths as of hidden fire that as yet only slumbered, and a beautiful mouth, curved, and mobile, and eloquent of feeling. Dark soft hair of richest brown framed in this strange unyouthful face—hair tossed carelessly from the low broad brow, and far too long and negligently worn for English taste.

The one thing, however, that impressed the girl was the extreme mournfulness of the whole expression. Sadness haunted the dark, long-fringed eyes, and had drawn the curved mouth into pathetic lines, and set a seal of tragic meaning upon the brow; and it was this sadness which struck her most and gave her courage to address the stranger.

"Do you wish to go into the Hall?" she asked gently. "I believe you can do so. It is not inhabited."

He looked at her curiously, then lifted his hat, and said in slow, grave tones:

"No, I have no wish to go there. I only came here for a walk."

"Do you live in North Apse?" asked Opal in surprise. "I thought I knew everyone here."

"I have come to live here," he said in the same slow, measured accents, "at the rectory. When I found it, no one was there. I suppose I was not expected. I left my luggage and came out. The first road I found led me here. I have been watching you for a long time. Is that," pointing to the Hall, "where you live?"

"Oh no," said Opal quickly; "I live at the rectory. And I suppose you are our new cousin. Is your name Ruiz Milroy?"

"Ruiz Sebastian Milroy," he answered calmly. "And you?"

"I am Opal," she said simply, and gave him her hand.

He took it in the same cold, grave way, and his mournful eyes looked steadily down at her own.

"I never heard of you," he said. "I wonder if I shall like you."

Opal coloured slightly.

"I hope so," she said. "I am sorry we were all out when you arrived. We did not expect you so soon. Had you a pleasant journey?"

"Pleasant!" His eyes flashed, his lips expressed the utmost contempt. "No; nothing is pleasant here. What an ugly, hateful country you live in!"

Opal looked up indignantly.

"I am sure it is not," she exclaimed. "It is beautiful! Of course, at this time of the year everything looks dreary; but I suppose it is not always summer even in Spain."

"Spain is lovely!" he said in a tone of intense regret. "I don't know how you can live under such grey skies, and with such horrible air as this to breathe. And have you no flowers or fruit? Is it all like this; wet, marshy, flat? Ugh!" And he shivered visibly.

"Of course there are flowers and fruit at the proper time," said Opal indignantly. "I suppose you are cold and hungry, and that is why you are bad-tempered."

"I am not bad-tempered," said the youth hotly, "and even if you are my cousin, I think you are very rude to call me so. I have the sun in my veins, and I know I shall hate this land of fog, and rains, and bleak cold days. My mother told me it would be so, and that English girls were bold and rude, and not like our Spanish maidens. She was quite right."

Opal looked at him with the blood mantling in her cheeks.

"Your mother could not have known anything of England, for she was never here, and as for Spanish girls, they are bold enough in some things, if they are kept in convents and never allowed to look at a man without a veil over their faces. You see I know quite as much about your country as you do about mine."

He smiled with a somewhat lofty air of superiority; but Opal saw the smile, and it incensed her greatly.

"You are a funny little girl," he said coolly. "Come, don't let us talk here any more; it is cold. Show me the way home."

"If I am a little girl," said Opal with cutting politeness, "I am at least accustomed to civility. Say 'if you please.'"

For a moment he looked at her, and she returned the look. Blue eyes and brown flashed defiance, rebellion, wrath at each other, as only young indignant eyes can do. Then something in the girl's clear violet orbs seemed to thrill and master him. A dark flush rose slowly to his brow. He raised his hat with an action of consummate grace, and bent half seriously, half mockingly towards her. "If you please, cousin," he said.

She laughed and flushed too, and then turned away with a little air of conscious victory.

"Come, then; it will be quite dark if we do not make haste."

CHAPTER II. "TO-DAY IT IS MY TURN."

ON the whole the new comer was not popular with his young cousins.

Youth is always more or less antagonistic to innovations, and Ruiz Milroy was certainly entirely different in thought, word, and manner to themselves, and utterly unable to suit himself to the gloom of their everyday life. He disliked study—was too indolent by nature for any physical exertion, and regarded their rough sports and games with the utmost scorn and horror. Then he had been accustomed to have his own way entirely, and having been an only child was quite incapable of understanding the boisterous good-nature and "give-and-take" morals of the rectory boys.

The only one for whom he showed any regard was Opal, but that favour lost its value in her sight from the fact of the rooted antagonism that existed between this strange cousin and her favourite brother, Bertie.

From the first Bertie took a dislike to him. He was a bold bright boy of ten, gifted with immense physical strength, unflinching spirits, an invincible fancy for practical jokes, and a passionate love for his sister Opal. That this Spanish interloper, as he named Ruiz, should attempt to come between her and himself was more than he could bear, and he made Opal miserable with jealous reproaches, and infuriated the fiery-tempered Ruiz with sneers and taunts.

The rector did not see much of what went on between the young folks. He thought that no doubt Ruiz would shake down in time and become used to English ways, and he felt rather despairing when he discovered how very backward his education was, and what a difficult subject he seemed for instruction or control.

As for Mrs. Milroy she troubled herself very little about the boy. In fact she was rather afraid of him, if the truth be told. Afraid of his great sombre eyes that looked such a world of tragic meaning—of his abrupt curt manners, his very outspoken denunciations, for Ruiz never thought twice about saying what he felt, and had an uncomfortable knack of blurting out truths with an utter disregard as to whose feelings or opinions he offended.

So for the first three months of his stay the boy was very miserable, and the family very uncomfortable.

As for Ruiz, he hated England. He hated the climate, the bleak grey skies, the chilly weather, the rules and regulations of the household, the long hours of lessons, the boisterous play, and incessant quizzing and tormenting of the boys. He was out of place, and he felt it. No one understood him, no one cared for him, and his proud, passionate nature held such an inward craving for love that to live in this unsympathetic atmosphere was to him an endless purgatory.

To one only of these new companions could Ruiz Milroy have spoken of his feelings, or betrayed something of the heart-hunger that consumed him, and that one was Opal. But Opal was cold too, and seemed to shun him, for Bertie hated him. Yet at times he caught the girl's eyes fixed on him with a sort of wondering gentleness, and even in his most wild and passionate outbursts, a look or word from her would calm him.

To show himself less ignorant in her sight, he worked hard at his hated tasks, and tried to set his aching and bewildered brain to the comprehension of Latin verbs and Greek hexameters, and all the terrible turmoil of figures and calculations comprised in that one odious word, arithmetic.

The boys laughed at him and his blunders, but Opal never did, and many a difficulty did she smooth away by her clear and simple explanations, or gentle hints. To him she seemed a marvel of cleverness. He only wondered how she could find delight in her brothers' rough companionship or wild games.

Sometimes, but very rarely, he would find her alone, and coax her to go for a ramble with him; but as the winter grew more bleak and bitter, he gave up going out at all, and so saw less and less of the girl.

One day he was standing in the cheerless, unfurnished play-room, looking out of the window at the frozen ground and glittering icicles, when Bertie dashed into the room.

"Hallo, Mollycoddle!" he said boisterously; "aren't you coming out? We're going to skate."

"What is that?" asked Ruiz, without moving from the window.

Bertie laughed uproariously.

"Oh, you are a ninny!" he said. "Come and see; but I suppose you're afraid of catching cold, or getting your nose frost-bitten, or something of that sort. Shall I lend you a blanket?"

For all answer his cousin turned round, his eyes blazing, his face white as death.

"I hate you!" he said fiercely. "What right have you to sneer at me, or what I do? You are nothing but a set of boors and farmers. You don't understand how gentlemen live."

"Don't I, Miss Petticoats?" persisted Bert irritably. "Perhaps I do. Gentlemen here don't lounge about on sofas, and draw poetry and play guitars; they are a bit more manly than you namby-pamby Spaniards. And as for sport, you don't know anything about it, except bull-fights, and they're only fit for barbarians. If all Spaniards are like you, they're nothing but a set of old women."

Further words on his part were rendered impossible by reason of a violent blow that sent him reeling against the doorway. Ruiz had snatched up a heavy book, and hurled it at the audacious young speaker. The moment Bert recovered himself, he flew like a young tiger at his cousin. Ruiz was cooler now, and met the onslaught with a simple defence. At this juncture the door opened, and Opal entered.

She gave a cry of horror, and flew towards the combatants. Ruiz instantly drew back, and she held Bert by main force.

"You coward!" she cried, facing her cousin indignantly. "The idea of your striking a child like that! I wonder you're not ashamed of yourself."

"Let me go," cried Bert furiously. "It's the first time he's shown any pluck. I'm not afraid to fight him."

"You shan't fight him," cried Opal passionately. "It's hateful, horrible! I wish you had never come here," she continued, stamping her foot and turning again to Ruiz. "We have no peace, night or day, now. Why can't you be like we are, and not for ever quarrelling and setting us all by the ears?"

"I am glad I am not like you are," said Ruiz with suppressed passion. "I wouldn't be if I could. And you can't be more sorry to have me than I am to be here. I am most miserable."

The proud, defiant look in his eyes died out, and in its place came one so heart-breaking, so pathetic, that a swift pang shot through Opal's tender breast.

She still stood there holding her brother's collar, her slight young figure drawn up to its full height, her whole face eloquent of anger and reproach; but at those words her hand relaxed its grasp, the colour faded slowly from her cheeks.

"Bert," she said reproachfully, "you have been tormenting him again. It is not kind of you. He is our guest, you know, and we ought not to make him unhappy."

The boy pouted, and shook himself free from her detaining hand.

"He is so ill-tempered, and he can't stand chaff," he said pettishly. "Besides, he began it—he threw a book at me."

"I am sure you are sorry," said Opal, turning to her cousin. "Shake hands and be friends again, won't you?"

"He must beg my pardon," said Bertie defiantly, as he put his hands behind him.

"I shall do no such thing," said Ruiz haughtily. "You insulted me. It is for you to beg mine."

Opal came and laid her hand on his arm.

"You are so much older," she said gently, "and you know you really are bad-tempered, I have always told you so. Beg his pardon just to please me."

"It will be a lie, and I shall not mean it," muttered Ruiz, his eyes flashing fire once more.

"It won't be a—ahem!" said Opal, smiling up in his angry face, "if you try and think you mean it—and to please me."

He hesitated. He met her eyes, and he thought of that day when she had first vanquished his pride and stubbornness, and she thought of it too. With a sudden flame of hot anger he wrenched himself away.

"No," he said passionately; "once before you conquered me; to-day it is my turn. At least my will is my own!"

"Oh, very well," said Opal haughtily. "Do as you like, but remember—in offending Bert you have offended me, and I don't forgive you until you say what I asked."

And she turned away like a young queen, and marched Bertie off with her.

Ruiz stood where she had left him, till the last echo of her retreating steps had died into silence. His chest was heaving, his eyes were on fire with wrath and hate and passionate misery. The silence around him seemed full of fiendish voices mocking his sorrow and his loneliness. Everything in life was a blank, save the hatred and anger tearing at his soul. He felt a loathing of all mankind—a hatred of these young, mirthful, undisciplined creatures, who comprehended him as little as he did them. His brain seemed on fire, he clenched his hand and cursed the fate that had brought him thither. Then he rushed from the room, snatched up his hat from the hall-table, and went out into the cold, frosty, sunless air, with all his soul in a tumult of rage, and the blood coursing like a stream of fire in his throbbing veins. He felt nothing of the cold—saw nothing of where his furious footsteps led him. His feeling then was that he would rather be devoured by wolves and bears than go back to that hateful house, and hear the boys' sneers and jokes, and see the proud contempt of Opal's eyes. He had never felt so utterly alone and uncared-for as he felt now. The feverish love and tenacious loyalty he bore for his dead parents and his lost home were things that only met with ridicule and misapprehension.

Opal was his only friend, and now she had turned against him. She would never forgive him, and that thought maddened him and made him desperate. He never ceased his headlong flight until he found himself at the spot where he had first met her. The ruined Hall towered dim and spectral in the wintry sunlight; the leafless trees glistened with sparkling crystals; the heron stood beside the frozen pool and uttered a low and plaintive cry; and the gate hung open on its broken hinges and showed the desolate park beyond.

He hesitated a moment, then the desire for solitude—for isolation—came over him like a resistless flood. He entered, pushing aside the broken gate, and turned off into the very depths of the desolate winter woods. Once there, and safe from human intrusion, he threw himself down on the cold, hard ground, and buried his face in his hands, the hoarse shuddering sobs breaking from him, sounding inexpressibly mournful in that dreary solitude. There he lay quite still, battling with the storm of passion in his breast, undergoing such mortal agony, shame, and self-reproach as would have gone nigh to break the heart of one who loved him, as that mother for whom he wept had done.

CHAPTER III. "LET ME BE YOUR FRIEND."

THE boy—for despite his sixteen years and tall stature he was little else—lay there in that wild abandonment of grief for a long, long time.

A touch on his shoulder at last recalled him to himself. He sprang up, and saw standing beside him a strange-looking object. It was the figure of an old man, lean and bent, with snowy hair and beard, and wild, gleaming eyes that looked fiercely forth from beneath thick, shaggy eyebrows.

He was very old, and leaned heavily on a thick, stout staff.

"Why are you here?" he asked Ruiz fiercely. "Have you come to spy on me?"

The lad drew himself up indignantly.

"No," he said. "I came because—because I wanted to be alone."

The old man looked at him curiously.

"You are over-young to shun your species," he said. "What fault have you to find with mankind?"

Ruiz coloured hotly.

"My troubles concern only myself," he said with his usual abrupt truthfulness.

A grim smile crossed the lips of his questioner. That curt, haughty grace pleased him. It was unconscious, and it had a kinship to his own contempt and indifference for his species.

"That is true, or at least you fancy it is true," he said. "But you are rather ungracious. Are you aware you are trespassing?"

"No," said Ruiz calmly, as he glanced around. "I thought these woods were free to any one. If you wish to keep them to yourself you should bar and guard their entrance better than you do."

"You are very outspoken," said the old man. "What is your name? You are not of this country, I am sure."

"I am a Spaniard," said the boy haughtily. "We do not ask people in my country who and what they are the moment we see them. Since you say I am trespassing, I will leave this place. I did not know I was doing wrong."

"Not wrong—only the rights of landowners are somewhat rigidly enforced here; whatever they may be in Spain. You are a strange youth, but you have a face one can trust. I wish you to say nothing about me. It is my whim that no one should know I live here."

"I am not used to talk of the affairs of other people," answered Ruiz. "I shall say nothing of you."

"That is well," said the old man. "What, are you going?"

"Did you not say I had no right here?"

"You are too quick at taking one at one's word. You may stay if it pleases you."

"No," said the boy, with a faint sigh as he looked over the frozen landscape and up to the icicle-hung trees. "I must go now. It is late."

"When will you come again?" asked the old man.

"To trespass? Never!"

"Nay. If I ask you, it is no longer a trespass. You may come when you choose, but—alone. Since you love solitude it is hard to debar you from your singular taste. I am an old man, and poor, and sick of life, and I hate all my kind, and live but for one object. You see I tell you this, I who for years have spoken to no living thing. I tell it you because in your face I read the war of those fierce passions that ruined my own life. Beware of them if you can. Perhaps, though, they may be stronger than yourself. In that case recognise in my fate the semblance of your own. Do you know what they say of yonder place?"

His withered hand pointed towards the lonely Gothic pile, with the last sun-rays gleaming blood-red on its lancet windows and arched gables. The boy's eyes followed his gesture, a little startled by the strange manner and stranger words of this recluse.

"They say it is haunted," continued the old man. "Haunted. They are right. It is. Haunted by evil deeds—haunted by sad and bitter memories—haunted by one living soul whose days are weighted with the memory of a crime no after regret can expiate. Do you understand, and will you shun me now?"

"I do not understand," said Ruiz with simple directness. "But I will not shun you if you desire to speak with me at any time. It must be very sad to live unloved, and desolate, and alone."

"There is nothing in life sadder," said the old man, and his head drooped on his breast, and the hands that clasped the supporting staff shook visibly. "Go, boy," he continued wildly, "go. I have spoken to no living being for years. I cannot tell what made me speak to you. You are young, and the sorrows of youth are short-lived, and doubtless life looks to you fair and full of promise. It is only the old who look forward and see—nothing; and backward on years that are like a graveyard of regrets. Heaven keep you from a fate like mine!"

Ruiz looked compassionately at him. Beside this grey and colourless existence his own youth seemed less supremely desolate than an hour before he had thought it.

He stretched out his hand.

"Good-bye," he said gently, "I am sorry for you, if your life be what you say. And I will come and see you again, if it is your wish, or can be any pleasure to you."

"Yes, come again," said the old man eagerly. Then his eyes clouded. "You are young," he said; "you will forget. Give me your promise ere you leave."

Ruiz drew his tall young figure up haughtily.

"I never broke faith with living or with dead," he said. "A bond that needs compelling is broken already. I have said I will come."

He raised his hat with that reverence which age and womanhood always inspired in him, and went his way homeward over the frozen ground, followed by the musing sorrowful eyes of the old Hall's lonely tenant.

They were all at tea when he returned. He went up to his room, and plunged his face in cold water to remove the traces of those passionate tears he had shed, and then calm and proud-looking as a young king, he marched into the fire-lit parlour. There was a momentary silence as he entered. All eyes turned to him. The Rev. Amos thought involuntarily, "What a noble-looking lad!" His wife felt a momentary wonder that the bright flushed faces around the board should suddenly seem so commonplace and coarse before the classic features and tragic beauty of this foreign youth. Opal glanced at him and thought how grand and proud he looked, and the boys contented themselves with a contemptuous glance, and a muttered "womanish," which was all the admiration they ever bestowed on that slender, well-knit figure and graceful bearing.

"You are late, my dear," said Mrs. Milroy kindly, as she handed him his tea.

"I went for a long walk," he said curtly.

"Did you find it very cold?" asked the rector. The boys tittered at the question.

Opal glancing up saw how pale he was, and how heavy were the drooping lids that fell over his dark sombre eyes. A swift flood of compassion stirred her heart. She felt she had behaved cruelly and ungenerously to the lonely boy—she who understood him best, and for whom alone he had seemed to care in this household of strangers.

"It was cold," he said, answering his uncle's question after a fiery glance at the smiling, mocking faces of the boys; "it is always that here."

"Well, well," said the Rev. Amos cheerfully, "the winter will soon be over now. We are getting near Christmas, when the days begin to lengthen, and sometimes in February we have quite mild weather—violets and crocuses all in bloom. You will like England better when you see the spring."

"I shall never like it," said Ruiz ungraciously. "As soon as ever I am able I shall leave it and go back to Spain."

"A good riddance," muttered Bert below his breath.

Opal gave him a rebuking glance.

"Perhaps you will change your mind," she said graciously to her cousin. "You might at least give England a fair trial."

He looked at her, but said nothing, and the meal went on as noisily as it had done before his advent—no one taking any further notice of him.

When the tea-things had been removed, the boys all retired to prepare their studies for the next day. Ruiz followed them, and when they were alone he went up to Bertie and laid his hand on his shoulder.

"I am sorry for what I did this afternoon," he said simply. "Your sister was right. It was cowardly, but then you provoked me."

"Oh," said Bertie loftily, "it's of no consequence. I'm not afraid to fight you, and I'd soon have shown you that if Opal hadn't interfered."

"Bertie!" cried his sister indignantly, as she overheard this colloquy, "I am ashamed of you. Take his hand and say you're sorry too. No doubt you were as much in fault as he was."

"That's just like a girl," scoffed Bertie indignantly. "Turn-coats! Never know their own minds. First on one side, then on another."

"I can't understand half you say," said Ruiz wearily. "I've told you I'm sorry. I suppose you don't care. You are all very rude and very unkind. But it does not matter. I must live here until I am old enough to have my money and do as I like. Then I shall go to people whom I can understand, and who love me."

"Till then," said a soft, shy voice, "let me be your friend. You are right, Ruiz. We have been rude and cold, and you must have felt disgusted often and often. I have told the boys so, but they don't care, and they can't change. Never mind. I will do what I can for you, and I will be your sister, too, if you will let me."

The boys stared in amazement and felt a little indignant as well as ashamed, but Ruiz looked at her with all his passionate southern soul in his eyes; with such a storm of gratitude, wonder, admiration raging in his fiery young heart as it was well for her she could not read, or he explain.

"Thank you," he said.

That was all. But more words have expressed less fidelity, and more eloquent sentences a devotion not half so pure and perfect as the boy laid at the girl's feet in that one short moment of mutual comprehension.

CHAPTER IV. STRUCK DOWN.

THERE was a time of peace at the rectory after this little episode. The boys troubled Ruiz less, though Bertie was still antagonistic and grudged his cousin his monopoly of Opal's company.

To please her Ruiz tried to skate, though he disliked it. But for Opal's sake he would have done anything, and it was almost touching to see how he subdued his wild will and fiery temper, and put aside his own feelings and inclinations, and bent to her wishes with a half-proud, half-regretful complaisance.

Christmas Eve came round, and the existing harmony had not been disturbed. Ruiz had helped Opal to decorate the old church, and pricked his fingers, and spoilt his picturesque velvet coat with bunches of holly and evergreens, and otherwise martyred himself in her service.

The boys had been skating, and when they came round in the dusk of the afternoon, they found the decoration completed, and Opal scolded them for their selfishness. Bertie, who was inclined to be sulky, retorted sharply, and told her that as Ruiz was always dangling after her, they knew they were not wanted. This offended Opal, and led to an interchange of words between herself and her favourite brother.

They all left the church together, but the boys insisted on having another skate before going home to tea, and Opal and Ruiz accompanied them to the large pond, where they usually disported themselves. Ruiz had his skates with him, but declined going on the ice, and Bertie made this an excuse for further jeers and rudeness.

His cousin took no notice of him for some time, but at last, irritated beyond endurance, he put on his skates, and challenged him to a race. Bertie refused, and went on cutting figures and doing spread-eagles and outside curves, while he sneered at his cousin's want of proficiency. Opal sauntered on, and as soon as she was out of hearing, Bertie turned to his cousin and said firmly:

"Look here, I can't stand this sort of thing any longer. I won't have you coming between my sister and me, so just remember that. She's not like the same girl now, and you're a sneak for turning her against us, and so I tell you. And I'd be ashamed if I were you, to have a girl teaching me to skate, and always be at her heels. You've come here where nobody wanted you, and I suppose we've got to put up with your company; but take my advice and let Opal alone, or it'll be the worse for you. I'm not going to have any sneaking Spaniards turning my sister's head, and making a ninny and a spoon of her! So just you mind what I say. And if you don't like it, you can do the other thing!"

For a moment Ruiz stood there and stared at him as if bewildered. Then a scarlet flush came into his clear, olive cheek, and an ominous flash leapt into his eyes.

"You are an ignorant, insolent little boy," he said in a low suppressed voice; "and I shall behave to your sister exactly as I please."

"No, you sha'n't, for I'll tell Tom, and as he's as old as you he can fight you and thrash you till you promise what I've asked."

"Bah!" muttered Ruiz with contempt, "you are nothing but a nation of prize-fighters, you English. It is all you think of, fight—fight, that and money-grubbing!"

"And you're nothing but a set of cowards—you Spaniards!" hissed Bertie, as his cousin moved slowly away. "And all you can do is to shelter yourself behind a woman's petticoats, or knife people in the dark."

"You know nothing about my country or my people," said Ruiz, halting, and trying to keep down the rage surging in his heart. "If you did you would know that they can behave like gentlemen even to strangers who claim their hospitality; but you—you are like your own bulldogs—as jealous, and as brutal, and as fond of fighting."

He was skating on again, only anxious to avoid further dispute, but Bertie crossed his path purposely, and they came into collision. Ruiz was not yet sufficiently sure of his balance to withstand the shock, and fell backwards, striking his head on the ice. The blow almost stunned him, but he struggled to his feet though his brain was giddy and confused, and a thousand lights seemed whirling before his eyes. Bert's mocking laugh fell on his ear and maddened him.

He saw the light young figure gliding by, and made a sudden spring, and seizing him by the collar shook him violently. Bertie raised his fist and hit his cousin full in the face.

Then—how, Ruiz could never tell—it seemed as if his grasp relaxed. There was a dull thud, and the boy fell heavily down, and lay there at his feet like a log.

He was not conscious of having struck him; he had only let him go as that fierce blow was struck; but all the clear wintry air seemed suddenly to gleam like blood, and a wild shriek echoed across the frozen stillness:

"Oh, God, you have killed him!"

It was Opal's voice, and Opal's slight figure threw itself between him and that still and prostrate form. Then other voices sounded, and other figures pushed him aside, and he could only stand there stunned and bewildered, with his temples throbbing like hammers, and in his heart an agony of fear.

"Dead! Is he dead?" that was all he heard, and mingled with the dreadful words came Opal's sobs of terror, every one of which was like a knife thrust in his heart. Then they raised that motionless form and moved away; none of them speaking to him, none of them pitying him, or even conscious of the agony of remorse and terror that held his senses strained to the utmost tension compatible with consciousness and power.

He stood there alone on the cold glistening ice; wishing it would open and let the chill waters swallow him; wishing he had never come to this peaceful home, where he had been only an element of discord and antagonism from the first. Then suddenly a strange thought came to him. Why should he go back? Everyone hated him, and now—now they would say he was a murderer. Opal had said it, and thrust him aside with a look of horror.

He would leave Lincolnshire, he would leave England. He would make his way to Liverpool, and work his passage out to Spain if need be. That would be better than living among kinsfolk so unfeeling as these. Yes, he would do that. They should never be troubled with him more.

His brain was still giddy and confused from that blow he had received. He could not think clearly or rationally—only all life seemed suddenly a blank and a desolation.

Scarce knowing what he did, he tore off his skates, and rushed blindly away from the spot—on—on—on, while the night fell in darker shadow, and the white ground and frozen boughs seemed to gleam before his eyes with a dark stain upon their whiteness, and in his ears a thousand fiendish voices seemed shrieking Opal's terrified words:

"You have killed him!"

CHAPTER V. TWO CHRISTMAS EVES.

"Just four years ago," sighed Opal Milroy, standing in the old church-porch, and looking out at the red, wintry sunset.

She was a slender, beautiful maiden now, with something of graver and more thoughtful meaning in the face that had been so bright and sunny.

She closed the door behind her, and left the keys with the old sexton, who was waiting by the gate, and then walked slowly and thoughtfully on to that spot where every Christmas Eve found her.

There was no ice on the pond this year, for the season had been mild and rainy, and the meadows were a sheet of water, and the lanes only sloughs of mud. The pond, with its banks fringed with willows and its dark unruffled surface, looked a desolate picture set in among those reedy marshes and watery fields.

Opal shivered involuntarily as she stood there and looked across it. It was always solitary, save when the frost king had bound it in his icy fetters and the skaters came to hold their revels there.

Far as she could see there was no living creature visible except herself, and the intense stillness struck her with a strange chill. It had been her home for eighteen years—it might possibly be her home for all her life, and the idea came to her to-day as it had never come before, with a sudden pang of distaste, and almost of horror.

The pulse of youth and vitality beat in her veins as the young sap thrills in the trees. She wanted to live her life, not stagnate; to drink in beauty, pleasure, hope; and she was buried in as complete a solitude as any spell-bound maiden of fairy-lore.

These four years had brought many changes, but had only bound her to greater loneliness.

In the first place had come the mysterious disappearance of Ruiz. From that fatal night, four years since, no one had seen or heard aught of the young Spaniard. He had not been missed in the excitement and confusion till the next day. By that time Bert's broken leg had been set, and the household had recovered its usual composure, and then came the question:

"Where is Ruiz?"

For four years that question had remained unanswered.

The Rev. Amos had been well-nigh distracted. He had written to his brother's lawyers, and they had advertised and sent detectives and offered rewards, and put all the usual machinery of the police in motion, and yet no clue, no faintest sign had been detected of the boy's whereabouts.

From the hour when Opal's words had proclaimed him a murderer, he had disappeared as entirely as if the earth had opened and swallowed him.

Of course the prevailing idea in the minds of the rectory folk was that he had gone back to Spain; but how he got there untraced and almost penniless, no one could guess. He gave no sign of his existence, his money lay unclaimed, but the lawyers still paid the hundred a year to the Rev. Amos Milroy, since his brother's will had made no provision for so extraordinary a contingency as this, and had ordered that sum to be continued until Ruiz had reached the age of twenty-one.

The money had been a great help. Tom had gone to college, and worked hard, and, thanks to his father's splendid grounding, had gained scholarships enough to keep him in funds and help him along the road to that ambition which had once looked so hopeless a thing. The two next boys had been taken, Edgar into a lawyer's office, and Amos into a bank, in Lincoln. Harold, Opal, and Bertie were at home. The latter still suffered from a slight lameness, and had only been very recently allowed to go without crutches. It had been a sad trial to Opal to see her merry, active little brother so helpless, but his time of suffering had not been without its benefits, for it had brought brother and sister into yet closer companionship, and tamed the boy's wild nature and hot temper into a patience and gratitude wonderful and beautiful to see.

Of all these things Opal thought now, as she stood by the drooping willow-trees, and watched the sunset die in slanting lines of gold and red across the low, wet meadows. Her heart felt strangely heavy; her face looked pale and mournful, despite its youth and beauty. With a sigh she turned away at last, and wandered listlessly along, taking very little heed of where she went, so absorbed was she in speculations as to Ruiz Milroy's fate, and the memory of his short, ill-starred sojourn in their midst.

When she found herself close to the old Hall she gave a start of surprise. She had not thought she was anywhere near it, and for long—for years, in fact—she had not pursued her old fancy for trespassing in its dreary precincts.

She reached the old gate, and found it closed and barred, and rudely secured with rusty iron chains, which held it in its place. Entrance was not possible now, unless she scaled the walls, and Opal half smiled, remembering her old tomboy escapades, and how daringly she would once have done even that. Now she contented herself with folding her arms upon the low and crumbling boundary; and, leaning there, surveyed the desolate old place with the pity and wonder that it always inspired in her mind. Even more desolate than of yore did it look, and the slight, graceful figure leaning against the ivy hedge looked strangely out of place in that drear and melancholy spot.

Opal's eyes wandered from arch to window, from wing to wing, and then again dropped to the weed-grown terrace, where broken vases and maimed statues stood in mouldy resignation, and solitude with dusky wings sat brooding over the ravages of time.

Mystery, ghosts, crime, any or all of these might haunt that gloomy pile; it looked a fitting abode for anything except human life. Yet as the girl's eyes lingered in fascinated wonder she fancied she saw something move along the terrace walk—a human figure, if the dusky light could be trusted, and the swaying shadows were not playing tricks with her clear young sight. She looked steadily, wondering at the moving object. Yes, it certainly was a figure, the figure of an old man; and as she stood there motionless as the wall she touched, it came slowly along in her direction with the feeble uncertainty of age, a spectacle as pitiful and cheerless as the old Hall itself. He came up to the gate, and examined the bolts, and shook it as if to try its strength; satisfied apparently with its capabilities for resistance he moved on. At that moment some start or action of Opal's stirred the ivy, and he looked up. Their eyes met. Opal felt almost frightened as she saw that strange face with the shaggy white beard, the thin straggling locks of hair framing in its withered features. Yet of the two faces his expressed more fear than hers, though the fact only recurred to her long afterwards.

There was a moment's silence. Then he said in a low, fierce voice:

"What are you doing here?"

The girl felt too bewildered to answer. She could only stare at those wild, gleaming eyes, and a sense of terror held her speechless.

"Are you dumb?" he asked, shaking his stick impatiently, and looking at her again, with the look, she thought, of some lost soul in torment.

She tried to speak, but that gaze held her spell-bound; no words would come.

"Who are you?" he said again.

"I am Opal Milroy," she faltered, finding power at last to open those frozen portals of speech.

There could be no mistake this time. It was fear that those wild eyes held—fierce, overmastering dread, that paled his face to ghastliness, and made his frail hands tremble as they rested on his staff. He glanced round in terror. His voice, for all his effort at self-control, had in it something of appeal—of entreaty—as if he asked a favour, not enforced a command.

"Go! go!" he cried, waving his hand. "How dare you come here! You have no right. You are a spy, an intruder. Go, I tell you, or—"

He had no need to utter the threat, Opal was too terrified to wait for further words. She turned and flew across the leaf-strewn path and over the marshy meadows like a lapwing. Fear lent wings to her feet, and, though panting and breathless, she never rested until a good mile lay between her and the old Hall of Chalford.

The stars were glittering clear and large in the brilliant wintry sky.

In one of the topmost towers of the old Hall, in a small and curiously fitted chamber, sat a young man busily writing. The chamber would have puzzled and surprised any ordinary visitor. It was nothing but a species of observatory, rudely and scantily appointed; but it held within its four walls an ambition as lofty as those miles of space into which science and patience had given it insight.

The turret contained three windows and had a glass skylight. In the centre, mounted on a moveable axis, was a large telescope. In one corner stood an astronomical clock, regulated to sidereal time. A table near one window was covered with books and papers; a small stove of charcoal gave warmth to the bare, chill place, and crouched beside it was the old man who had so terrified Opal Milroy.

It was verging towards midnight, and for an hour or more no sound had broken the stillness of that strange chamber save the noise of the pen on the paper, or the beat of the strange clock which marked the star time.

The old man roused himself at last and looked at the writer.

"Do you watch again to-night?" he said.

The young man raised his head—a dark Murillo-like head, with great sad eyes that seemed haunted by some mournful memory.

"Yes," he said simply.

"But it is Christmas Eve. You might give yourself a holiday for once. You have satisfied yourself as to the transit of the first point of Aries. You give yourself no rest. You will be ill."

"I have never been ill in my life," answered the young man calmly; "and now that life is only of value so long as I can pursue these studies. Weeks, months, years, how paltry they look beside the eternal wonders of the heavens! I feel like one on a journey, going on from stage to stage, approaching by gradual degrees the confines of the visible universe. A life—a short human life—all devoted to that one pursuit, seems far too brief!"

"I have found it so," answered the old man dreamily. "And yet success was once so nearly mine. I should have made my name as famous as that of Schröter, Mädler, Struve, Herschel, only——"

He paused abruptly. He looked with a strange yearning at the beautiful boyish face—graver, sadder than twice its years could have warranted.

"Only—a woman came between me and my life's ambition," he went on dreamily. "It is always so. We work, they destroy. That is life, or—fate."

His companion made no answer. He was not given to much speech. His thoughts were tuned to graver, higher things than mere material cares. He was unwise with that unwisdom of early youth that sees in its own dreams a heaven, and in its own ambitions success.

"Put away your work; you have done enough," continued the old man presently. "For nights you have had no sleep; for days no exercise, or rest. When I promised to teach you all I knew, I exacted no guerdon but obedience. Give me that to-night. There are things I would speak of. My mind is uneasy and full of care. Come and sit by the stove and talk, or let me talk."

The youth pushed aside his papers, and rose with a somewhat proud and graceful reluctance.

Beside the stove was an old stool. He took it and drew near the feeble warmth of the fire. He was very pale, and his frame was far too slender and fragile to bespeak robust health.

His companion's eyes rested somewhat anxiously and regretfully upon him.

"Ruiz," he said, "what will you do when I am dead?"

The dark eyes looked vaguely at the withered face.

"I don't know," he said simply. "Live on here, I suppose. You have taught me how little is necessary for actual existence. The woods supply us with food, the river with drink; and then there is always the great work."

"The great work!" echoed the old man regretfully. "Ah me, what dreams I had of it, what hopes, what ambitions! Dead, dead—all dead!"

"Your book will live," said Ruiz simply, "and it is so nearly done now."

"And the sands of life are so nearly run out," answered his companion. "And what a life! Dreary, unloved, desolate as any hermit's. Even fame could not quicken these old pulses by a single beat, or give my heart one throb of gladness. Ah, boy, there is no sadder thing in life than a lonely old age."

Ruiz was silent. He was thinking of how and where he had first met his strange companion; of how that promise to revisit him had been kept again and again, until, in the sudden shock and terror of finding himself a criminal, he had fled to the old recluse as to a refuge, and begged him for shelter for a brief space.

The old man had taken him into the Hall, and exacted a solemn promise of secrecy, and an assurance that the boy would never venture without the walls of Chalford, night or day, without his permission.

"I am old," he said, "but I like you, and feel I can trust you. I did so from the first hour I saw your face. You are as safe here as if the ocean rolled between you and those from whom you flee. I will bring you news of their welfare from time to time, but your existence will be shrouded in impenetrable mystery."

And so it had been.

No one at the rectory dreamt that the lost and long-sought-for cousin was living close within their reach, and all the remorse and longing of Opal's heart were unrelieved by any suspicion of his safety or well-doing.

The boy had a wild, romantic feeling that he had sacrificed his wealth in their favour. He never dreamt that law is a stubborn guardian, and demands strong proofs before relinquishing its rights. He had a strange desire, too, to be near Opal, to be within call, to hear of her welfare, to offer up his life, as it were, in a species of martyrdom that some day would win forgiveness for the errors of his passionate youth.

For four years he had lived with the old recluse, and for four years the old man had consciously deceived him. He still deemed himself Bertie's murderer; he still had fits of agony and remorse, as he thought of the bright boyish face lying cold and white in the winter sunset, with closed eyes whose mute reproach was as a knife-thrust in the heart of his slayer; and the old man knew it, and let him suffer.

He deemed it best to keep the boy in his power by this means, to use his strength and skill, his brains and hands, in mental and physical servitude; and time had drifted on, and Ruiz never complained, and how could the dim eyes of age read in that proud young face the dread dreariness of heartbreak, the haunting memories of despair?

Quiet, pale, studious, the boy had passed through four years of utter loneliness and privation, finding solace only in the wonders of that glorious study to which his promise bound him, absorbing himself gradually in its mysteries and discoveries, until he bid fair to rival his master.

And now it was Christmas Eve once more—the fourth anniversary of that night when he had fled hopeless and terror-stricken to this dreary refuge—and he sat there and listened to the old man babbling of his broken hopes and wasted youth, and thought to himself in proud resignation, "My life, too, is over."

He had never uttered a complaint. He had served the old man like a servant, and performed all the needful offices of their simple life, taking as his reward those hours of study and instruction which to many of his age would have been only penance. He was very weary often, but the young live on even against their will, and now he had become almost reconciled to his sombre and solitary existence.

It was only when sleep brought him some vision of his past life that he felt his spirit rebel against this dull monotony. At other times he did his best to forget that the sun of the south had warmed his veins, and given him those dreams of orange-groves, and blue bright skies, and music, and colour, and beautiful women, and bold men, that made all his memories of his own beloved land.

"Four years—it seems a lifetime," he muttered now as he crouched closer to the stove, and the stars shone out unheeded, forgotten alike by youth and age, while the bells chimed out on the midnight air the old, old message, "Peace and goodwill to all mankind."

CHAPTER VI. AWAKING.

THE bells had ceased to chime, but the two inmates of the turret-chamber still sat in immovable stillness. The old man had sunk into deep slumber, the younger was lost in thought.

The loneliness of the night, and the greater loneliness of his surroundings, did not trouble him. The sky shone crystal clear above his head, and the windows of the turret showed the starry galaxy sprinkled over that azure field, and tempting him to follow out their mystic rotation with the ardour such a pursuit inspired.

He had written much and studied much in those four years. He was at present engaged on an essay on variable stars, and spent every night that was clear and fine in observing.

The situation of the old Hall and the elevation of this special chamber made such observations very practicable, especially as the strange inhabitant of Chalford had accumulated many valuable scientific instruments for that purpose.

Who or what the old man was, Ruiz did not know. He had received no confidence on that point, and was too proud to ask for it. Sometimes for days together they hardly spoke to each other, and, though the boy had often wondered what secret weighed upon his strange companion's mind and bound him to such complete isolation, he manifested no curiosity on the subject.

At twenty years of age, Ruiz Milroy felt like an old man, and all the passionate emotions, and yearnings, and excitements of youth were as a dead letter to him. He lifted his head now, and looked at the sleeper with strange compassion. Would such a fate be his? Was his life also to be a haunted one—haunted by the shadow of a crime, the ghosts of dead passions, the memories of a brief dream of gladness?

The thought stung him to a sudden desperation, unlike the usual calm patience that characterised him. He rose and went to the east window, and looked out. The blue sky looked like a shield of polished steel; the stars seemed to say, "Study us, and we will repay you." The great telescope pointed invitingly to glittering Jupiter; but his mind was dwelling on things terrestrial to-night, and the solar system had lost something of its attraction.

His eyes—at first dreary and absorbed—grew restless and almost fierce. He felt as some wild jungle king might feel, caged and isolated from its species. Nature for once cried out against its enforced inaction, and pictured to him hopes, dreams, ambitions, glories far different to that philosophical abstraction in which he had tried to steep his soul.

His pulses leaped, the blood raced wildly through his veins. He flung open the window, and leaned out into the cool and frosty beauty of the night.

From the sky his eyes turned to the great park, and the weed-grown terraces, and the shining line of water that marked the boundaries of Chalford. To rove from them to the low broken wall, and rusty iron gate, and stagnant waters of the heron pool, was a natural consequence.

There they paused, arrested by a vision so strange and unexpected, that for a moment his heart ceased to beat, and a pang of fear shot through it. What he saw was a white figure fitting through the woods, and gliding towards the old gate. Reaching it, it stopped and looked over the broken wall towards the grim old building. The turret was so high and far off, that Ruiz could not possibly distinguish the features of this strange apparition, but the pang of fear died out as quickly as it had come, and he quitted the chamber, leaving the old man there asleep, and rushed down the staircase, through the corridor, and out at the side-door, which was his usual mode of egress. Once on the terrace he skirted the wall, and keeping in the shadow, he made his way towards the gate.

When he reached it, the figure had gone. He seized the trailing branches of ivy, and swung himself up to the top of the old wall.

From that vantage-point he could see a long distance, and he caught sight of the white floating garments a short distance off, as if the owner were skirting the boundary of the park. He sprang down as noiselessly and lightly as a cat, and hurried off in pursuit.

What strange curiosity prompted his actions he could not tell. He never thought of asking himself. An impulse stronger than reason guided him, and he obeyed that only.

A very few moments and he was near enough to touch the figure; another—and he was beside it.

To his amazement it suddenly turned, and, passing him so closely that the floating drapery brushed his feet, went back along the same way as he had pursued it. But one strange thing he noted, and that was the look in the wide-open eyes—a look strange, weird, and wholly unlike to any human expression.

A sudden thought flashed across his mind.

Was she a sleep-walker, this girl, whose face in the weird moonlight had looked without recognition at his, whose sunny hair hung round her like a cloud, whose eyes were like, yet unlike, those haunting violet eyes of his cousin Opal's?

Opal's! the word crossed his brain like a lightning flash. Was it—could it be?

He started off in fresh pursuit, it brought him to the gate, and there again the slender white-clad figure stood gazing over the ivied wall with those fixed, sightless eyes.

Impulsively, unwitting of harm or hurt, he grasped her arm.

"Opal!" he cried hoarsely.

He felt a shudder run through the slight young frame. Her whole body quivered and shook as if under the pressure of some intense physical suffering.

The eyes gleamed back with an awful look of horror and incomprehension—a cry left her lips, so wild and awful that it curdled the very blood in his veins. Then she fell down at his feet and lay there like one dead.

In an instant he flew to the gate, and tore at it, and shook it with the frenzy of almost superhuman strength. It gave way, and he seized the girl in his arms, and bore her into the old Hall. She lay in his arms like a log—stiff, cold, to all appearance lifeless; and terrified beyond all power of speech, he rushed up the broken stairway, and through the dusty dreary corridors, nor ever stopped till he came to the turret chamber.

The old man was still asleep, but that sudden entrance startled him. He opened his dazed eyes and stared at Ruiz in bewilderment.

The boy troubled him with no explanations. He laid his senseless burden close to the stove; he rushed to an inner room and brought out rugs and pillows, and piled them on the bare floor, and lifted her on to them, and chafed her cold and frozen hands in an agony of dread.

"Who is she? Why do you bring her here?" asked the old man at last, as he tottered feebly over to the senseless figure and stood leaning above it.

"It is Opal—it is my cousin!" cried Ruiz wildly. "Oh, is she dead? Will she never look at me?"

"Opal Milroy! Here at this time. What brought her?"

"Sleep, I should say," answered Ruiz despairingly. "I remember the boys telling me of her strange habit once. I found her walking to and fro beside the old east gate, and when I spoke and woke her she screamed and fell down like this. Oh, she moves, does she not? Oh, say she won't die also."

"If it is as you say, it is a dangerous thing," said the old man. "But what matter if she dies? Your secret will be safe then."

"My secret!" he cried bitterly. "Do you think I place that in the balance with her life? Better suffering—prison—death, than that she should perish thus."

The old man looked at him grimly.

"And this is my reward," he said. "You would sacrifice all the labour of years for the sake of a foolish girl. What is she, or her life to you?"

"My life also, I think," he answered softly, and a dusky flush crept over his face as in sudden, tender shame he bent it over the motionless form.

He had not known how that face and memory had haunted him till now; he had not dreamt what possibilities life held, or what he had denied himself in the future.

She stirred and moved, a deep sigh parted her lips, and that warm, sweet breath seemed to him as the scents of Paradise. His arm was still round her, her hand still lay in his. Suddenly he felt the slight figure thrill and tremble in his clasp. Her eyes opened on his face, not startled or surprised now, but only glad with the gladness of a happy dream. An instant, and as her head drooped on his breast he bent and touched her lips with the passion of youth and the reverence of joy.

"Opal!" he murmured dreamily, "oh, how happy I am to see you again!"

The girl's languid eyes unclosed.

"This is like death—or heaven," she said faintly. "Is it you, Ruiz, or do I only dream?"

"Ah no, it is no dream," he whispered passionately, almost wondering that the eloquence and gladness of his heart could find no better utterance than these commonplace words. "I am here beside you."

She struggled into a sitting position, and looked wildly and affrightedly round the strange room.

"How did I come here?" she cried in terror, as her scared eyes caught sight of the old man standing by the axis of the telescope, and watching her furtively.

Ruiz rose to his feet looking rather embarrassed.

"I—I brought you," he said timidly, and his face flushed like a girl's.

"You!" Her dazed senses, arrested by strong effort, went back on lines of memory to seek for solution of this mystery. But they could find none. Then her eyes travelled slowly downwards and saw her strange attire—her bare feet that had been thrust into slippers, her long flowing hair, and white loose garments, and the blood flew in a crimson torrent to her face and neck.

She could not speak for shame, and wonder, and agony of mind. She covered her face with her hands and trembled in every limb. Ruiz pitied her, but he was equally abashed and bewildered, and he knew there was something about her appearance that was unusual and unlike what he remembered in the days of old.

"You—I think you were walking in your sleep," he faltered at last. "I did not know. You looked so strange, and I spoke, and then you screamed and fainted, and so I brought you here. At least it is warm and sheltered, and we can send word to your home if you wish."

"It seems all so strange," murmured the girl faintly. "And you, Ruiz, how is it you are here? For four years we have been searching for you high and low, and yet—"

"And yet he was at your very gates," said the old man grimly.

"Why did you leave us?" asked Opal, forgetting even her strange adventure in this new interest, and gazing with rapt and wondering eyes at the beautiful, dark face above her. "Did you never think how we grieved, wondered, sought you?"

"No," he said simply. "I knew you all hated me, and I had taken your brother's life—or so you thought—though my hand never dealt that blow, I can swear to that."

"His life!" cried Opal wonderingly, and turning her bright eyes from one face to the other; "what do you mean? Bertie is alive and well. He was lame for some time after that fall, but he always told me it was his own fault—his own temper occasioned it."

"Alive!" Ruiz turned and faced the old man with eyes aflame and indignant. "Did you not know this?" he said slowly.

The old man was silent.

Ruiz drew himself up to his full height. Light, hope, joy, the gladness of a new and wonderful relief, flooded his heart, and gave to his face an almost unearthly ecstasy. With a sort of sob he caught his breath, and threw himself beside Opal.

"Oh, to think of it—to think of it!" he cried wildly. "After four years! I have lived here believing myself a murderer, picturing you as hating my very name—"

"I never did that," said Opal with a beautiful blush. "I know we were all very unkind to you. We did not mean it. We were young and spoilt, and did not understand or even try to understand you. I think, when you left us, we felt that every day, and would have given anything to undo the past. But it was too late."

She had forgotten everything, her appearance, her strange visit here, the old man's presence. A sudden sense of what those four years had meant to the lonely suffering boy came home to her, and her heart grew hot with passionate pity, and her eyes spoke back to his in sweet compassion.

That long, bashful, eloquent look told more than any words, and stirred to life such feelings as neither had dreamt of before.

To Ruiz it seemed as if heaven had opened to his gaze. Never could any moments in after-life be like this strange time that was all joy, and rapture, and wonder fused into the strong fire of his ardent nature, glad with such gladness as never comes twice in a lifetime.

"Let us go home," he said at last, rising and looking round the cheerless room, forgetful now of all charms of science and ambition.

Opal rose too, and the white garments and fleecy woollen shawl fell round her graceful figure like the draperies of a Greek statue.

"Yes, we will go," she said with a shudder. "Some instinct drew me here to-night. I cannot tell what. I know I was dreaming of the old Hall, and striving to reach it, and the gate was barred, and I only saw that stern, forbidding face warning me back; and then I seemed to look and saw—you."

He looked at her with eyes so eloquent that words were scarcely needed. Then he drew her arm in his, and turned to the old and shrinking figure of the old man still leaning there in the dusk of the cheerless room.

"For four years you have deceived me," he said curtly. "I did your work. I kept my promise. I do not reproach you, for you are old and unhappy, I know. Perhaps you did not think of how I suffered. If you had been honest with me I would not have left you as I do. Your secret is your own still, and I will breathe no word of my stay here if you forbid me. And now farewell."

The old man raised his head and looked sadly at the two beautiful young figures.

"Fate is against me still," he said mournfully. "I warned you how it would be. Fate is always a woman. Well, go your way, leaving me in peace. I deceived you—true, but it was for your good. You might have been a great man. I suppose you prefer to be a woman's slave. Get you gone, and say of me what you please!"

Ruiz took Opal's hand, and led her away. He could not trust himself to speak.

CHAPTER VII. REQUIESCAT IN PACE.

IF Ruiz had once deemed himself an unwelcome intruder at the rectory he could do so no longer.

The family were roused up by Opal's return, and flocked down, startled and alarmed at her summons; but when they saw her companion and heard his strange story, they seemed to find no words or means enough to show their gratitude and delight.

There was no thought of going to bed again. The boys lit the fire in the shabby old parlour, and ravaged the larder for stores; and they all sat round the fire and feasted right merrily; and what with hand-shakings, and embraces, and kisses, poor Ruiz felt absolutely bewildered.

But how happy he was, and how merry they all were, and how radiant and sweet Opal looked, coming down to them after a quarter of an hour spent in donning some wonderful garment of dark cloth with cunning little knots of scarlet here and there, that made her look lovelier than ever in Ruiz Milroy's eyes. And the Rev. Amos sat and beamed on them all with his grey hair still rubbed persistently up the wrong way. And Mrs. Milroy, with her cap awry and her sweet, anxious face quite placid and joyful, could not make fuss enough of the "young savage," and between her embraces, sat and looked at him with eyes half glad and half tearful, and wholly loving, just as his own mother might have looked had she been there.

As for Ruiz himself, he could not talk much, or eat much, though he tried his best, for his heart seemed too full, and his eyes had an unaccountable way of getting suddenly dim. It seemed so strange that all this love and gladness had been waiting to warm his starved heart for all these cold and empty years, and he had never known or credited the possibility of such a thing.

And then how the boys tormented Opal and declared their intention of putting outside bolts and padlocks to the doors and windows of her room, and how the jests and teasing ceased when their father, raising his ruffled grey head, laid his hand on the girl's sunny hair, and said:

"It must have been Providence who guided your steps thither, my child," and what untold eloquence was in Ruiz's eyes as he looked at her, and said softly:

"I think so, too."

Then at last the rector and his wife bade them good-night, though indeed it was quite daybreak, and the young folks drew closer round the fire, and Opal sat shy and silent by the side of the returned prodigal, and when he timidly clasped her hand, let it rest unrebuked in his.

And whether the boys saw or guessed they were not wanted, is hard to say, but certainly one by one they dropped off, and Opal roused herself with a start, saying she too must go, and could he find his way to his own old room? and he, not answering, looked up, and meeting her eyes, grew faint and trembled like a leaf.

Seeing her so shy and frightened, he put his arm round the beautiful dainty waist, trembling too at his own boldness.

"You are glad—really glad, to have me back again?" he whispered.

And though she could have thrown herself at his feet and poured out a torrent of words, so full was her heart, and so happy, that she only dropped her head—meekly, coyly, like a flower faint with sunlight, and said quite as softly:

"Yes."

"You have been with me all these years," he continued, growing bolder as he felt his power and saw how fair, and sweet, and yielding she was; "I have never forgotten you, or your promise."

"What promise?" she asked, very, very faintly now.

"That you would be my—sister—too."

She was silent, and her heart beat strangely fast, as surely no sister's heart had need to beat for assurance of a brother's love.

"But, after all," continued Ruiz, still more boldly, "I am not sure that I wish you to keep that promise. I want something else, Opal."

"What?" she asked even more faintly.

"I want you to love me, as I love you—as I have loved you since first I came here, a savage, ignorant boy, to whom you were as an angel of goodness."

He could be eloquent enough now; how could he help it, looking down at those softly crimsoned cheeks, those long bashful fringes—feeling the quick beat of the passionate young heart answering his own, as only youth and love can answer to each other?

"What do you know of—love?" she said at last. "You have only studied the stars these four years, so you told me; and why may I not be your sister still?"

"Look in my eyes, and answer me."

But she could not, for she knew—though she had not studied the stars for four years—that it was no sister's love her heart held; she had known it from the moment her eyes had met his again in the weird silence of the turret-chamber.

"If you can only be my sister," said Ruiz presently, "it will be better for me to go back to the old Hall and study the stars again; shall I, Opal?"

Her cheeks paled suddenly; the little hands clasped themselves round his arm. Her eyes looked up to his in sudden terror.

"Oh no, no!" she cried. "We cannot lose you again. You could not be so cruel, Ruiz."

"Then say, 'Stay for my sake!'"

A lovely smile curved her lips.

"That is like your old masterful self," she said; "you should say, 'if you please.'"

He laughed too, remembering their first battle and her victory.

"If—you please."

Again her head drooped, but this time it fell coyly, naturally, on his breast.

"Stay for my sake, Ruiz," she whispered obediently.

His lips answered her.

It was a week later.

Ruiz Milroy had almost forgotten the old tenant of Chalford in the glory and gladness of his young love-dream. Those dreary years, those mystic studies, the ambition that he had told himself would suffice to fill his life, had all faded into the background of some far-off past. Suffering, misery, privation, all these things were as though they had never been. Yet suddenly and sharply they were recalled to him.

He had received a letter on this morning of the closing year, containing only a few words, but though unsigned and undated, he knew who had written them.

"I am dying, and I would fain see you before my life ends. Come to me to-night, in the turret-chamber. Tell no one of this message."

Ruiz felt somewhat perplexed and distressed as he read. But he went, saying nothing to anyone but Opal.

It was about nine o'clock when he left the rectory. A clear, crisp, frosty night; such a night as he would but a brief while before have spent in long study and abstruse calculations. Now it was only filled with dreams and excited hopes, and the rich promise of years to come.

Never had he thought the old Hall looked so gloomy and melancholy as it looked now. It seemed a place utterly beyond the reach of such joy and gladness as filled his own heart and the home he had just left.

It seemed strange to him to tread the old desolate terrace, and make his way along the familiar galleries and corridors, till he reached the door that cut off the winding staircase leading to the turret-chamber. This door had always been kept locked. It was unlocked now, and he turned the handle and speedily found himself in the old room. There was no light in it save the dull glow of the embers, and the starlight from without. For a moment he stood there bewildered. Then, as his eyes grew accustomed to the gloom, he saw a pallet-bed on the floor, and seated by it a woman.

She rose and faced him in the dull light, a tall graceful figure, with a face tired and haggard, but bearing still the marks of great beauty.

"Are you Ruiz Milroy?" she said.

"Yes," answered the astonished youth, marvelling who on earth was addressing him.

"He has been expecting you," she said, and motioned him forward.

Ruiz advanced and saw, stretched on the bed, the familiar figure of the old astronomer.

The woman bent over the stove and lit a small lamp, and placed it on the table. Then she withdrew, and Ruiz, silent and amazed, seated himself beside the motionless form. The old man opened his eyes and looked at him.

"I thought you would come," he muttered feebly.

His fingers plucked at the coverlet of the bed, his head moved restlessly from side to side.

"I—I could not die without seeing you," he went on presently.

"I want you to say you—forgive. I wronged you, but I wanted to keep you with me. I liked you from the first. I told you that. Sometimes I thought I would tell you the truth—but I had not courage."

"I forgive you freely," said Ruiz gently and compassionately.

"Do not distress yourself. After all, these years have not been wasted. I have learnt much. I owe you a large debt of gratitude for all your teaching."

"And you are happy now," muttered the old man, "happy and beloved. I was that once, and I lost all—all—all! I have often wanted to tell you my story. That woman you saw was my wife. My wife, whom I wronged, misjudged, ill-used—ah, Heaven forgive me!—nearly murdered. I thought I had murdered her. That thought has haunted all my life, and embittered every hour of these terrible years. She was young and beautiful, and I was old and jealous, and selfish too, for I thought more of my books and pursuits than of her, and let her fair young life eat itself out in loneliness and grief. We are an unfortunate and an evil race, we Chalfords. I am glad now that with me the race is ended. I often meant to tell you, but I lacked courage. I wanted to make you my heir; a poor enough inheritance the old Hall is, but still it is yours—after her. No other living creature has any claim upon me. I want to think that in years to come a new race will atone for the crimes of the old, and in you I see one worthy—worthy—"

His voice broke. That brief strength seemed deserting him. Ruiz bent over him anxiously.

"Do not speak more," he said; "you are fatigued and weak. Rest now and I will watch you."

The glazed and languid eyes looked gratefully at the young face. Then they closed in very weariness.

Ruiz sat silently there thinking of the strange story he had heard—understanding by it much of the mystery and loneliness of this haunted life.

An hour passed. The old man slept on tranquilly. The same weird stillness as of old reigned in the little chamber and round the deserted building.

Ruiz heard the door of the adjoining room open and saw that dark, graceful, woman-form glide in and take her seat beside the sleeper, but she spoke no word—nor did he.

Another hour took its flight. The woman sat with bowed head, waiting. The young man watched the silent figures, himself almost as still as they. Suddenly on the midnight air chimed out the sound of bells—bells glad, joyous, turbulent, ringing in new days, new hopes, new joys, and griefs; ringing out, too, the ended sorrows of an ended life; for, as the sounds ceased to echo on the midnight air, a sigh broke the silence of the chamber, and the face upon the pillows grew grey and set in the solemn rigidity of death.

The watchers rose. The woman's eyes were full of tears—the pale face looked sadder still in the shadow of a new grief. "Leave me now," she said, looking up to Ruiz; "you were good to him, and I thank you. But there is no more to do. You have obeyed his last wish. Heaven bless you for that, and give you the happiness he might once have had, and flung away."

She gave him her hand, and he took it, and looked with grave sympathy at her worn, pathetic beauty.

Then he left her standing there, with the solemn starlight falling on the dead face that had once looked love to hers.

The sorrow of these haunted lives touched him with strange sympathy, pointing as they did with the force of an unexpiated sin to the records of the past, the hopelessness of the future.

He looked at the old Hall as the gate fell back on its rusty hinges. There he had learned life's deepest lessons—from thence he had bought the fruits of learning, patience, endurance.

Those four years had not been wasted. He saw that now—now as he turned away from the records of that sad and misspent life, and by the light of its teaching read the way to purify and amend his own.

A Christmas Welcome.

BY JOSEPH DILLEY.

Is good old Christmas dead? The jovial King
Who brought a thousand pastimes in his train:

The gracious guest, whose yearly welcoming
Made castle, hall, and cottage ring again?
Where have they gone—the hissing "wassail bowle,"

The tables groaning with their ponderous cheer,
The open house, the universal dole,
The yule-log, and the brand of yester-year?

Where have they gone—the boar's head garlanded,
The peacock pie, the "puddings in a pulse"?
Into what Lethe have the masquers fled?

Where reign the lords whose kingdom was misrule?
Where is the "Paon," through whose stately maze
Our costumed grand-dames tript with solemn air?

The boisterous "disportes" of those merrier days,
When ancient Christmas held his annual fair?

All, all are gone! Pageant and sport are cast
Into the limbo of forgotten things.

Christmas himself, grey-bearded, totters past,
A veritable shadow amongst kings.

No noisy retinue the "wassail" raise;
He comes and goes a potentate apart.

Nothing he brings to us, who stand and gaze—
Only outstretched hand, and true, warm heart.

Only outstretched hand, and true, warm heart!
Ah! by that sign we welcome him again;

The old fantastic mummery may depart—
The bright glad face, the laughing eyes remain.

Dear Christmastide! for us, as for our sires,
You bring the joys that knit us to our kin;

The listening circle round the winter fires,
The storm without, the warmth of love within!

You bring us peace! What, tho' the city lies
Pallid and ghostly in its shroud of white,

Its pulse still beats; from countless hearths still rise
The happy sounds of innocent delight.

Home is your empire still! The fireside ease,
The "guiltless mirth," our flagging hearts that cheer:

No HOUSEHOLD WORDS more dear to us than these—
"A Merry Christmas, and a glad New Year!"

Banker Thorn's Bargain.

BY R. E. MULLEY.

CHAPTER I.

"STIR UP" Sunday had come and gone, and at Dovecote Major, as elsewhere, the approaching Christmastide was making itself known by active preparations on all sides to give it a hearty welcome, while away up in London, seated before his desk in Messrs. Keeper and Spender's bank, Con Constantine, a young man who ought to have known better, was balancing, not the accounts, but his own chances of finding under the mistletoe somebody who, though she lives so far away in the little west country village, was always being conjured up like some pleasant vision to cheer him in his dingy office. Many a dull hour had been lightened to him by her visionary presence at his elbow, and by the sound of a voice that was unheard of any ears but his own.

Mr. Constantine was so deeply buried in his calculations, that one of the younger clerks had called him by name more than once in vain before he heard.

"Yes?" he said, waking up at last.

"You are wanted in Mr. Spender's private room."

Edited by Charles Dickens.

Con whistled, laid down his pen, and betook himself to Mr. Spender's presence.

"You sent for me, sir, I believe?" said the young man, addressing a tall, lank gentleman who, his back to the fire, was standing with his coat-tails slung over his arms like a pair of panniers.

"We did," returned Mr. Spender. "We wished to speak with you."

Mr. Keeper had long ago retired, first from the bank and then from a world of banks; but Mr. Spender continued to live and move and have his being in the plural, such a form of speech being, it was commonly supposed, a graceful tribute to the memory of his late partner.

"You are a west country man, Mr. Constantine?" asserted Mr. Spender enquiringly. "Your name leads us to think so."

"Yes," said Con.

"We thought so. Now under such circumstances there would be nothing unusual, nothing to excite curiosity, if you were to run down to Dovecote Major for a few days?"

"Oh, nothing at all," said Con eagerly. "I certainly had hoped to go there for bank-holiday."

"We cannot wait till then," said Mr. Spender. "To be frank with you, Mr. Constantine, we are uneasy—very uneasy. We have lately heard some most unpleasant rumours respecting Thorn's Bank, and it would be a great advantage to us if we could know whether or not there is any real ground for doubting the solvency of the firm. I suppose you have heard nothing?"

"Not a whisper of it," said the clerk.

"Do you happen to be personally acquainted with Mr. Thorn?" Mr. Spender asked.

"Banker Thorn?" answered Con, using the prefix which in Dovecote Major distinguished Mr. Thorn the banker from all other Thorns. "Oh yes, I know him, only we don't happen to be on speaking terms just now. You see," added Con, "Dovecote Major isn't exactly the abode of peace. The whole parish is at sixes and sevens, and I suppose when I was down there in the summer I caught the common epidemic of quarrelsomeness; at any rate, Banker Thorn managed to quarrel with me—not about money," Con hastened to explain, "it was a purely private matter, and, of course, should you send me down on business I should sink my individuality in Messrs. Keeper and Spender's confidential clerk."

"No, no!" cried Mr. Spender. "We would rather you went down quite casually, you know, and picked up what information you could in an informal manner. We should be unwilling by any action on our part to give colour to the reports flying about. All the same, we would, if possible, avoid being ourselves involved in—"

"Exactly," said Con, supplying the blank left in Mr. Spender's speech.

"But you may hold yourself in readiness to act on our behalf, should we deem it advisable to take any steps in the matter. Believing you would fully recognise the need of prudence," said Mr. Spender approvingly, "we chose you, Mr. Constantine, in preference to either of our other clerks. It will not be necessary for you to inform them of your destination or its object. You had better start this evening, and we shall not expect you to return before bank-holiday, unless unforeseen circumstances should oblige us to recall you. Your expenses, Mr. Constantine, will be our affair."

"Thank you, sir," said Con, hardly able to believe that the path of duty, which is generally so remarkably unattractive, should lead him to Dovecote Major, and to Banker Thorn's grand-daughter.

Dovecote Major, towards which Con Constantine was being carried at express speed through the midnight darkness, lay some thirteen hours' distance from London, and nine miles from the nearest railway-station.

Out of the world, Cockneys called it, this wild stretch of moorland, within sight and sound of the sea, where, centuries back, pious hands had raised the big grey church, whose tower served as a landmark then as now to the seafaring folk. People had come and settled themselves round about until quite a little town grew up and at last stopped growing altogether, and, scorning all modern improvements, remained at a standstill, stagnating contentedly.

Gossip was the only product of the sleepy little town that thrived and never flagged, and Con Constantine counted upon picking up a good deal of the informal information Mr. Spender required of him over Miss Polwhele's green card-tables; but Con arrived a day too late, for Miss Polwhele's whist-party had taken place the preceding evening. In fact, while he was getting his ticket at Paddington, Miss Maria, to her partner's consternation, and the glee of her opponents, revoked.

"I thought you very hasty to trump, Maria," said the elder Miss Polwhele, who was playing against her younger sister. "It's the first time diamonds have been out."

"The first time for seven years," said Maria abstractedly.

"It would be the last time if I were Robina Constantine," said Miss Polwhele acidly, while Maria's partner put down her cards with considerable irritation.

"What are you thinking about, Maria?" she asked indignantly.

"The reconciliation," explained Miss Maria. "It was beautiful, and coming so near Christmas too! And just now, when they cut for partners, their cards fell together. It seemed quite providential."

Miss Robina Constantine continued to regard her partner with annoyed forbearance. Then she said:

"If you are alluding to Banker Thorn and Mrs. Charles, I prefer them at daggers drawn, it is more natural. I never heard either say a civil word of the other yet, and if they begin now, I shall never believe it's true."

"It won't be half so entertaining," said Miss Polwhele regretfully.

"I am sure if everybody shook hands all round, just because it happened to be Christmas, I, for one, should be very dull. Maria may revel in sentiment if she chooses. Give me a good long-standing quarrel, with a sharp tongue on both sides, not one of your foes to-day, friends to-morrow, which is as aggravating as revoking. And now we will go on, if you please."

"Miss Robina, we are waiting for you," said Miss Polwhele with such asperity that Maria was startled into playing out of her turn, after which there was no more dullness.

CHAPTER II.

THE reconciliation which had so fatally unsettled Miss Maria Polwhele's mind was a recent as well as an astounding event. Every man, woman, and child in Dovecote Major knew that between Banker Thorn and his eldest son's widow no love was lost, and that for years, beyond a passing greeting in the streets, they had not spoken; therefore, it was with self-doubting eyes that the Misses Polwhele, from their house on the right, and Miss Constantine, from her window at the left of the bank, had, that afternoon, seen Mrs. Charles Thorn standing on the step leading to her father-in-law's door, chatting amicably with that gentleman himself.

The conversation was quite a friendly one now, but in its beginning, at the bank counter, it had threatened to be stormy.

Mrs. Charles had entered the bank within ten minutes of the hour of closing, and had given a cheque into Banker Thorn's own hands; he looked at it, turned it over once or twice, and then looked at his daughter-in-law. There was a moment's silence, and then he leaned forward.

"Clarissa," he said in a low voice, "what is the meaning of this?"

Mrs. Charles Thorn's thin lips slid into a half smile. She raised her eyes—they were the pale, bluish-grey eyes that frequently go with her shade of dark red hair—and their usually shifting pupils rested on her father-in-law's face for full a minute before she answered him:

"I should like my money."

A certain emphasis on the two pronouns made her simple reply sound almost like a challenge, and Banker Thorn's ear detected the tone.

"It is rather late to count out so large a sum" he said, consulting the clock.

"There are five minutes yet," said she.

Banker Thorn bit his lip. "If you will go in there I will give it you," he replied. "Open the door for Mrs. Charles," he said to one of the clerks, sitting near the green-laid door which led into that part of the building that formed Banker Thorn's own house.

Mrs. Charles passed through. The banker followed her without leaving any orders for the cashing of the cheque, indeed he still held it in his hand when he stood by the fire in his study, facing Mrs. Charles, who had seated herself in the big easy-chair that was sacred to himself. She knew it was so, and had taken it as a further token that she was aware of having him at a disadvantage.

"That cheque is only for my balance," she said. "Of course I should like to realise what poor Charles left me in bank-shares, but I hardly know how to set about it. Shall I instruct my stock-brokers to sell, or are you prepared to take up my shares? I might offer them to Miss Polwhele, but she would be sure to ask me why I want to get rid of them," she continued.

"And why do you?" asked the banker.

"Why do rats leave a sinking ship?" retorted Mrs. Charles.

"Who has told you Thorn's is in that pleasant predicament?" said the banker bitterly.

"A little bird," said Mrs. Charles—"a London sparrow. Things get talked about in town long before the news reaches here as a rule, but I manage to hear a good deal."

Banker Thorn silently cursed the chance that had brought his present embarrassments to his daughter-in-law's knowledge, but he accepted the situation.

"We may weather the storm yet," he said.

"Personally, I prefer not being on board," remarked Mrs. Charles.

"It will be very inconvenient to give you so much money just now."

"I dare say!" she replied; "but it will be more inconvenient to pay all your creditors, and what I know, they may get a hint of—"

The banker coughed.

"Hush!" he said nervously, looking about him anxiously. "Hush, some one may hear you, Clarissa! For Heaven's sake be careful what you say. If a suspicion of this got wind it would be all up with me, half the county would be clamouring for their money. If I can keep up my credit over next settling-day, I may succeed in doing so altogether."

"Provided I am on the right side of the hedge," said Mrs. Charles, "I have no objection to you being there too."

"I am much obliged to you, Clarissa," said her father-in-law with faint sarcasm.

"If you do your part," she said, "I am ready to do mine. Give me my money, and I will hold my tongue."

The banker regarded his daughter-in-law with grudging admiration. He hated her cordially, but he could not deny that he had to deal with a woman whose friendship would be more useful to him than her enmity.

"Well, well," he said, "your shares shall not go into the market. Eight hundred pounds, I think, Charles left you of our stock. I will take it of you at a thousand. I am making you a good offer," he added, finding she demurred.

"You ought to know the value of your own shares," said Mrs. Charles dryly.

"Would you have taken less?" retorted Banker Thorn.

"Not from you, certainly," she returned coolly. "I felt sure you would see the mutual advantages of the transaction."

"I am glad we understand each other so well, Clarissa," said the banker. "And now I suppose you would like this cheque cashed?"

As he spoke, he unlocked his davenport, and taking from it a bundle of notes, began to count them over.

"There!" he said, "there is the hundred and fifty."

Mrs. Charles Thorn re-counted them.

"Quite right," she said. "And how do you propose arranging for the larger sum?"

"You won't want to carry it away on the spot, in hard cash, in a hand-bag?" said her father-in-law evasively, with a constrained laugh.

"It would be safer," she said. "But if I don't have it in cash, or at least Bank of England notes, you must make it worth my while to take anything else."

"Exchange is no robbery," said the banker.

"It is generally remarkably one-sided," said Mrs. Charles. "But what do you offer?"

"Foreign securities."

Mrs. Charles laughed in his face.

"Foreign insecurities, you mean."

"Nonsense!" said the banker testily. "I made a very good investment some time ago, thinking that Clare could be provided for out of it if—anything went wrong."

"Then you had better provide for her at once," said Mrs. Charles.

"No," said Banker Thorn; "I only wish to save two or three thousand for her to have eventually. Just at present I prefer to have the spending of my own money."

"Oh, I see," said Mrs. Charles; "it is Clare's or yours as occasion offers. Whose will it be when the crash comes? Not yours, for the creditors could claim it. Not Clare's; she is quixotic, and would give it up to them. What shall you do with it—bury it in the back garden?"

There was an eager tone in her voice in spite of an evident effort to speak carelessly, even derisively.

Banker Thorn turned towards her and looked at her keenly, as he laid a large packet on the writing-table and smoothed the papers out; they rustled and crackled as only paper money can. The sound was almost as alluring as the clink of gold to Mrs. Charles Thorn's ears. She loved money with an intensity of passion that could call up expression even into her pale colourless eyes. They lit up now with feverish excitement.

Banker Thorn watched the growing eagerness in his daughter-in-law's face with a feeling of contemptuous wonder. In his eyes, money was only valuable for what it could buy. Hers was the true miser's temperament—a craving for possession its strongest development. She rose from her chair, came and stood beside him. She could not have analysed the impulse that drove her to do so, and yet it was very closely allied to the one that had compelled her to ask what would be done with the money. It was an unspoken, almost unformed thought, "If it were mine!"

"I have often wished," said Banker Thorn, "that I knew someone in whose hands this five thousand pounds' worth of bonds would be safe till all this has blown over."

He paused; he looked at his daughter-in-law again. She was listening intently. He went on:

"Now, if you had them, Clarissa, you could pay yourself, and still have a large sum left to feast your eyes on. The coupons are payable to bearer. I should make no claim on the interest so long as the capital was out of my possession."

Mrs. Charles put out her hand, and then drew it back.

"Are you sure I am quite safe in taking them?" she said. "I don't want to lay myself open to a charge of compounding a felony, or anything of that kind."

"Compounding a fiddlestick!" said the banker sharply. "Listen to me, Clarissa. So long as you do not tell anyone of the little Christmas present I have made you, I shall not—I have no wish to be compelled to ask for it back again to sacrifice to my creditors."

The hand that Mrs. Charles Thorn now held out to her father-in-law was not withdrawn again.

"I can keep my own counsel," she said.

"Very good," said Banker Thorn; "then I will give the bonds over to you for the present."

Clarissa Thorn watched him impatiently whilst he folded them smoothly into as small a packet as was possible, put it into brown-paper, and tied it up. He did not hurry himself in the least, though he could see that it was only by a violent effort of self-control that she forced herself to wait till it was ready. At last it was hers. The banker felt her hands trembling with excitement as she took it from him.

"I will go straight home with it," she said.

"Do," said her father-in-law.

He accompanied her out of the room, across the hall to the front-door. With his hand on the latch, he said:

"Now, Clarissa, you perfectly understand that not only this," he touched the brown-paper parcel lightly, "but also my purchase of your shares, is a purely private transaction between you and me."

"Of course," said Mrs. Charles; "that, as well as my reason for selling them."

A young girl coming down the stairs overheard the last few words exchanged between the two in the hall. She stopped a moment, looking down on Mrs. Charles Thorn's face with an expression of dislike and mistrust.

The banker opened the door and let his visitor out. He stood on the mat watching her go down the steps.

"You are a prudent woman, Mrs. Charles," he said to himself. "I wonder if I have been as prudent. Anyhow, I don't think she will squander it." And he laughed as he turned indoors again and let down the chain.

"Grandpapa," said a voice behind him—the young lady on the stairs had come down, and was waiting in the hall; "grandpapa, will you please give me some money to pay these bills?"

"I can't, my dear," he said. "I have just given my last shilling to your aunt Clarissa."

"What did she come for?" cried the girl indignantly. "Did she make herself very disagreeable?"

"Yes and no," said the banker, pinching his grand-daughter's pretty ear. "But we parted friends. Do you know, Clare, I think we must be a little more polite to Mrs. Charles. You shall make a very fine Christmas pudding, and invite her to come and eat it with us."

"Grandpapa!" protested the girl.

Banker Thorn shrugged his shoulders, and went back to his study without further remark.

CHAPTER III.

It was a clear sunny morning, with just a suspicion of frost in the air; away westward the sea glistened and danced in a line so bright, that it dazzled Miss Constantine's eyes, and she had to shade them with her hand. She had been half-way to Tregellas in her donkey-cart, and now she was on her way home to Dovecote.

"There is something wrong," she said aloud.

Balaam took the remark as a personal attack, and endeavoured to mend matters by starting off at a quick trot, shaking stout Miss Robina till she grew very red in the face, and puffed and panted almost as much as if she had been toiling up the hill on her own short legs, instead of being in the little yellow cart, which was known within a radius of six miles as Miss Robina's "shay," but which she uncompromisingly called her donkey-cart.

"There's something wrong," she said again.

At that moment a slight young figure jumped off a gate and came to meet her. As if by intuition, Balaam declined to move another pace, stretching out a soft, velvety grey nose for a friendly stroke from the new comer. The girl gave the accustomed caress, and then held out her hand to Balaam's mistress.

The old lady did not take it, she merely nodded and patted the empty seat beside her.

"Jump in, Clare," she said, "I have something to say to you."
 "And I to you," the girl answered. "I have been waiting on the gate for the last half-hour. Grandpapa brought me thus far in the gig; he has gone on to Tregellas, and I am supposed to be walking home."

"He did not count upon your meeting me, I can readily imagine," said Miss Robina. "I am not poor Con, but I am Con's poor aunt."

In the meantime Banker Thorn's granddaughter had settled herself on the wide substantial plank that did duty for a seat in Miss Robina's "shay." Either from the exertion or at the mention of poor Con, Clare Thorn blushed becomingly, but she neither smiled nor looked conscious. She only turned a pair of grave grey eyes on Miss Robina's face with a seriousness that was not untouched by anxiety.

"Have you any money in our bank?" the girl asked abruptly.

"Con holds some shares, I believe. I am only a depositor. Why do you ask? Is there anything wrong?"

"I don't know," Clare Thorn answered slowly, "but if I were you I should draw my money out."

"Mercy on us, Clare!" In her astonishment Miss Robina dropped the reins, which made no difference to Balaam, who was too high-principled to take that opportunity of running away. "What put such an idea into your head?"

"Miss Robina," said Clare, "Aunt Clarissa has drawn out hers."

"And what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander—eh?" said Miss Robina with an amused smile at her own simile. "But you are right, my dear; your Aunt Clarissa no doubt acted under advice, and what you tell me explains the anomaly of Banker Thorn and his son's widow on friendly terms. How long is it since they quarrelled over that lawsuit—seven years?"

Clare nodded.

"They quarrelled over money," Miss Robina resumed, "and now they have made it up over money, have they? It looks bad."

The sound of approaching wheels attracted her attention; she looked round.

"Will that be your grandfather, Clare?"

"I don't think so," said the girl; "he told me to wait dinner for him. Miss Robina, it is—"

"Con!" cried Miss Robina.

The driver pulled up short, that his "fare" was the nephew of the stout old lady who was smiling and nodding vigorously from her shay, he knew well enough—knew equally well that "Masster" Con was over head and ears in love with the pretty young lady by Miss Robina's side.

"There ain't no call for yew to bide, your missis sez to me, 'yew can be gwine on,' so I comed," Clem explained later on to Tamsin, at Miss Constantine's back-door, as he handed over Con's bag and baggage, adding: "He waz out o' cart and over to Miss Clare, a'most afor' I'd time to stop. Miss Robina, her sat still an' laffed at 'em!"

Miss Robina had waited for her turn, and Con was duly grateful. "You dear old woman!" he said, "will you take me in for a week?"

"No," said Miss Robina, laughing.

"Grandpapa will be delighted to see you," said Clare demurely, with a contradictory twinkle in her grey eyes.

Con laughed too.

"I almost expect to be asked to dinner at the bank, when I find you driving behind Balaam with Aunt Robina. When did she bury the hatchet?"

Clare shook her head.

"Aunt Clarissa has done that; we are to dine together on Christmas Day, that is, if we have any dinner to eat."

"What do you mean?" Con asked quickly.

"Clare is taking a low-spirited view of things," explained Miss Robina. "Because Mrs. Charles Thorn has taken her money out of the bank, Clare believes it to be on the point of a grand crash; she has been imploring me to close my account."

"Clare," said Con in a slightly bantering tone, "Clare, have you played the warning prophet to any of the other shareholders?"

"I never thought of them," she said, in guilty confusion.

"And what made you think of Aunt Robina?" enquired Miss Constantine's nephew.

Clare looked about her on all sides, except the one where that young man was standing, thoughtfully pulling Balaam's ears.

"I think I will get down here, if Balaam will stop a moment," she said.

But Balaam did not stop, for Con had him by the collar and started off with him at a smart trot, so that there was no choice left in the matter for anybody concerned.

"Con," cried Miss Robina from the "shay," "stop; we can't make a triumphal entry of this sort into Dovecote."

By this time Balaam had entered into the spirit of the thing, and he and Con had a neck-and-neck race as far as the toll-bar. Balaam's ears came in first, and there, from old custom, he pulled himself up with a jerk. It threw Clare and Miss Robina into each other's arms; they clung to one another laughing and breathless from the jolting, and then Con came to the rescue and helped Clare down.

"May I walk home with you?" he asked quite meekly.

"If Miss Robina will let you, you may; it is not far," said Clare.

"You are a pair of geese," said Miss Robina. "There, go on, both of you, and leave me to pay the toll."

They walked on, and she waited, but nobody came, though she called, "Trevithic, gate!" in a voice that might have been heard had anyone been there to hear. Miss Constantine ended the matter by driving through without paying.

By this time the young people were out of sight. They had reached the market-place, which also did duty as horse-fair, open-air chapel, and general gossip ground. It was consequently always a much frequented spot, and when Con Constantine and Clare Thorn got there they found quite a crowd assembled, gathered about the bank-steps. It was the nearest approach to a mob that the little borough could furnish out of electioneering times. Con noticed it first, and without apology or explanation, he took Clare's hand and drew it within his arm. For a moment she was too surprised to demur, and then the sound of a sudden crash of broken glass, a backward pressing of the crowd, made her cling to him, frightened and trembling, very thankful to Con for his strong protecting arm amid the hubbub of loud angry voices and the rough jostling of the men and boys who, armed with sticks and stones and any missile calculated to strike a nasty blow, seemed prepared to make a raid upon the bank.

As yet, apparently from lack of a leader, they were only swaying to and fro, throwing an occasional stone at the bank windows, but not worked up to the point of doing any actual bodily harm even to the two policemen stationed at the top of the steps to the entrance door, which, contrary to custom during business hours, was close shut, barring ingress and egress alike.

To Con's eyes that last fact spoke volumes, and yet when Clare asked him, "What is it, Con?" he answered evasively, "I can't tell, but the sooner we are out of this the better."

He tried with all his strength to elbow a way out, not towards the bank, but towards Miss Robina's house next door; he made but little progress, they were so hemmed and hedged in, and presently found themselves face to face with Trevithic, of the toll-bar. To both of them his big burly figure had been familiar from their childhood, and the gruff voice that sounded so oddly at variance with soft West-country dialect had always had a kindly tone for the little boy and girl who threw him their pennies for the toll out of Miss Robina's cart or the banker's gig.

Clare seized upon him now as a friend in need.

"Oh, Trevithic," she cried, "do tell us what is wrong at the bank! Has anything happened to grandpapa?"

"Happened to 'un!" repeated the man with almost savage irony.

"Nothing don't happen to the likes o' him! Ruin only comes to poor folks. 'Twere but yesterday I paid it in, all on it, the savin's and scrapin's o' twenty years, and to-day the bank's broke!"

Clare crept closer, and Con felt the girl's slight form shiver, as though each word were a blow.

"Con," she whispered, "dear Con, can't you get me home?"

CHAPTER IV.

At that moment Miss Robina's "shay" came rattling along at a hand gallop into the midst of the crowd, which made way for it with the prompt respect that is always paid to hard driving. Balaam was too distinctly conscious of the immediate neighbourhood of his comfortable stable to slacken speed just there, and he made a bold dash for Miss Robina's front door. To right and left the people dispersed. Con, seizing the opportunity, followed in his wake, and before the free passage had time to close again, Clare was safe inside Miss Constantine's garden-gate.

When Miss Robina joined them some ten minutes later, she found Clare sitting on a chair in the hall crying bitterly, and Con standing by, looking at her helplessly.

"Do make her stop crying, Aunt Robina," said the young man desperately. "She won't listen to a word I say."

"Leave her to me," said Miss Robina. "And, Con," she took her nephew by the arm and led him into the kitchen, and from there out to the courtyard at the back of the house, where Balaam was still standing harnessed to the yellow cart—"you must go back, Con, over the Tregellas road till you meet Banker Thorn, and warn him of what is going on here. If he should show himself the mob won't stop at breaking windows."

"I think not," said Con, getting into the "shay," "and I suppose we can't let the old sinner get his deserts. Gee up!" shaking the reins, "gee up! you can't be more unwilling to go than I am, Balaam, so make the best of it."

When Con arrived at the toll-gate, he found only a very youthful member of the Trevithic family sitting on its topmost bar, whistling as cheerfully as if banks never broke. He scrambled down to take Con's toll; he was just old enough to thoroughly appreciate the difference existing between two pennies and two halfpennies, and therefore quite capable of taking his father's place.

As Con jogged along, after passing the gate, his thoughts travelled faster than Balaam's legs. As was only human, he considered first the aspect of Thorn's failure as it affected himself.

"It is partly my own fault," he grumbled to himself, "that I did not save myself. If I had not been too proud to take my money out last summer, after he had refused to let Clare and me be engaged, I should not have lost that fifteen hundred pounds of my poor mother's. I had a good chance of a capital reinvestment too, but I thought it would look better to leave things as they were till Christmas. 'I had neither the income nor the position he should expect for Clare;' the old rascal said that, I remember. Well, I have less than ever now, but I have not changed my mind, and neither has Clare."

Then Con began to think of his neighbours.

"I wonder if old Spender is hard hit by this failure? I must try and get hold of some particulars before the post goes out. I suppose I ought to have been doing that now, instead of running after Banker Thorn. Personally I don't much care what happens to him; but for Clare's sake I will tell him to keep out of the way. I wonder how far I shall have to go before I meet my respected grandpapa-in-law? All the way to Tregellas?"

Before he saw Banker Thorn driving leisurely along towards him, he had come almost to the edge of the gorse and heather-grown moor, over which runs the high-road between Dovecote Major and the county town, railway, and telegraph station, Tregellas.

Con drew the "shay" on to the soft turf by the roadside and waited.

The banker would have passed on, but Con laid a detaining hand on the rein.

"Banker Thorn," said Con Constantine, "if you are thinking of going back to Dovecote, let me advise you to change your mind."

"Why?" asked the banker shortly, regarding the young man with no friendly eye, and resenting his interference.

"There has been a run on the bank since you have been gone, and the depositors are waiting for their money. It is just a trifle lively in the market-place," said the young man grimly. "They don't seem to think you are as anxious to give it to them as you might be."

"I can't give them what I haven't got," said Banker Thorn sullenly.

"Then they'll lynch you!" said Con coolly.

The banker caught convulsively at the side-rail of his high driving-seat, and grasped his whip with the instinct of self-preservation. It was not an encouraging picture that had been drawn for his consideration; the idea was ghastly, and made him grow sick and cold with apprehension.

Could he not escape? He looked about him and saw only the long line of high-road winding through the desolate stretch of moorland, dotted with gorse-bushes, on whose stiff spikes the hoar-frost hung glittering in the slanting winter sunlight.

Not a living soul was in sight, except this young Con Constantine and himself; the quiet scene calmed him, and, somewhat reassured, his fingers relaxed their hold, his tone became almost defiant.

"They would not dare," he said. "The police—"

"Police!" laughed the young man. "What use do you suppose a couple of policemen will be against men who swear you have robbed them—"

"Choose your words better, sir," the banker interrupted.

Con shrugged his shoulders.

"It is no use mincing matters, Banker Thorn; I only came to warn you of the reception you are likely to meet with. Go back to Dovecote now, and see for yourself."

The banker's face blanched.

"You shall have your money, Constantine," he said hoarsely, "every penny of it, if you will get me safe out of this."

"Thank you," said Con coldly, "I prefer to take my share with the rest of the creditors."

"Confound the rest of the creditors!" said the banker.

Con looked at him, contempt in his honest grey eyes.

"You'll have to meet 'em, all the same," said the young man, "Well, good-day, Banker Thorn, I won't detain you any longer. I have to go on to Tregellas."

Whereupon Con lifted his hat, and drove on, leaving Banker Thorn behind, sitting in his gig, a prey to disagreeable reflections.

First, he asked himself what had caused this sudden run on the bank during his short absence. Had Clarissa had any hand in it? It was scarcely likely; but women were so imprudent.

Next, he wished he had asked Con Constantine some questions.

Should he follow him back to Tregellas? Anything was better than driving aimlessly about the moor all day, and he certainly should not go back to Dovecote before dark. In so far he would take Con Constantine's advice. What was the insolent young puppy doing in Dovecote just now? By the way, was he not one of Keeper and Spender's clerks?

Banker Thorn immediately began to put two and two together, but as is often the case when this is done in the abstract, as a mere figure of speech, he made a grave miscalculation. Neither Con Constantine nor Mrs. Charles Thorn had brought about the suspension of Thorn's Bank.

The unconscious agent of the mischief lay in Banker Thorn's own pocket—the key of the bank-safe, without which the manager had been unable to meet the first cheque handed in that morning. His explanations were at first received with much amusement, but the story, with several embellishments, got wind, and next, people laughed incredulously.

A report that no money was to be had at Thorn's spread, a panic ensued, the bank-counters were besieged, the police had to be called in to clear the building.

"It was confoundedly careless of me," said the banker that evening, when having safely reached his own house under cover of the darkness, he was listening to his bank-manager's account of the day's events.

"It was unfortunate, sir; but we can re-open as usual to-morrow. That will restore confidence."

"Not unless they get their money, Nicholls; and there is not a couple of hundred, cash, in the safe, and I don't know where to go for credit."

The manager looked at the banker.

"Then the crash only came to-day instead of to-morrow?"

"Not exactly," said Banker Thorn, "but I have brought it on my own head, after all."

Con Constantine returned to Dovecote Major earlier than Banker Thorn, and found Miss Constantine quietly knitting by the fireside, sitting alone.

"Where is Clare?" he asked anxiously; "I hoped you would keep her with you."

"She would not stay," said Miss Robina. "As soon as the crowd dispersed she went home. Con," said the old lady, "I believe the child feels as if she had robbed us all. After you were gone she went to the window and stood looking out."

"Poor things!" I heard her say, 'poor things!' and then she turned to me."

"Do you think they are all depositors?" she said.

"I dare say not one-half of them have got sixpence in the bank," I said.

"But there will still be a great many to pay," she said. "There are the shareholders too. How many are there of them, do you think?"

"I don't know, my dear," I said; "but I dare say things are not so bad as we think."

"I would have cheered her if I could," said Robina apologetically to Con. She was very much afraid he might think she had been harsh to his darling.

"I know you would," said her nephew reassuringly, "but I think I will just run in next door and tell Clare that I have seen her grandfather, and that she need not expect to see him before dark; he is afraid to show himself. Of course, Clare is not to hear that."

"How thoughtful the dear lad is," said Miss Robina, looking after him fondly as he went out.

He left the door open behind him, which let the cold wind in, and the old lady had to go and shut it; but then, who can think of two things at once?

Clare Thorn received her visitor in her grandfather's study; he found her pacing restlessly to and fro; he told her what he had done.

"Oh, Con!" she said, "it was very good of you. I have been so terribly anxious, even thinking that perhaps he would not come back at all. I sent for the manager, Mr. Nicholls, just now, and he has told me how it all happened. He says it will all come right to-morrow, that it is only a temporary suspension. I don't know exactly what that means, but I hope, I try to think it means that Trevithic will get his money back, and that there is nothing to be ashamed of. Oh, Con, I thought I should have died when Trevithic said that to me this morning."

Clare looked at him with tearful eyes, her lips quivered pitifully; the sight was too much for Con's fortitude. He caught her in his arms and kissed her, although there was no mistletoe near.

"My dear," he said, "you shall never be ashamed of anything. I am come down here as Keeper and Spender's confidential clerk. I am only waiting for further instructions from them to act in this matter, and if your grandfather is frank with me, we may pull 'Thorn's' through yet."

CHAPTER V.

FOR the next week Con Constantine passed the greater part of each day at the bank, where pressing business kept him hard at work.

By the time Christmas Eve came, the suspension of Thorn's Bank had been in all senses a nine days' wonder, and all that was known, and all that was not known concerning it, had been talked threadbare, and the public indignation against the banker was wearing itself out. It began to cool down after it became actually certain that Messrs. Keeper and Spender had come forward with offers of assistance, and that it was more than possible that the creditors would eventually have their claims settled in full.

Dovecote Major regarded Con Constantine with increased interest as the confidential clerk of the highly respected firm of Keeper and Spender.

He was overwhelmed with invitations which he was too busy to accept. The good folks, his fellow townsmen, tried in vain to worm information out of him; he evaded their questions, or flatly refused to answer them, and succeeded in rendering himself a thoroughly unpopular object of curiosity; but Banker Thorn was obliged to acknowledge that once Con had entered on the new ground of their altered circumstances, his line of conduct became irreproachable, his manner was strictly professional, slightly deferential as became a clerk in the presence of a banker, and Clare's name was never mentioned between them. Con had, according to promise, completely sunk his own individuality in that of Messrs. Keeper and Spender's confidential clerk, and it was in this capacity that he presented himself, on the morning of the 24th, at the door of the room in which Banker Thorn was accustomed to see his clerks. He knocked for admittance, and entered; he held an open letter in his hand.

"Can you spare me a few minutes, sir? I have just heard from Mr. Spender, and I should like you to see for yourself what he says."

He laid the letter down on the desk as he spoke, and waited till Mr. Thorn had read it twice.

"What answer shall I make, sir?"

"Answer!" repeated the banker irritably. "Keeper and Spender know the state of my affairs as well as I do myself. Where can I put my hand on a shilling?"

Con Constantine hesitated, and turned over some papers on the table; he kept his eyes fixed on them when he answered:

"As Mr. Spender says, between three and four thousand pounds will be required to meet the most pressing claims—the depositors first of all—and he evidently thinks you might, by an effort, manage so much. Can you not find friends to advance that sum? Mrs. Charles Thorn is supposed to be well off. She ought to be willing to help you, as she is, so far as I know, the only shareholder who has got her money safe. Yes," said Con, forgetting his official capacity, and taking up the rôle of Con Constantine again, "I happen to know she has, though there is no mention of the transaction in the bank-books, therefore I conclude you met the claim out of your private purse. You, also, if you remember, offered to give me my money. Now, Mr. Thorn, where was it coming from?"

The banker started to his feet, quivering with passion, and for a second it seemed as if the artificial barrier of civility, which necessity had raised between these two, was going to be swept away; then he recollected himself, and sinking back in his chair, stammered:

"I—I should have borrowed it."

"Then let me recommend you to go to the same money-lender, for unless the required amount be forthcoming after bank-holiday, I shall feel it my duty to advise Mr. Spender to withdraw. I think I have made my meaning plain enough. Good-day, Mr. Thorn;" and Con dismissed himself.

CHAPTER VI.

PERHAPS it was as well for Banker Thorn's peace of mind that he did not know that the brown-paper parcel which his daughter-in-law had carried out of harm's way had already, regarded through the magic glasses of desire, lost its first aspect of a trust and assumed the proportions of a coveted possession. An undue carefulness for "mine" oftener than not weakens the distinction between mine and thine, and makes covetousness the first step towards misappropriation.

Mrs. Charles Thorn's heart warmed within her as she thought of the banker's thousands lying safely with her own under lock and key; she had not yet divided her share from his, her own would look so small—a mere nothing put by itself. Why had she not demanded more? She had a right. She was beginning to reason with herself in some such fashion by the time Christmas Eve came, and then her fancy would call up a kaleidoscope-like picture of possibilities that might leave his money still with her, untouched, unclaimed. She would draw her chair nearer the fire when late in the afternoon she could no longer see to work, and would indulge in a succession of waking dreams.

So Banker Thorn found her when between the lights on Christmas Eve he came—alas! for Mrs. Thorn's dreams—to claim his own again.

She received him without any expression of surprise, although this was the first time he had come within her doors for seven years. It was no pleasure to her to see him now.

"What does he want?" she asked herself; she waited for him to open the conversation. He led it off with various trifling remarks, of which she took no apparent notice; she was lighting the candles on the mantelpiece. That done, she looked at her father-in-law.

"Banker Thorn," she said, "what has brought you here?"

The banker moved uneasily in his chair—it was directly opposite hers—and he coughed nervously.

"Ahem!" he cleared his throat, "ahem! I am afraid you will think me very changeable, Clarissa," he began, "but I find I need not trouble you to keep those bonds any longer, in fact it will be more convenient for me to keep them in my own hands."

"You should have thought of that before," she answered, "and then you need never have made me that little Christmas present."

"You know that was a mere figure of speech," said the banker, "to—to explain their being in your possession."

"Possession is nine points of the law," said Mrs. Charles, unmoved. Her father-in-law laughed a constrained unamused laugh.

"You must not make a joke of it, Clarissa. I really want the money very badly. I have to furnish it by Tuesday, to meet the depositors' claims."

"Why should you sacrifice Clare's nice little fortune to them?"

"What a nasty sarcastic manner Mrs. Charles could put on when she chose!" the banker thought. He knew she was quoting his own words against him; he coughed again, to choke down his anger. To get back his own money was certainly a more difficult task than he had anticipated.

"I must," he said; "I can't afford to lose the chance of being set on my legs again by Keeper and Spender. Of course I am much obliged to you for giving the bonds house-room, and I will let you have a full year's interest on them, and then you will be just as well off as if you had been bothered with the responsibility of four thousand pounds in your possession that did not actually belong to you."

"You are very generous!" she said.

He looked at her uneasily, he did not like the tone of her speech; perhaps it was his own fancy that gave it so doubtful a meaning.

"I wish to deal fairly with you," he said, getting up from his chair and beginning to draw on his gloves.

Mrs. Charles saw that he was preparing to go, but she did not move even when he continued:

"I should like to take the bonds with me now. Perhaps you would kindly fetch them—that is, if it does not inconvenience you." He was politeness—urbanity itself.

"It is inconvenient," she said, "for I intend to keep them!"

The suave smile with which he had just spoken, dropped like a mask from his face, and was succeeded by an expression of blank dismay. He could not believe his ears, and yet there was no mistaking her meaning now. She intended to keep the money—his money that to-day could stand between him and ruin! A fury of impatient rage took possession of him at the thought, blinding him to prudence, to what was possible to him and what was not.

"Clarissa!" he gasped in an unsteady voice, for he could only with difficulty speak at all, "Clarissa, I will prosecute you!"

"You dare not," she answered coldly.

Over Banker Thorn's face there came a sudden purple flush; he caught at the table in front of him, for the room swam before his eyes; he let go again, and then, as though stricken by some unseen hand, he staggered and fell back into the chair behind him in which he had been sitting a while ago—dead.

Clarissa Thorn's heart quailed before a sense of growing horror that bound her hand and foot. She could not stir, but sat still in her seat by the fire. It seemed to her as if the dead man's open eyes were fixed upon her, their gaze slowly turning her to stone. Surely those parted lips witnessed against her dumbly:

"This is your doing!"

With a stifled cry of shuddering terror, she hid her face in her hands, but she could not shut out the sight. That, she felt, would haunt her to her dying day.

But now, side by side with it, she saw another sight—no ghastly reality—a vision of a little child, with soft red-gold hair, out of which the brightness has not faded, looking like some baby-saint curled up in a corner of a great high-backed pew in a cold, murky City church. It must be Christmas-time, for round the pillars are great bunches of holly and ivy, and at the east end, over the communion-table is a Christmas text in unfamiliar letters that she cannot decipher, but below, in plain Latin characters, all newly gilded and picked out, her eyes rest on the two Commandments: "Thou shalt do no murder;" "Thou shalt not steal." They are so short, so simple, the child reads them right off.

Surely Clariissa Thorn does the same, or is it the motionless figure in the chair facing her?

Some voice had uttered them aloud; it broke the spell that bound her, and the miserable woman struggled to her feet, stung into remorse.

Did his eyes still follow her as she crept with lagging footsteps past his chair, giving it as wide a berth as the little room would let her?

At the farther corner near the door stood an old-fashioned cabinet with intricate locks and fastenings. With trembling fingers she touched a hidden spring; a panel slipped back and showed a secret drawer.

Within it, denuded of its brown-paper wrapper, lay the packet of bonds.

She lingers a moment, face to face with her "darling sin"; then she clutches wildly at the packet, and carries it at arm's-length to where he is lying.

"Take it back!" she cries in a voice of frantic entreaty; but his hands have fallen slack and nerveless by his side; not a breath comes from between his lips, through which a little stream of blood is trickling in slow drops, staining the cushions of his chair.

"Ah!" she cries, "he is dead—dead! Who says there is peace and good-will at Christmas-time?"

The paper slipped from out her shaking hands and fell rustling at her feet. The sound in itself was nothing, but to her ears it sounded like a voice of judgment from heaven. It set her heart beating wildly; she recoiled and shrieked aloud, fled from the room, from the house, out into the road.

Close to the gate a man stood lighting his pipe, and the little flash of the match he was using fell upon her as she was hurrying past him. He caught her by the arm.

"Mrs. Thorn!" he cried. "What is it?"

It was Con Constantine's voice, and she recognised it. It recalled her to herself, but it was in vain she tried to answer. An hysterical contraction of her throat choked back the sound of her voice. She held his arm fast, and turned back with him to the house. Con went with her, wondering. She led him into the room that to her was so full of horror.

At first Con saw nothing unusual, only Banker Thorn sitting in his chair. But stay—could that be Banker Thorn?

"Good Heaven!" said the young man in an awe-stricken whisper. "Is he dead?"

Mrs. Thorn shivered, and wrung her hands.

"Have you sent for a doctor?" said Con, who, recovered from the first shock, had gone forward and laid his hand on the dead man's breast.

"No," said Mrs. Thorn; "the servant is out. I was alone in the house."

"I will go for one at once," said Con promptly. "But what are all these papers on the floor?"

He went on his knees, and gathered them together.

"I see they are foreign bonds," he said, rising to his feet. "Are they yours? If his, I will take them to the bank."

"No, no!" she cried. "His!"

The gesture with which she emphasised her words, her hands stretched out, not to take but to ward off, the expression of unspeakable repulsion with which she shrank away from him, made Con Constantine think many strange thoughts as he bent his steps towards the doctor's house. He met him at his own door, just as he was about to go in and sit down to dinner.

"Bless my soul!" stuttered Dr. Spillars, too surprised to do more than ask questions which were only the repetition of Con's own words. "At Mrs. Charles Thorn's, do you say? Banker Thorn? A fit, you suppose—eh?"

"Yes," said Con; "he looks like it."

"Apoplexy," said the doctor, with unprofessional candour. "Banker Thorn was predisposed to attacks of that kind; any sudden shock or great mental excitement might cause instantaneous death."

Through Con Constantine's mind passed a flash of enlightenment. Was he beginning to understand?

The doctor hurried away to Mrs. Charles Thorn's, and Con, with his hands behind him, turned slowly and thoughtfully in the opposite direction. He was deliberately dovetailing inferences and conjectures.

Whatever his final deductions may have been, he kept them to himself, kept them from Miss Robina—who had her own theory under the lock and key of silence—kept them with tender care from her who is now his wife.

No whisper against the dead man's memory has ever reached

Clare Constantine's ears. She only knows that when the bank affairs were wound up, Trevithic, with the other creditors, got his money back. Neither does her husband tell her that Mrs. Charles Thorn has never presented the cheque which was sent to her in liquidation of her claim as a shareholder in "Thorn's."

The Justice of Gulchville.

BY HENRY TINSON.

CHAPTER I.

MANY Colorado "old-timers" will remember Squire Wilton Creed, once Justice in No. 100 precinct in that territory.

Wilton Creed was but a middle-aged man, and young at that, as they say out West, when he was elected by the citizens of Gulchville as their justice. From his unswerving integrity, his honourable career, and above all, his candour and truthfulness—qualities which, like precious stones, are admired in proportion to their rarity—he was pronounced to be the best man in his precinct for the office, and all, the worst as well as the best of a strangely mixed mining community, were glad when he consented to stand.

At the opening of our story Wilton Creed was a young, steady, and successful fellow, managing a large store in New York for his uncle, Zachariah Creed. The latter being a confirmed invalid and almost confined to his room, the young man was practically master of the concern, the more especially as he was looked upon as the assured heir and successor to Zachariah.

Wilton was a tall, good-looking young man, really of a cheerful and even temper, but with a certain gravity and reserve, which sometimes gave strangers and those who were not thoroughly familiar with him the idea that he was ungenial, if not sullen. Nothing could be farther from the truth. He was, in reality, a man of strong impulses, which would have been overwhelming in their force, for good or evil, but for the habitual check in which he held them.

It will, then, easily be understood that when his affections were engaged, he loved in earnest and wholly; and no girl in the state of New York possessed a more thorough sweetheart than Rachel Delame found in Wilton Creed. Miss Delame was not quite the bride whom old Zachariah would have had his nephew seek, not but that she was handsome enough to justify the choice of any man. Tall and dark; with olive complexion, and blue-black hair, inherited from a mother who came from some country in the south of Europe; and eyes that at one moment looked through you, while in the next they were soft and winning—yes, she was handsome enough, but her friends were poor compared to Zachariah, and, even at their best, had not been of the kind which pleased the cautious old merchant.

It was not said that Rachel herself had ever been on the stage, but her mother had certainly followed it as a profession for some years, and had afterwards practised as a teacher of music, a calling which was not, in the eyes of such critics as Zachariah, much superior in respectability even to the former pursuit. She was dead, and Rachel lived with her father, who followed the same undesirable profession, to which, indeed, the young lady and one of her sisters had been brought up.

At first, probably, there had been opposition and serious exhortation in this matter, but if this were so, Wilton Creed had conquered, for at last there was certainly a toleration, if not a hearty approval of the intimacy, and it was known that at no distant day Rachel was to become Mrs. Creed.

In New York, as in other places in the States, men do pretty much as they like, without such painful regard to the inquisition of their neighbours, as appears to be the rule in Europe; but for all that, there is some sort of surveillance exercised by the circle in which each person moves, and it was generally decided that the match was nothing better than an infatuation, and a throwing himself away on the part of the young merchant. These judges decided, too, that Rachel Delame cared very little for Wilton, but came of too crafty a race, and was altogether too good a judge to let so fine a chance escape her. That Wilton was earnestly in love with the girl there could be no doubt, and as is the wont with such apparently self-restrained men, when he did give his passion free course, he exhibited a devotion as intense—perhaps as absurd—as that of the most love-sick, moon-struck swain of romance.

One beautiful summer evening he had called for Rachel as usual, and had strolled with her into the Central Park, near which her father's cottage was situated, and here, like Claude Melnotte, with myriads of lovers before and since that somewhat unprincipled hero, he sketched their home and their future—for their marriage was to take place within two months from thence—and this furnished the text on which he dwelt so lovingly, speaking with an absence of reserve and an eagerness quite foreign to his ordinary reputation.

As he finished one of these sketches of such happiness as they, of course, were certain to compass, he looked with a loving smile into her face. The last rays of the July sun struck through the shrubs which lined the low mounds under which they were strolling, and for an instant flashed on the face of Rachel. Their next step took them into comparative shade.

"Rachel," exclaimed Wilton, "there are tears in your eyes; do not seek to hide them, I saw them but too plainly. I would not wish you to hide them, Rachel. I well understand the feeling which filled your eyes; it is the excess of happiness, the trembling fear that the vision is too blissful for us. No; not for you! You should not have that feeling, but it haunts me often, Rachel, when I reflect how unworthy I am of such a prize as I have gained. It is excess of happiness. Is it not, dearest?"

"It—It should be as you say," returned Miss Delame after a short pause; "but it almost pains me, Wilton, to find that you rate me so highly. I am not worthy of such language, and sometimes I think—I think—"

"You think what, Rachel?" said Wilton, still with the same fond smile on his lips. "What is it you think that is so difficult to say?"

"I think that—that perhaps it would have been better for you if we had never met," began the girl.

"Rachel!" exclaimed Creed in a surprised, reproachful tone.

"Yes," she continued, "you set a value upon me so far above my real deserts; you invest me with merits which only exist in your own imagination; so that I fear—I am sure—the disappointment will be great when you know me as I am."

"A risk I will readily take!" cried her companion cheerfully. "You cannot daunt me thus, Rachel. I see you as you really are; there never will be any change in my feelings to you—to that I pledge myself. 'Tis a heathenish oath, I know, but I swear it by the sun, whose last rays now gild the roofs of yonder houses, and by the moon which has risen while we have been talking so foolishly—while they shine I will never change."

Rachel smiled at his enthusiasm, but there was a tremulousness even about the smile which savoured more of her previous motion than of hilarity; nor was she quite herself during the remainder of the walk, nor even when her lover had taken her to her home. After a short stay there, he parted from her with an affectionate embrace and kiss, such as an affianced bride may expect to receive from her lover, and for which her father, by an opportune and discreet absence from the little parlour, gave the opportunity.

"Your cheek," whispered Wilton, "is as cold as marble, Rachel. Not many minutes past it was flushed and hot, now it is deathly cold. You are ill."

The girl only smiled again at this outburst of anxiety, and returned the kiss just as her father's hand was laid on the lock of the door.

Mr. Delame—Don he was called sometimes, and Signor, but persons in his profession are not rigid in these matters—was hearty enough in his welcome to his future son-in-law, and profuse in his regret on finding that the young man could not be persuaded to stay any longer. It was quite certain that Mr. Delame was fully alive to the advantage of securing such a connexion, for he had half-a-dozen daughters, and had never dreamt of such a prize as this coming to his net.

Wilton Creed walked slowly on his homeward way. He was troubled and distressed as he reviewed the events of the evening, and was inclined to blame himself for some oversight or abruptness; this was followed by a resolve to be more careful in future. This future was very close, for on the next day but one he left his business much earlier than usual, in order to take Rachel, as had been agreed, to see their proposed home in New Jersey.

If there was no want of affectionate anxiety on his part then, lest he should say something thoughtless, or be thoughtless in the omission of something, there was also a strange anxiety and nervousness on the part of Rachel. She was gentler in her manner than Wilton had ever known her, almost timid, indeed, which was assuredly not her usual characteristic, yet there was an indefinable something which hung between them like an invisible, but not impalpable veil, and startled him.

Rachel could scarcely be got to say anything about the house, or its fitness for them; and when an opinion was wrung from her, it was always a monotonous echo of his own sentiments. She complained of a headache, and they parted early, at her own home, where Mr. Delame was as hospitable in his manner as ever, and as pressing for Wilton to pass the evening with him. But the latter declined, and went his way with again the same depressed disheartened feeling he had experienced so painfully only two nights before.

On his way home he met some friends, and was easily persuaded to enter a favourite billiard-saloon with them—indeed, he was glad of the chance of dispelling some of the gloomy thoughts on which he felt he was brooding too much. He had been there an hour or so, and had regained his usual equanimity, when several strangers came in, some of whom watched the play of Creed and his party.

These strangers were well-dressed persons, evidently, from their conversation, dwellers in the Far West, and like most of their fellows very liberal, and also somewhat loud and unsparing in their remarks. One of the number had, perhaps, called at other saloons before entering this one, for his manner was a trifle excited, and he interfered in the game which he was watching beyond the degree of which his companions approved, and to the annoyance of the players.

His friends endeavoured to get him to leave the table, but the young man not only refused to do this, but by some perverse whim attached himself specially to Creed, on whom he thrust his conversation with an air which was almost of bravado. Yet the stranger was by no means intoxicated, that was clear; he was excited, but perfectly master of himself. One of his companions appeared to be especially annoyed by his conduct, and whispered to him energetically more than once, evidently in remonstrance.

"I know!" at last exclaimed the young man; "do you think I can't tell what I am doing?"

Creed and his party were about to leave the saloon, not caring to have the company of strangers forced upon them, when the young man, addressing Wilton, challenged him to play for a dozen of champagne.

Creed declined, and turned away.

"Stay a while!" cried the stranger; "I will pay for the drinks if you will not play for them. Be sociable!"

"I do not want your champagne, nor your company," retorted Creed, who was growing somewhat irritated by the other's persistency; "why do you meddle with me?"

Wilton's expression was stern as he spoke, and he drew back as though expecting, perhaps, an angry outburst on the part of the man he thus openly rebuked; but to his astonishment the other only laughed.

Again did his companion make an effort to get the stranger away, and, as he did so, another visitor entered the saloon—a personal friend of Creed.

He saw at once that something was wrong, and as quarrels in New York saloons have often serious terminations, he was anxious to prevent Wilton from continuing any discussion.

Creed laughed, but submitted himself to his friend, who exchanged a few words with the obtrusive stranger, and then, in company with Wilton, left the saloon.

"I am glad," said the friend, when they had fairly reached the street, "I am glad I came in when I did, although I must own, Wilton, you were about the last man I expected to see taking part in a saloon squabble. How came you to be wrangling with him, above all persons in the world?"

"Why him—why is he different to any one else?" asked Wilton; then added with a smile: "Not that I should have involved myself in a brawl, Fred; but you were always a peacemaker."

"I don't know that it would have been left to you to choose whether you would involve yourself in a brawl or not," returned Fred. "That was rather a dangerous character."

"You know him, then?" said Wilton.

"Yes; do you not know him?" exclaimed the other.

"No; of course not. I never saw or heard of him before," replied Wilton.

"Whew!" Fred's reply for the instant was a whistle, but he went on: "Then the matter was even more serious than it looked, for you may rely on it that a quarrel would have been forced upon you. I knew him before he went to California. He is—he is—"

"Well, who is he?" cried Wilton, as his friend hesitated.

"Well, he is Jule Warrock. You know now," replied Fred.

"Indeed I do not: I never heard the name," said Wilton. "But there must be no hanging back now, Fred. You have said so much that you must tell me all—who is this man?"

"I wish I had never opened my lips about him," answered his friend; "it is only idle gossip after all, but—well, then," he continued, seeing Wilton about to break out with some angry question, "he is the man who was once a suitor—some kind of admirer, that is—of Miss Delame, and it was said—only by him, of course—that they were engaged to be married, but that her—" father, Mr. Delame, broke it off, after continually encouraging the young fellow."

THE CHRISTMAS NUMBER OF

22

"Ah! and why did he break it off, and when?" demanded Wilton. He spoke very coolly, but his companion did not like the expression of his face, and noted also that he had turned deadly pale.

"Oh, about a year ago, I believe; I have not the least idea why," he replied. "For nothing to Jule's credit, you may be sure, if there was anything in it at all; but, rely upon it, it is all an invention."

"Invention! He was dismissed about a year ago, when I first became intimate with Rachel," muttered Wilton, then added aloud: "As you say, there may be nothing in it, Fred, so we will talk no more upon such a trifle."

He dismissed the matter in this light way, but his friend was not the less sorry that he had led up to such a communication, and after he parted from Wilton, expressed his fears to some of his own acquaintance that more would be heard of it. He was right, although he had probably not anticipated exactly what followed.

On the next evening Creed went, as was usual with him, to Mr. Delame's—he had made no special appointment, and was much later than his usual time, so he could not complain at finding Rachel from home, but he was disturbed for all that, and not the less so on finding that her father did not know whether she had gone. He had no doubt of the genuineness of Mr. Delame's ignorance. It was only too evident that the latter was vexed at Wilton's disappointment, and pressed the young man to stay, assuring him that Rachel would not be many minutes absent, as she could only be gone to visit a neighbour, not expecting him to call so late.

Creed would not wait, however, but stayed long enough to have a conversation with Delame, and to make some enquiries which showed the musician that he was not completely ignorant of some past family transactions which the elder had hoped to keep entirely hidden from him. Perhaps, too, Creed revealed more than he intended, for Mr. Delame was not deficient in craft, and some of his apparently insignificant questions drew the young man out, without his perceiving their drift.

Be that as it might, the old gentleman—he was not so very old, however—was in an extremely bad temper when his daughter returned. So he rated her soundly for being from home when Mr. Creed called, and, it is possible, exaggerated the force of what the young man had said, and magnified the extent of his information.

If so, Mr. Delame probably precipitated a catastrophe, which, however, would have occurred in any case. When Wilton called on the next evening, a terrible shock awaited him.

He found the place in confusion, the old man raving, the sisters in tears; but Rachel was not visible, and upon his enquiring for her, the father, with many execrations in English, French, and Spanish, thrust a letter into his hand.

It was Rachel's farewell. She had gone away with her first love, to whom she was to be married that night. She humbly begged pardon of Mr. Wilton for having trifled with his feelings, and assured him that she had tried to school herself to love him as he should be loved, but in vain, and she felt she was now doing her duty more truly than she had done while feigning to favour him. Yet she had behaved wickedly to him, she owned, and could not defend herself. She should never see New York again, but should ever be her father's loving, although rebellious daughter, Rachel Warrock.

This was the purport of the letter, and this was how Wilton Creed lost his first love.

Many of his friends said it would kill him. He himself thought—perhaps hoped—it would be so; but, as other men have survived the bitterest pangs, so did he. Mr. Delame tried to find some trace of his daughter, but in vain; it was not known whether Creed assisted in this search or not, for he never spoke of the girl. Certain it is that she was seen no more in New York, and, like other nine days' wonders, her flight was soon forgotten.

Forgotten even by Wilton Creed, it appeared, for in less than two years he married Miss Milly Robins, the only daughter of a wealthy friend of Zachariah Creed. It was entirely through the latter that the match was brought about, and the old man was wonderfully delighted. In a year after the marriage, Zachariah died, and within a year after his death Wilton Creed sold out of his store, which was regarded as one of the most prosperous in New York, and, with his wife and child, went West.

He was a rich man when he started, so had not the usual inducement for seeking a gold-mining country; and he settled down at Gulchville, in the territory of Colorado, and being, as ever, an energetic, clever man of business, soon became one of the most prominent citizens of the district. His name was famous for integrity and fair dealing; miners would travel many miles to sell or buy from him, and eventually, after much persuasion, he consented to stand for the office of justice, and was elected by a majority of more than twenty to one.

CHAPTER II.

GULCHVILLE was the metropolis of a large mining district, extending for many miles along the spurs, or foothills, of a great mountain range, in the ravines of which were hidden many mining villages, and many more lonely camps and shanties. Yet we must guard against giving a false impression to the reader by speaking of a metropolis. Gulchville, after all, was but a mining town; its streets were ill-defined, its scattered houses were chiefly of wood, a few only being of adobe or unbaked clay, and, indeed, there were a few canvas huts, but these were disappearing as the town grew older.

A fourth of the houses in the main streets were "saloons" of various pretensions, and in all of them gambling was rife. There was plenty of drinking, gambling, and a few other vices in Gulchville, among its fixed residents, but the trouble from this was as nothing compared to what arose when a batch of miners came in to sell their dust, and to have a little relaxation; or when a returning detachment of Texan "cowboys" brought their dollars, their revolvers, and their inflammable tempers, to wake up Gulchville society. Yet, with all this, which sounds serious enough to those not native and to the manner born, Gulchville was regarded as an orderly, law-abiding place, and it was held up as quite an example to some of the lesser towns.

Such as the "city" was, there Wilton Creed lived and prospered, and there his children were brought up. He had brought one child with him from New York, another was born during his first year's residence in the West. When he was elected justice, some of the citizens, judging from his grave temperament, prophesied raids on the saloons, with general imprisonments and expulsions of the dangerous classes of both sexes—but these prophesies were to a considerable extent mistaken.

Wilton had lived in the West long enough to know how impossible it was to alter, suddenly and completely, the character of such a community, so chiefly contented himself with keeping aloof from these places and people, an example which was followed by some of the more respectable residents. Yet he did something, and whenever any saloon became specially famous, or infamous, steps were taken to get rid of it, and two or three notorious characters were expelled, or "got rid of," also; so that Gulchville perceptibly improved. It was something, even, to have saved it from becoming worse.

That there was some danger of this latter catastrophe occurring, was proved by the condition of other towns along the foothills, two or three of which were hotbeds of gambling and murder. To these gravitated the very worst class of professional gamblers—"monté men," card-sharps generally, billiard cheats, and those who habitually picked quarrels in saloons. Judged by the standard of these other towns, then—Goldpark, for instance, with its rowdies, and its notorious "Seven-up-Jack," the gambler—Gulchville was a paradise of law and order.

More than one incursion had been made by the worst of these outlying Bohemians, under such leaders as Seven-up-Jack—although this man himself had not ventured into the town—but the citizens had risen against them, had driven them out, and, after the fashion of the West, had seized and hung two or three of the more obstinate of the number.

The man alluded to as "Seven-up-Jack" was the most notorious of all those who infested the district. He was suspected of cheating, but nothing had been proved against him, and as he had a strong following among the miners, with a portion of whom he was popular, it was not easy for a small community to expel him. To attempt to get rid of him by individual quarrel was dangerous, as he was known to have killed two men during his residence at Goldpark; but as these men would undoubtedly have killed him, had he not been the quicker, no moral or social guilt was attributed to him for these acts.

Wilton Creed had been justice of his precinct about a year and a half, his appointment having been renewed almost as a matter of course; the sheriff, too, was a man of almost equal standing with himself; and their steady, though guarded efforts were bearing fruit in Gulchville visibly—when Mrs. Creed went to pay a visit to a friend, at a lonely ranch, or farm, some miles away in the mountains. This ranch was at the head of an enormous ravine which almost divided the great chain of mountains there, and which at its farther end spread into a wide area of good land; but this space was reached by a pass of varying width, in some places scarcely affording a passage for the torrent which dashed impetuously down its slope; in some parts overhung by beetling rocks; in others, a hundred yards wide, with broad terraces running at the feet of precipices three or four thousand feet high.

Mrs. Creed, with her two children, travelled in one of the narrow waggons, so popular in the West, and which are so light, and are built of such tough materials that, in the language of the district, "where they can't travel it ain't no use travelling at all," and, under the care of a steady driver, reached the ranch in safety. They left before sundown, as a journey through such a country after dark was to be avoided if possible, their host and one of his men accompanying them on horseback, until the very worst spot was passed, when they took leave and rode back to the farmhouse.

All went well until half the remaining distance to the mouth of the pass had been covered, but there, at a difficult corner; where the road was but a narrow ledge, with towering rocks on the right hand, and with a tremendous gulf, at the bottom of which hoarsely roared the stream, on the left; they met with a serious accident.

The waggon was moving very slowly along the ledge, when a stone on the side towards the torrent gave way, and the front wheel of the vehicle dropped at once to a lower level with a jerk which threw one of the horses quite over the edge of the precipice. Its companion would have been dragged after it, but for the desperate exertions of the driver; then, after an instant of frantic struggling and plunging, the harness gave way, and the horse went crashing down to the torrent bed, whether killed by the fall or not, the occupants of the waggon had no means of knowing.

Their position was unpleasant enough, and even dangerous, for although the waggon was safely resting on a sound piece of rock, yet the remaining horse was so frightened that it was only restrained by the driver standing at its head from commencing equally frantic struggles which must have resulted in the destruction of the whole party.

"I guess, marm, you had better get out, and help master and miss out as well," said the driver. "I daren't quit this darned critter for a minnit. How I shall get him over the rough ground by Black Cat Canyon, I don't know. One horse can hardly draw a waggon over there."

"The moon is up now," said Mrs. Creed, who had alighted from the waggon, and was assisting to soothe the terrified horse; "we shall not in the least mind being left, David. Suppose you ride this horse down to Farmer Barry's house, you can get there in half an hour, and return with assistance. We shall do very well until you come back."

The driver offered no specific objection to this plan, but evidently did not approve of it; Mrs. Creed almost naturally pressed it the more, and at last insisted upon the man leaving them.

"Wal, I sha'n't then, and that is the real truth," said the driver; "the horse is quiet enough now, as you say, and there is nothing unpleasant in your waiting an hour in such moonlight as this, as you say, too; but I will tell you what I meant to keep from you. I've seen sneaking along the rocks by our side for more'n a mile, one of the biggest mountain lions"—the puma is so called in the West—"I ever see. The brute won't come near a man nor a rifle, for he knows what a gun is as well as I do—but he is dead on women and children."

"Are you sure, David?" asked Mrs. Creed, but her voice was tremulous and weak now, very different to the commanding tone in which she had just been speaking.

"Sure on it?" echoed the other. "Why, I have seen the brute since I told you to get out of the waggon. He is hiding beyond that peaky rock now."

Mrs. Creed shuddered, and she instinctively drew the two children closer to her side. David noticed the movement, and said:

"You needn't be afraid; he won't come close while I am here. I will take care not to stir out of reach of my rifle, and I will not leave you. We must push on, marm, and do the best we can."

As he said this, he jerked the rein of the remaining horse, and then, putting his hands to the side of the waggon, tried to extricate it from its dangerous position.

The horse, however, perhaps not having recovered from its fright, refused to pull, and with a vexed exclamation David ceased his efforts.

"I'm darned if I don't believe we shall have to walk to Barry's," he said, "and if we do, that sneaking mountain lion will have this horse before we have been out of sight two minutes."

"Unharness him, and lead him with us," said Mrs. Creed; "the mountain cat cannot hurt the waggon."

"That's so! you are right," exclaimed the man, who began to unbuckle the harness, but scarcely had he touched a single strap, when he stopped and listened.

"What is the matter?" said the lady, who turned pale as she spoke, fancying that the driver had heard the approaching tread of the dreaded beast.

"Hark! surely you can hear wheels!" he cried; "I'll be whipped if there isn't a waggon coming through Pasos Malos ravine. Any man who will drive through there must have got real white blood in his veins—listen!"

David was right; the sound of approaching wheels was distinctly heard, and approaching, too, through a pass or mere fissure in the mountains, which although just passable, was yet so dangerous and rough as to have gained the unenviable title of the "Pass of Bad Steps."

The sound of wheels removed one fear which would have been present had the travellers been horsemen only. The Indians of the district were few, and tolerably peaceable, but yet were held in great dread and hatred by the inhabitants, and Mrs. Creed would at once have pictured the approach of a troop of these.

In a few moments a waggon came into view, passing close under the rock behind which David declared the puma to be lurking, and in it were three men and a woman, the latter, from her dress, being evidently the mistress.

At sight of the disabled vehicle, the new comers pulled up, and a shout from the driver asked if assistance was wanted.

"A white woman, a white man, and two Mexicans," muttered David before replying; then in an answering shout, he told their position, and requested help.

The second waggon was driven nearer, the man got down, the horses were "unhitched," and fastened to the jeopardised vehicle, which in a few seconds was drawn to a place of safety.

David had taken care to let the strangers know that he was driving Mrs. Creed—or as he phrased it, Madam Creed, wife of the Justice of Gulchville; it was not every day that such folks—David knew them—got a chance of rendering assistance to the squire of the district.

The men worked with a will, and soon got the vehicle right for the road, the horse proving manageable enough when away from the precipice; the children were lifted into the waggon, and all was ready for a fresh start.

The strange lady had not moved from her seat, nor spoken, save once or twice in very low tones to her attendants, and now Mrs. Creed, before taking her own seat, went to the side of the other waggon, and thanked the stranger for her help. She mentioned her name, gave an invitation to her house at Gulchville—this was almost a matter of course in the West—and offered her hand.

The stranger had listened with unmoved features; so much could be seen even through her veil, which she kept down. She made no response to the offer, while she apparently did not notice Mrs. Creed's extended hand, as there was no corresponding movement on her part. She bowed slightly as Mrs. Creed ceased, then turned, and said something in a low voice to one of her men who had just mounted the waggon.

Mrs. Creed felt surprised and somewhat hurt at this behaviour, but recollecting that many of the farmers were Mexicans, and spoke no language but Spanish, supposed she was not understood. She had previously paid the men liberally for their exertions, so now, with a parting bow, she quitted the strangers, and took her place in her own waggon.

At the first touch of David's whip their single steed moved bravely on, and Mrs. Creed, turning for a last glance, as their vehicle was jerked round the angle of a huge rock, saw the strange lady watching them still, with the same intent air which she had felt so unpleasant a few minutes earlier.

Under the impression this produced she could not avoid speaking to David on the subject. "It was very kind of that lady to come to our assistance, David," she said; "do you think she is a Mexican? I fancy she did not quite understand what I said to her, and I think it is the more likely from her coming through Los Pasos Malos; no one but farmers well acquainted with the country, or Indians, would venture to ride or drive through that pass."

"Mexicans!" exclaimed David in a strongly contemptuous tone; "she's no Mexican. She can talk English fast enough when she pleases, though I must say she is a silent, sulky critter generally; nobody ever sees her laugh."

"You know her, then?" returned Mrs. Creed. "Is she a farmer's wife?"

"Know her!" exclaimed David; "why, marm, I should have thought everyone about here knew her. She don't come into Gulchville, though. Haw, haw! No; she ain't likely to come much into Gulchville. Tain't good for her, nor her husband neither."

"Then who is she, David?" asked Mrs. Creed. "Why, you have heard tell on Seven-up-Jack, the gambler, he that shot the Texan at the monté table in the Pinetto House a while ago," replied the driver. "You might remember him, I dare say, because Squire Creed had word he was coming to start a gambling-saloon in Gulchville, but the citizens had a meeting and concluded to lynch him; so Jack did not come."

"Yes, I have heard of him," returned Mrs. Creed; "but what has he to do with these people?"

"Wal, just this," answered David; "that's his wife. I've seen her with him many times, and, as I tell you, she's pretty nearly always as silent as you've just seen her."

"What a dreadful thing!" exclaimed Mrs. Creed, who had imbibed part of the general dislike, and, it may be, terror, felt in regard to this man. "Does she join him in his gambling transactions?"

"No; nary bit," returned David. "Some thinks he is a little afraid of her; some thinks she is a good deal afraid of him; but, anyhow, you never see her at his monté, or dice, or billiard tables. It will be a good job for the territory when we hear he is shot, as shot he will be some day. That is how all these gamblers end."

Mrs. Creed made no reply, and soon after the garrulous driver stopped at "Barry's," where another horse was procured, and from whence two or three men set out to discover, if possible, some traces of the missing animal.

In connection with this item, as they say out West, we may mention that the horse was found grazing quietly enough on a grassy space near the mouth of the canyon, not very much the worse for its hazardous tumble. How it escaped being knocked to pieces, and how it arrived at its peaceful grazing-ground, no one could guess.

Of course Mrs. Creed had a great deal to tell her husband on her arrival, in which the danger to which she, and more especially the children, had been exposed was, perhaps, a little exaggerated; fear will sometimes do this, but there was enough reality to cause a burst of thankfulness from the squire, and to produce such a donation to David in recognition of his coolness and steadiness, as made this the best night's work in which the coachman had ever engaged during the whole of his driving career.

When the justice heard of the assistance rendered by the strangers, and the unsocial behaviour of the mistress of the party, he said:

"I hope this will be the last we shall see or hear of her. I have no doubt she is a strange woman; I hear she has the character; but for her own sake I hope she will keep away from Gulchville. Why I say this, Milly, is because I have been informed to-night that this rowdy, this Seven-up-Jack, or whatever he calls himself, has determined to start a gambling-saloon at Buffalo Dip. That is on the Gulchville side of the river, and the citizens are resolved that they will not have any of his gang here; and quite right, too. We have loafers and rowdies enough of our own without strangers, and if Jack really sets up a saloon in Buffalo Dip, the citizens will certainly lynch him."

This was an ominous prophecy for Seven-up-Jack, the more so as coming from the lips of one who was by no means likely to jest on the subject.

CHAPTER III.

FOR some little time affairs went on quietly in Gulchville—that is, quietly according to the Gulchville standard; but presently it was said that at the nearest mining village—Buffalo Dip, already spoken of—there was a nest of gamblers of the worst character, in full operation, with their inevitable hangers-on. The effect of this was soon felt; there was a constant interchange between the two places, the worst of the Gulchville population went over to the Dip, returning furious with drink and exultation over their winnings, or, more commonly, furious with drink and desperation at their losses; neither mood being agreeable to such of the citizens as were law-abiding and peaceful.

To rival the attractions of Buffalo Dip, the saloon-keepers of Gulchville altered their style of business, and added fresh "draws," so that frequent arrivals from the Dip took place, and there seemed every chance of the larger town becoming a pandemonium. A constable had been killed, and two citizens seriously wounded in a single week, which testified to "more shooting scrapes," as the Gulchville Planet had it, than had taken place there in three months before, and all this was put down to the bad influence of Buffalo Dip, and the leadership of Seven-up-Jack. Several meetings were quietly held to decide what was best to be done; and although the justice and sheriff usually attended these meetings, strictly legal forms of action were not certain to follow their deliberations—in short, if the citizens saw a way of abating the nuisance homœopathically—that is, by like curing like, by shooting and so forth, they would adopt the means.

One morning when Mr. Creed was in his counting-house, his friend, Mr. Mark Anthony Tropper, the sheriff of the district, presented himself, and with little preface, stated the object of his visit. It was to inform Mr. Creed of the resolve to which a meeting of the previous evening had come—a meeting from which the justice had been unavoidably absent.

Summarised, the sheriff's communication was to this effect. The citizens would not endure the presence of Seven-up-Jack and his associates any longer, and what was more, they would not now have him so near as he had previously been. It had been proposed to seize and hang him, with at least two or three of the gang, as the quickest and most effectual mode of settling affairs, but more merciful counsels had prevailed.

It was decided that notice to leave should be given to the gambling leader, with the intimation that if, after the lapse of twenty-four hours from this notice, he was found within fifty miles of Gulchville, he would be a dead man. The sheriff and a couple of friends were then about to start for Buffalo Dip, conveying this message.

Wilton Creed was glad to find that the man was to be allowed a chance, although his own voice had been at first for prompt justice; for, when he considered that the gambler's wife had rendered his family a service, although only by allowing her servants to work a few minutes for them, he felt a half-obligation to Jack himself, which made him glad that his life was to be spared.

His approval of the scheme was therefore given at once, and Mr. Tropper departed with his friends for Buffalo Dip. The justice would perhaps have accompanied the sheriff, but that he was about settling some claim business for a posse of miners, Gulchville men and strangers, who were just starting for what was likely to prove a "rush," a few miles beyond the Dip.

Of course a much larger escort would have been taken—and easily could have been obtained—had immediate expulsion been the object of the sheriff. As it was, his errand, according to Western standards, might be regarded as actually a friendly one, and precedent was almost wholly in favour of such an intimation being at once complied with; so it was with the confidence of men who had no doubt of their reception, that the sheriff and his two friends entered the mining village.

The village consisted of a few scattered shanties and tents pitched at random, without the faintest attempt at order, save where seven or eight larger wooden buildings clustered round an open space; one of these being the post-office, another a store, the remainder being all "saloons," as was shown by various banners and inscriptions.

The sheriff was apparently duly advised as to which of these buildings was the one he sought, for he went straight to a saloon bearing the title of "The Star-Spangled Banner," and swinging open the door, entered with his assistants. He had no occasion to ask for further information, for there, leaning on the bar or counter at the end of the place, in conversation with the bartender, was Seven-up-Jack. The latter glanced round as the visitors entered, and Mr. Tropper, who knew the gambler by sight, called him "Jack," and expressed a wish to have a few words with him.

The visit of the sheriff unfortunately proved to be timed most inopportunistically; the gambler was terribly out of temper, and by no means inclined to render ready obedience to the law, or any of its ministers. On the previous evening he had been very unlucky, having been stripped of all the money he had about him, to say the least of it, by a braggart miner who insulted him over his losses; conduct which would have led to an exchange of shots, but for the man's declaration of his intent to return on the following evening, with the means and the will to play Seven-up-Jack, and "all his outfit," for their bottom dollar.

This, with the addition of a few score of Western oaths, was what the miner said, and the prospect of having a complete revenge—of first winning back all his money, with a good deal of the miner's to boot, and then shooting his boastful opponent—had held back the gambler's hand, and saved one life, on that night, at any rate. To leave the prospect of this double vengeance, to allow his insulter to retain his gold, and to be able to vaunt how he had defeated Seven-up-Jack, and cowed him so that he never would face his conqueror again, to ask him to submit to this at the bidding of a sheriff was asking too much of flesh and blood—of such flesh and blood as an exasperated Western gambler, assuredly.

Seven-up-Jack flatly refused to accept any order to quit, and defied all the Vigilantes in Gulchville, or out of it, to drive him from Buffalo Dip.

"They won't be Vigilantes, siree!" returned the sheriff; "this is going to be a legal expulsion—that is so. We shall have the sheriff's posse around, and we will take you out of this very saloon, this very night. Yes, sir."

The sheriff had been recognised, and his arrival noised about, so by this time a group of men had gradually entered the saloon, and were listening to this discussion. Their enquiring glances told Seven-up-Jack that his prestige was upon its trial, and probably made his mood more dangerous.

"Go home, and mind your store. Don't meddle with grown-up men!" retorted the gambler, using very strong language in addition, which it appeared was not at all customary with him, and showed he was not quite himself. "When we want Gulchville loafers here we'll send for them."

"They will come without being sent for, Jack," returned the sheriff; "and if you do not clear out as I order you——"

"You order me!" interrupted the other with a scornful laugh.

This laugh found an echo in the admirers who were looking on, and perhaps irritated the sheriff a little beyond the bounds of prudence.

"Yes, I order you," he said; "and I feel like sending you off at once, or arresting you."

A mocking laugh was the only immediate reply to this, and then the gambler, addressing the listeners, exclaimed:

"Here, boys! let us have one game in honour of the sheriff's visit, and I'll stand drinks, win or lose. Come on!"

A laugh and encouraging remarks rewarded this speech, and the idlers came closer to the bar.

"Then I arrest you as a common gambler," said Mr. Tropper, and made a clutch at the collar of the gambler's coat. The latter pushed him away; the sheriff sprang forward, and called on his companions to assist in the capture.

There was a brief, a momentary struggle, a blow was struck, and then it was all over in an instant. There was a report, a puff of smoke, and poor Mr. Tropper was lying face downwards, shot dead.

It was indeed all over in an instant, and then for another breathing space all seemed rooted in horror. Violence and even death were not so rare there, that the shooting down a single man should produce a general shock in the men who were now looking on; but there was an immediate feeling of sorrow for the occurrence, a conviction that the deed was hardly intended.

The first to move were the friends who had accompanied the sheriff, and they, being in a hopeless minority, and fearing an attack from the partisans of the murderer, fled at once from the saloon.

"This is a bad job, colonel," said one of the men who was assisting to raise the body from the ground; "a darned ugly job."

"It is, Joe," returned the gambler with something of sadness in his tone; "what did he want to bring on a difficulty just now for? I wish he had been a thousand miles away."

"He's dead enough," said the first speaker as the body was laid on a settle; "I reckon we had better give notice to the alcalde. There won't be much more monté, or euchre, or seven-up, played in your shanty, Rube."

This was to the landlord, who said rather fiercely:

"Why not, Joe? Who is to stop it?"

"Wal," returned the man coolly, "you don't think a sheriff is going to be killed, and no fuss made, do you? If he was sent by the Vigilantes, as Seven-up-Jack told him he was, it don't make it no better—why, where is Jack?"

No one knew; in the brief dialogue with the landlord, which had for an instant taken attention from him, he had left the saloon, which was now filling with a crowd of rough men, and a few women, attracted from all parts of the Dip by rumours of what had occurred.

"Seven-up's gone, I reckon," continued the speaker; "wal, I estimate he could not do a better thing than to vamoose right away. We shall have to send word to Squire Creed at Gulchville, he is justice for this precinct. We know what he is, and what the Vigilantes will do, so it is as well Jack has gone."

There was no one to follow the criminal, no one to avenge the sheriff. Had the crime been committed in the evening, over a brawl at the card-table, or a dispute about a drink, but few in Buffalo Dip would have regarded it as a crime at all. Yet now, although they had no sympathy with the sheriff, who was in their eyes an intruder and a meddler, they felt that this was somewhat serious, and very different to the "shooting scrapes" to which they were so well accustomed.

Besides the power of the law, too, there were the Vigilantes to be reckoned with, and the prevailing sentiment in Buffalo Dip was an echo of Joe's words when he said that there would not be much more gambling in Rube's saloon, and that a sheriff could not be killed without a fuss being made.

Two of the leading citizens of Buffalo Dip, whereof Joe was one, were deputed to ride over to Gulchville, and give information to the authorities. There was no doubt these latter would hear soon enough of the incident from the two friends of the sheriff, but, as the "citizens" convened in Rube's saloon decided, it would have a more decorous, law-abiding aspect, if some of their own people went over with the tidings.

So Joe and another went, and as it turned out, arrived at Gulchville with the first intelligence of the "difficulty"—they preferred speaking of it as "a difficulty" out there, "murder" having an ugly sound.

On hearing that some messengers from Buffalo Dip were asking for him, Wilton Creed at once guessed that something had gone wrong, and so gave audience to them at his private house, which adjoined his store.

"Now, is there anything the matter—anything wrong with Sheriff Tropper?" he said, directly he was in the presence of the men.

"Squire, I am Joe Bleak, of Buffalo Dip, and this gentleman here is Major Hiram Bartelson, of the same place, one of our leading citizens. We are here, squire, deputed by our fellow-citizens to inform you that a shooting scrape took place this morning, in our city, and in the difficulty——"

"The sheriff was murdered, I suppose. Is that so?" interrupted Creed.

"I said there was a difficulty," returned the messenger, with some emphasis; "the result is that the sheriff has pegged out, I admit, and as a law-abiding community, the citizens wish you to have every information on the subject."

"And who was the—— But you need not tell me," said the justice, with a sudden change of tone; "I see him coming. Rely upon it he shall have justice done him in Gulchville."

"See him coming, squire! What do you mean?" exclaimed Joe.

"Look there!" cried Creed, and the men turning round as he pointed, saw through the window, against which they were standing, a group of mounted men crossing the square or plaza of Gulchville, followed by a larger group of spectators.

In the centre was Seven-up-Jack, with his hands tied behind him; on either side rode a man armed with a rifle, while close behind came the two friends who had accompanied Sheriff Tropper in his luckless mission.

The messengers from Buffalo Dip were silent from sheer astonishment for a moment, during which Creed had opened the door of the house, and shown himself; then all the men pressing forward, the apartment, and the store-room into which it opened, were filled with the crowd, and Seven-up-Jack, with his armed guard still by his side, confronted the justice.

The accusation, and evidence given by the two friends, which was fully and candidly confirmed by the men from Buffalo Dip, need not be repeated here.

The capture and arrival of the culprit were explained by the fugitive friends having taken a route by which they met the body of miners who had left Gulchville that morning, and whose business had detained Justice Creed, perhaps saving his life thereby.

The rest was simple enough; the miners at once determined to arrest Seven-up-Jack, which attempt they might have found attended with some difficulty, had they not been singularly befriended by chance.

On their way to Buffalo Dip, the very man of whom they were in search, rode into their midst, for as they were not on the direct road from Gulchville, he feared no danger in that direction; so ere he could draw his revolver, or turn his horse's head to fly, he was seized, bound, and guarded as a prisoner.

"I reckon we shall leave him in your hands, squire," interposed Joe, at the conclusion of this evidence; "it seems all straight, don't it? I will say this for Jack, and I leave it as my testimony, that I never saw any galoot play a squarer game, or settle up quicker."

A subdued "Hear, hear!" from the crowd evinced the importance attached to this testimonial, and showed, perhaps, that some of the hearers had been in a position to note these elevated attributes of the captive.

"You hear what has been evidenced against you, prisoner?" said the justice; "you need not say anything now, as you will have another hearing. You are committed to Gulchville gaol on a charge of wilful murder, and I fix your bail at twenty thousand dollars."

This, of course, was a prohibitive bail, as it was certain that Seven-up-Jack could find no such security.

"Constable Jolstein, you will take charge of the prisoner," continued Creed; "you will see that he is kept in custody so long as he remains at Gulchville. You can have an assistant at the gaol."

"Yes," said one of the citizens, who had been hitherto a silent listener, "you will take care he does not escape, constable. You will keep guard night and day, and you will take orders from no one but the squire. The gaol is not a very strong building, but it will hold a man that's watched. The citizens intend to have justice done in this case; their officers are not to be murdered by rowdies for nothing."

A low stern murmur of approval ran through the room at this, and Seven-up-Jack, who had not spoken a syllable since his entrance, turned his eyes for a moment in the direction of the speaker. The glances of the two men met, then Jack turned away, and obeying a signal from the constable, followed him, still guarded by several armed men, in the direction of the gaol.

This was only a clumsy wooden building, but, as the last speaker had said, it would hold a prisoner if he was watched, and the probability was that this prisoner would be watched closely enough.

"The Vigilantes will string him up before he goes for trial, Pete, you bet your life," said one of those who had been present at his committal; "you heard what Colonel Smye said about justice being done. Colonel Smye is a Vigilante, and he will have Jack out to-night or to-morrow. They would hang Jolstein in his place, if he were to let Seven-up escape, and Jolstein knows it."

CHAPTER IV.

It was announced the next day that on the following morning Seven-up-Jack—no one spoke of him by any other name, or seemed to care whether he had another—would be taken to a certain large town, there to await his trial for the murder of a Sheriff Tropper. This was publicly discussed, and the fact that a despatch had been sent by Squire Creed announcing the intended disposal of the criminal was publicly discussed also; but the discussion was generally accompanied by significant grins, which would have impressed so experienced a frontiersman as Seven-up-Jack, could he have seen them, as being unpleasantly ominous.

There was no other unusual feature in Gulchville during the day, save that towards its close, some outlying residents, ranchmen, miners, and others, rode in to the number of perhaps a score; they were all armed, but this was a matter of course. There was, however, no increase to the gaiety of the town, such gaiety as often followed an influx of strangers—on the contrary, Gulchville was quieter than usual; none of the visitors hung about its saloon doors, or whooped and yelled in its open spaces, as was sometimes the case.

Yet although the Vigilantes were a secret society, and none but themselves knew who the members were, for all that, every one in Gulchville was certain that these were Vigilantes summoned to the town for a purpose, and everyone in Gulchville knew what that purpose was.

Wilton Creed was not ignorant of their arrival, nor of their business; he alone, of the prominent citizens of Gulchville, would not be asked to join them; but he was powerless to resist, had he the wish to do so.

His store was closed, his assistants were gone; his wife and children were absent—he had sent them on a visit for two or three days to a village at some distance. It was well, perhaps, that they should be out of the way of the news—and the sights too—another day might furnish; so the justice sat alone. His table was strewn with account-books, writing-paper, and the like; but Wilton Creed could not fix his attention on his business, and the glass, which was by his side, remained untasted and unnoticed. He looked up and listened now and then, as a gust of wind would sweep down from the mountains, and howl round the scattered buildings of Gulchville, but sank into abstraction again immediately.

Presently he started from his reverie, for he heard a knock—low, but distinct—at the outer door. He wondered who could knock in so stealthy a manner, and listened, with some curiosity, to hear the door opened; but all was quiet, until at length the knock was repeated. Then he remembered that the only servant had accompanied Mrs. Creed and the children, so that he was alone in the house.

He rose and opened the outer door. The night was intensely dark, so that at first he could not perceive anyone; soon, however, he saw a woman, wrapped in a cloak, standing before him.

"Do you wish—," he began; but the woman said quickly and huskily:

"My business is with you, Wilton Creed," and then, to his surprise, she stepped swiftly by him and entered the house. The justice looked hastily round, as expecting to see others, accomplices, perhaps, in waiting, but the woman was alone. She saw his movement, and with a low laugh, in which there was something which almost curdled her listener's blood, said: "You are in no danger. I am but a solitary woman, and one not far from death. You could crush me to the ground far easier than you could lift me from it. Fear me not, Wilton Creed."

"I do not fear you; but your conduct and manner are strange," returned the justice. "If you have business with me, come into this room"—they were speaking in a short, unlighted passage or hall—"I will then hear what you have to say."

A few paces took them into the room he had just left; he placed a chair for his visitor, and seated himself at the table; the woman, however, remained standing.

Creed looked searchingly at her, but could not distinguish her features beneath the double veil she wore.

"Now, madam," he said, "please to tell me why you have called on me; my time is short—as you see, I am busy."

"Yes," said the stranger harshly; "your time is short, doubtless. You expect to be summoned to the work which will be in hand to-night. Is it not so?"

"The work! what work?" exclaimed Creed, who was really bewildered for the moment.

"You know too well what will be done in a mockery of justice, between this and the dawn," returned the woman; "but time is too precious to waste in words. Do you not know me?"

"No," said Creed.

"Do you know me now?" exclaimed the stranger, throwing up her heavy veil; "is there nothing left in face or voice to tell you who I am?"

The justice had unconsciously risen from his seat at the other's excited language, but now he sank down again, and for a moment covered his eyes with his hands.

"No," he said again; "no, I do not. I cannot have seen you before."

"You do know me, Wilton Creed," retorted the woman; "the very horror which lurks behind your denial shows that you do. You knew me as Rachel Delame—you see me now as the wife of Jule Warrock, the outcast, outlaw, and gambler, who now lies in your gaol awaiting—you know it well—a lawless doom."

"Good Heavens! is it possible?" groaned the justice.

"It is true; you feel that it is true," continued the visitor. "You are happy, have always been happy and respected. I have lived a life of unbroken wretchedness and anxiety. We each met the fate we deserved, each lived the life we had chosen. I own it. I saw your happy wife and your blooming children but the other day, Wilton, and if you bear me any ill-will for my conduct, if you have suffered at my hands, oh, believe me you were avenged in the pang I felt then, at the miserable contrast between my life and position with theirs."

"Ill-will! Avenged! Oh, Rachel, why do you come to me now?" cried the justice; "why do you rise before me at such a fearful moment? And why—oh, why speak of my revenge against you?"

"It would be but right did you wish the bitterest—but no more of that. You know me. You once loved me, and although I destroyed that love, yet I know you have never—can never banish the tenderness which clings to the remembrance even of such a woman as myself," said the stranger, or Mrs. Warrock, as she had declared herself.

"It is only too true," murmured Creed, as she paused. "Then in the name of the past love—by the strength of the tenderness you cherish for my memory, even by the depth of the forgiveness you have accorded me," continued she, "I beg of you—I conjure you to aid me now."

"What can I do for you, Rachel?" exclaimed the squire; "painful as are the feelings your visit has awakened, and painful as will be the remembrance of this night, yet I shall only be too pleased to aid you. What can I do?"

"You can save him from this awful, this disgraceful fate," returned Mrs. Warrock; "that done, I shall vanish for ever from your sight. Let my husband go free; you and you alone in this town have power to do so."

"Let free your—release Jack of Buffalo Dip!" cried the justice. "It is impossible, Rachel; you know not what you ask."

"I know only too well what I ask," answered the woman, "and know also, that if I fail with you, my unhappy, my guilty husband is a dead man—that he dies without trial or ceremony before the morning. I demand this, and this only. Refuse me, and by the dawn of the coming day you shall have two lives on your hands."

"Rachel, what can I do? why do you torture me with such a request?" exclaimed Creed; "I cannot speak the pain it has given me to find this unfortunate man is—is your husband. But I have not condemned him, it is the law—or it will be. His offence is too serious for my influence—"

"Peace, Wilton!" passionately interrupted the woman; "is it to such trifling as this that you think I have dared such a humiliating ordeal to listen? Throw open his prison doors; you can do it. He will be murdered in a few hours—you know it, Wilton—unless you save him. I implore you, I charge you by the love you once swore to me, if there dwells a spark of the feeling in your heart."

"Oh, Rachel, if I were to do this, my name, my reputation, would be gone," said Creed, "and I should— No, it is out of the question."

"Name! reputation! Let them go!" cried Rachel; "the nearer you draw to degradation, to shame, to misery, the more you will resemble me, Wilton. I swear I die before the morning if you refuse me."

"I need not—I scarcely heed that threat—" began Creed.

"No," interrupted the woman; "I should be better dead."

"Even that may be so," continued Creed; "but for the sake of the old love, Rachel, and under the rush of memories which your presence has recalled, I promise. Leave me now; say no more, or you may change me. I have given my word."

"You will keep it, I know," said Rachel; "would I had been as truthful as you have always proved. Farewell, Wilton; we shall meet once more, for I shall have to do my part, and will assist in the sacrifice I know you are making; but this will be in your mind as my farewell."

She said no more, but left the room, and directly afterwards was heard to quit the house.

The justice passed his hand over his brow, with the air of a man bewildered and dazed.

"What a fearful vision it was," he muttered, "and what a fearful pledge I have given!"

The intense darkness of midnight in the wilderness had settled on Gulchville, on its outlying suburbs, and on the square, gloomy wooden gaol in which the solitary prisoner was confined. All was black and silent as a man left the town, and with the assured tread of one who knew the way, albeit it was marked by no road or track.

He listened at one large saloon, now as dark outwardly as the other buildings; a murmur of many voices reached him, and he smiled bitterly, as he hurried away.

In a few minutes he had reached the gaol, and at the spot where a faint line of light shone from a chink, he paused and listened, having approached the building as stealthily as possible.

"As I expected," he muttered; "both the men are drinking and talking—they will hear nothing. I thought the whisky I sent down would not be thrown away."

After this he stole cautiously round to the rear of the building, which was of no great extent, opened a small door with a key, and at once stepped inside.

He was in a passage, along one side of which were ranged the three little chambers which were the cells of the prison; at the end of this passage was the larger room in which, as could now be heard distinctly, the gaolers were carousing.

From one of these cells a light gleamed; the door was secured on the outside by a heavy bolt, which the visitor withdrew softly, and then looked into the cell. Its inmate—Seven-up-Jack—wild and haggard-looking, had shrunk to the farthest corner of his den, evidently suspecting that an intrusion at such an hour of the night must be from the dreaded Vigilantes.

When he saw but one man, and then saw who that man was, a startled exclamation escaped him, and he uttered the stranger's name.

"Silence, Jule Warrock!" exclaimed Creed in an impressive whisper; "give but the slightest alarm now, and you are a dead man. I have risked my own life to save yours—you know why. Follow me."

Without another word they left the cell, Creed carefully replacing the bolt, lest the gaoler, in some unwonted spasm of vigilance, should look into the corridor to see that all was right; more he was not likely to do.

In another moment they were in the open air.

"You are safe now—fly!" said the justice. "No, not a word," he continued, as the man strove to pour out his thanks; "not a word; you owe me no gratitude. But for your wife's sake, you would have swung on a mountain-oak before the morning. Ah, what is that?"

He was surprised into this exclamation by two horses coming suddenly out of the darkness, almost upon him; a voice spoke in a low tone, and then the fugitive threw himself upon one of the animals.

"Thanks, or no thanks, I owe you my life!" he exclaimed; "and here is Rachel, who has been watching for me, she thanks you too."

"No more!" said Creed; "your thanks cannot restore the trust I have broken, and every moment you linger here brings the noose nearer to your neck."

"By thunder, you are right, and I know it!" cried the man; "if I don't cross the boundary before dawn, I shall never cross it—so good-bye, alcalde, and may you prosper."

"Farewell, Wilton Creed!" said a woman's voice—the justice could scarcely see her figure in the gloom, then for a few seconds was heard the sound of horses' hoofs beating on the soft earth—and then Wilton Creed, the trusted justice of Gulchville, stole back to the town, as secretly and stealthily as he had left it.

An hour after, as his sleepless, watchful ears could distinguish, fifty men assembled outside the saloon at which he had listened, and with guarded tread took the road to the gaol.

The building was surrounded in a moment, and then with sudden clamour the gaolers were called, and the prisoner demanded. As a part of a well understood and arranged farce, the gaolers refused compliance; then threats were used of burning down the gaol; then—under such coercion—the doors were thrown open, and the rioters were admitted, the gaolers exchanging meaning grins and nods with those who had just threatened them.

In a moment the place was flooded with the crowd, who went straight to the cell in which Seven-up-Jack had been confined—and found it empty! The rage of the baulked intruders was terrible, and a proposition was made to hang the guilty gaolers, which proposition would have been carried out then and there, but that the men had some friends in the throng; these, knowing how utterly useless open opposition would be, suggested trying them the next day, in order to find out who had been behind the scenes and furnished the bribes. This was approved and adopted, and the gaolers, under a strong guard, were left in the cells which so lately had been in their own charge.

But ere the next day had expired, or the gaolers' trial had taken place, rumours were afloat in Gulchville of a mysterious visitor to Squire Creed, who, it was declared, had been no other than the wife of the notorious Seven-up-Jack. Then it was proved that the justice had sent down two bottles of whisky to the gaolers, an act so much opposed to his usual habits, as in itself to be fraught with the gravest suspicion; and then the night watchman at the mail-stable had seen a man coming from the direction of the prison, who was wonderfully like Squire Creed.

Rising on these facts, there grew a mass of imaginary evidence, some ridiculously, some impossibly false, but none the less dangerous for that, and in proportion to the general respect and esteem which had been felt for the justice, rose the public indignation.

He encouraged this feeling, or gave a countenance to the worst accusations against him, by secluding himself all day in his private house, not mixing with his fellow-citizens, nor even admitting the most active of them to an interview—although he could not fail to know the excitement which was agitating the town.

The tide turned suddenly, and rose fiercely against the squire; a meeting was called at once to consider his conduct, at which the gaolers who had experienced so narrow an escape were present. As a matter of course, they—with their friends—were specially severe upon Squire Creed; this being the only chance of saving their own necks.

The meeting was held at a saloon, and was prolonged far into the night. Had it been a regular meeting of the Vigilantes everything would have been conducted discreetly and soberly; but this was a public meeting of the excited citizens, and the ardour of those present was kept up by continual draughts of whisky. Consequently, the indignation against the treacherous justice waxed higher and higher; his guilt was taken as proved, and the feeling grew so strong that one man who was present slipped out, ran to the Creed store, and, without any ceremony, burst into the room where the squire sat, dejected and alone.

"Don't ask no questions, squire," cried the stranger; "but come out with me. Don't stay for clothes, nor money, nor papers. Your manager, Peter Mack, is an honest man, and will take care of them. Come to your stable, get across your bay mare, and ride like thunder! They are going to hang you for letting out Seven-up-Jack. Don't stare like that; but come, or they will be here in time to hang you, and me too, for telling you."

Half mechanically, the justice rose from his seat, and followed the kindly messenger, who led him by a side way to his stable, and then, seeing that Creed was hardly himself, that he even yet scarcely comprehended the position, assisted him hurriedly to saddle the famous bay mare, and then helped him to his seat.

"Now, ride off, squire," said the man; "strike the Apache ford, and then you can get to Sandyfork, where your wife is, and— Go! there ain't no time to lose, for, as I live, I can hear the boys coming."

The man was right. A hideous whooping and yelling was heard, and the flare of torches was seen at the farther end of the town. With a hearty grasp of his informant's hand, the squire struck spurs to his steed, and in a minute was out of sight.

And this was how Gulchville lost her justice, for Wilton Creed was never seen in the town again. It was known that he went East, and that he lived in Boston with his wife and children, but no further details ever reached Gulchville. His extensive store was sold "on time," that is, by payment in instalments, to his manager, Peter Mack, and an insignificant fellow, one Jemmy Grayper—who had nothing to do originally with the concern. Each of these made a large fortune, and a vague untraceable report somehow became rife that Jemmy had once rendered a great service to Squire Creed, though no one could say what it was.

One of the frequent gamblers who passed through Gulchville reported, some twelvemonths after Seven-up-Jack's escape, that he had seen the last of that celebrity, who had been shot in a "difficulty" with a brother professor.

In answer to further enquiries he said that Jack's wife had died of consumption, he understood, some months earlier, and that after her death Seven-up-Jack grew so reckless that his meeting with a fitting end was only a question of time.

A Freak and What Came of It.

BY HENRIETTE FELL.

CHAPTER I.

It was Christmas Eve, and two young men stood in a large hall, so dark with its oak walls, its oak ceiling, and its oak floor, that not the three large hanging lamps, or the bright glow from the huge wood-fires blazing at either end, served to more than dimly light it.

"Are they all come, Gilbert?"

"I—I should think so," was the reply in a queer, half-amused, half-vexed tone of voice, as the speaker looked again at a list of names which he held, and began reading it aloud. "Three Paxtons, Sir James and Lady Lethbridge, and their son and daughter, the Cohens of Howleigh, Maud Ellerton, the—"

"Here, let me see it," said the first speaker, unceremoniously taking the paper from his brother's hand, and rapidly running his eye over its contents. "No, there is one missing still. Miss Jean Nowell and maid. Who on earth is she, and where does she hail from? I declare, this is as bad as collecting children after a school-treat."

"It's a great deal worse," said Gilbert ruefully, "because the children are collected to be sent home, and these grown-ups are only arriving."

"But who on earth can Miss Jean Nowell be?" asked Roy Moreton again, as he looked with puzzled enquiry into Gilbert's imperturbable countenance.

"I tell you honestly, I have not the least idea," was Gilbert's answer. "My mother and Effie did all the asking while I was in Scotland this year. I know there were to be one or two new people to infuse fresh life into the affair, but 'Miss Jean Nowell and maid' does not sound like a lively addition."

"Probably some old maiden chum of the mother's, who has affectedly changed her original name of Jane into what she fancies is more taking. Hadn't we better go and dress?" Roy suggested.

"You had, but we can't leave the said maiden chum to arrive altogether unwelcomed. I'll wait about until Effie comes down."

"But you hate meeting ladies," said Roy, still lingering.

"Not if they are old ones. Hurry off, do, and be ready in the drawing-room for that dreadful ten minutes before dinner."

Roy did not require any further pressing, but flung himself up the broad stairs and shut his bedroom door behind him with characteristic vigour.

Gilbert remained warming himself at the log-fire which burnt in the great open chimney-place of the old hall, and listening, without impatience, for the sound of approaching carriage-wheels. Not quite so strongly or heavily built as his younger brother, Sir Gilbert Moreton was, nevertheless, a well-made, well-proportioned man, tall, thin, and capable of an activity strangely at variance with the idle nonchalance he usually assumed. He was very handsome; indeed, his regular features and deep-set brown eyes were altogether faultless. Some complained that they found his face expressionless, but Gilbert was not altogether unwilling that they should do so, and, in fact, he carefully cultivated an indifferent expression, as he did an indifferent manner in society, both of which he entirely put away from him when he was alone with his family or his intimate friends. Circumstances had been what most people would have called too kind, and what he himself considered too hard, upon him.

Through the early death of his father, the title and estates had devolved upon him when he was only four-and-twenty. It had been bad enough, he thought, to be a young heir, but to be a young owner he found ever so much more trying; there was not a mother in the county wholly innocent of making up to him, and scarcely an unmarried daughter who did not show off her prettiest smiles, her readiest wit for his especial benefit, and Gilbert did so dislike smiles and wit! He was naturally a genuine, straightforward Englishman, but, to avoid the advances of the ladies, he pretended to be exclusive and fastidious. With men, he was a different being, and a general favourite.

To such a nature, it will well be believed that the annual Christmas gathering his mother and sister liked to arrange was extremely unpleasant. He submitted to it, because it had been an old custom of his father's, and he feared lest any hint of his desire, either to escape from it or to put a stop to it, should make his mother feel what he so tenderly wished to hide from her, that she was in truth no longer the mistress of Moreton Hall.

Roy knew, though he could not altogether sympathise with, his brother's dislikes, but since he believed that Gilbert was the best fellow going, he thought that if he had a few queer fancies, they deserved nothing but humouring. For himself, Roy thoroughly enjoyed the guests, and the business of amusing them; but then, as he said, he was the fortunate younger son.

In his own mind Gilbert had been commenting with some despair, as he stood waiting in the hall this particular evening, upon the number of young and unmarried girls collected at that time under his roof.

"Ten girls, and ten men," he was calculating from the list he had taken up again; "five mothers and three fathers, and this one old maid I am waiting for!"

At that moment he heard wheels outside, and when the door was opened he came forward courteously to meet his guest, however old and ugly she might be. To Gilbert's dismay he saw that she had arrived in a station-fly, a proceeding so utterly at variance with the usual well-arranged hospitality of Moreton Hall, that he was altogether taken aback; but still more dismayed was he when there stepped out from the fly a tall and beautifully erect young girl, who carried herself like a queen, and who in the graceful movements even of her first entry, reminded Gilbert of some Grecian statue come to life again in his dark hall. Her very beauty caused him to assume more than his usual indifference.

"Miss Nowell, I believe?" he said, bowing slightly.

"Yes. Sir Gilbert Moreton?" she answered and queried in a tone fully as distant as his own; and then with icy coldness they shook hands, and Gilbert said:

"I am extremely vexed to see that you have had to drive up here in a fly. There has been some foolish mistake for which some one is much to blame. I do not yet know who, only that you are the sufferer is clear."

"I have suffered nothing," said the girl in a deep, sweet voice, "and I would rather you did not apologise."

Gilbert took her at her word, and gravely pointing to a maid-servant, who stood behind him, he said:

"Lambert will show you your room. I must not detain you, because we dine at half-past seven, and it must be nearly that now; but please do not hurry yourself."

And Miss Jean Nowell and her maid followed the Moreton servant upstairs.

Gilbert thought that he had certainly been sufficiently cold that time to suppress the advances of the most audacious girl, and he shrewdly suspected the latest arrival was not one of that class, while he admitted to himself that she was splendidly handsome. And with true brotherly instinct he went to Roy's room before going to his own, and stated his opinion as to her personal attractions, with strong recommendations that if he was wise, Roy would take her in to dinner himself.

Roy, believing in his brother's good taste, did so; for Miss Nowell, although she had only had a quarter of an hour to dress in, came down, when the gong sounded, wonderfully clad in a long and stately gown of crimson plush, which would have ill suited a figure less perfect, or a head less beautiful than her own. She was warmly welcomed by Lady Moreton (the only one of all those assembled who knew her), for she was the daughter of an old friend, who on her marriage had lived abroad until the previous autumn, but who had now settled down with her child in the north of England.

"I am very glad to see you, Jean—very glad indeed; and if your mother could have accompanied you, I should have been more pleased still," said Lady Moreton; and then, turning round, she added: "These are my sons, Sir Gilbert and Roy, and this is my daughter, Effie."

And then Roy offered her his arm and marched her off into the long, oak-panelled dining-room, hung with portraits of the Moreton family of ages long gone by, and, giving her a seat between himself and young Mr. Lethbridge, proceeded to the best of his ability to make himself agreeable to her.

First of all, seeing that his companion was a stranger to everybody present, he began at one end of the table, and gave her a short, good-natured account of the guests seated round it.

Roy was an obedient follower of that golden rule which forbids society to speak evil of any of its members, absent or present, and in consequence he had not an enemy in the world. When he came to Gilbert in his descriptive catalogue he considerably lengthened his remarks.

"You won't like him, Miss Nowell, I'm afraid—at least, not this time. If you come here often, and see him as he really is, I'll be bound you will, but it's a sad fact that he does not shine in society. I don't know exactly why it is, but, you see, he doesn't care for ladies. No, I don't mean that either, for he's awfully fond of my mother and sister. It's strange ladies—ladies who are polite, and—and who try to be extra charming—that annoy him."

"I will take care not to do so," said Miss Nowell with a quiet smile; "but I am glad you told me, for by his waiting downstairs to meet me, I fancied he must be something of a ladies' man."

"You were thoroughly mistaken; but indeed, if I'm to tell you the truth, I shall confess that Gilbert and I both thought you were going to be an old maid; and he does not mind elderly ladies nearly so much as young ones."

"I am really very sorry I disappointed him," said Miss Nowell, laughing outright. "And now you have told me so much, will you explain why you so generously added a few years to my age?"

"I would if I could, but really I don't know how it came about. You see my mother and sister asked everybody while we were away this year, and we knew nothing of your being invited till we were looking over our list just before dinner to see if everyone had come. When we saw your name we didn't remember ever having heard it before, and—well! we were very silly, I am sure, but we thought it sounded like an old maid's name."

"I am so glad it does," said Miss Nowell, softly and good-humouredly, "but I must explain to you that Jean in my case is not an affectation for Jane, as I am sure you thought it was." Poor Roy coloured like an honest culprit up to the roots of his brown hair. "It is an old family name, which has been given to the eldest daughter for generations and generations. I am fond of it myself, and I always think that 'Jean Nowell' sounds well."

"So it does," said Roy, "now I see to whom it belongs. Don't you think 'Gilbert' is exactly right for my brother—it sounds like himself, noble, and upright, and generous."

"I can't tell, for I don't know him, but I am willing to allow that you are right."

"He is a splendid fellow, and since you won't be able to find it out, I must tell you so. You should see him of an evening in the billiard-room; he knows more good stories than anyone I ever came across, and even if a tale is dull, he can make it amusing by the telling of it. Then he's such a splendid master, there isn't a landowner in the county who is respected and served as he is though he's so young. And as for sport, why he rides as if he had been born in the saddle, and shoots like William Tell; he can swim, jump, run, play cricket, racquets, and tennis; he knows Greek and Latin, and French and German and Norwegian—in fact the only fault with him is, that unfortunately he wasn't taught manners at school as a little boy. Shall I go on, or have you had enough?" said Roy, stopping abruptly and laughing.

During this panegyric, which had been begun in earnest and had ended in nonsense, Jean had twice lifted her eyes and looked at the unconscious object of their conversation. It was easy enough to believe from his countenance that he might be all that his brother had said, and a great deal more.

When dinner was over she was glad for two reasons that Roy had been her companion during the first meal—because she had learnt to like him exceedingly, and to feel at home with him, and because he had explained to her how she could, by shunning Sir Gilbert, avoid vexing him. As soon as the gentlemen joined the ladies, all adjourned to the large hall, where the time-honoured custom of snatching and eating the burning snapdragon was to be observed. There was a long table around which the young people all stood, and the servants brought in dishes of raisins, burning in lighted brandy; the lamps were lowered, pinches of salt were thrown into the brandy, and the blue flames shone on the merry faces.

Most of the girls stood back after an ineffectual snatch or two at the raisins, and waited for them to be given to them by the young men.

Jean did not notice that after a time she was the only girl standing by the table, and helping herself. A voice by her side said gravely:

"You are not afraid of burning your fingers?"

"Certainly not, and I like raisins."

It was Gilbert who had spoken to her, and who for the sake of looking at her had come near her, and had actually been guilty of joining in what he considered the babyish folly of eating unwholesome hot raisins; he had intended those he snatched for her, but when he found she was deftly helping herself, he would not interfere with the independence he admired by offering them to her.

Miss Paxton, a tall, haughty-looking girl, who had been standing close behind Jean, and watching her with jealous surprise, now tried to attract the attention of Gilbert.

"What a handful you have secured!" she said to him. "You have been very plucky."

"Greedy, you mean," he answered her gravely. "Let me offer you some?"

"Oh, I did not want any more."

All the same, Miss Paxton meant to take them from him, to please him by her condescension, but he, accepting her first refusal, put them back into the dish and walked away from the table.

"Silly girl, and conceited man!" was Jean's comment to herself.

Shortly afterwards a dance was proposed by Roy in the hall where they were. There was a piano in a small drawing-room close by, which only wanted wheeling out a bit, so that it could be heard capitolly, and there were several volunteers to play. The first to do so was Molly Lethbridge, the only engaged girl of the party, who, conscious that her lover would come to her side and turn over the pages for her, was not at all unwilling to put herself in such a situation. Besides, Molly was very kind and good-natured, and always ready to do anything for other people. Unfortunately she was often more willing than she was able, as in this particular case, for she played dance-music very badly.

Jean's partner was a meek studious man, whose very worst accomplishments were probably dancing and making conversation, and pitying herself and him, she leant against a dark-curtained door and watched the scene, whilst she kindly allowed him to be inactive and silent. She was not naturally cynical, but Roy's remarks had opened her eyes to the little pantomime which was being played before her.

First of all, Miss Paxton and the two Misses Brent refused to dance altogether, all three of them looking furtively at Gilbert as he stood talking to Effie; they evidently thought he would not long amuse himself there. When Effie was claimed he sauntered to the fireplace, and apparently became absorbed in contemplating the burning logs. At this, the endurance of the Misses Brent came to an end, and they accepted partners, but still Miss Paxton held out, and by-and-by, by dint of gradually shifting her position, she found herself near enough to Gilbert to say to him:

"You do not dance?"

Even from the other side of the hall Jean could see him involuntarily draw himself back as he answered:

"Not just now; but let me find you a partner?"

And then Miss Paxton had to be content with the middle-aged colonel he brought up to her.

When the dance was over, Jean volunteered to play the next, and began one of Strauss's waltzes with spirit and precision. In a few minutes Gilbert came striding up to the piano.

"May I turn over your leaves for you?" he asked; "ah, I see you have none. That is always the best way. If it isn't rude to ask, will you tell me where you learnt to play dance-music so well?—not in England, I am sure."

He was standing before the piano looking fixedly at her, with a gaze of which Jean, with all her unaffectedness, being yet a girl, could not be wholly unconscious. But she remembered to whom she was talking, and answered gravely:

"I learnt in Dresden; but—please, I cannot play, if I try and talk."

Gilbert withdrew to a sofa in the inner drawing-room, and sat down where he could see her profile, and the lovely outline of her head and shoulders. As soon as she rose from the piano he followed her and asked:

"May I have the pleasure of this dance, Miss Nowell?"

She assented without a smile, and with her hand on his arm they began waltzing. There was dead silence between them. Gilbert was so accustomed for ladies to make the first advance, that he waited for her to begin to talk as a matter of course, little guessing how far this was from her intention. At last he became exasperated, because she was very beautiful, and he was sure she could be very winning—and why, he wondered, would she not treat him as she had treated Roy at dinner?

"Miss Nowell, don't you ever talk to your partner?" he asked in an aggrieved tone.

She was amused at this beginning, and was determined to show him that at least one girl had pride and self-respect enough not to stand his airs.

"Yes, always, when he speaks to me."

Gilbert accepted the snub, and bit his lip in anger. Indeed he felt it so keenly that he could not make up his mind to venture on another remark. Jean laughed to herself afterwards when she remembered this ridiculous dance, with its one snappish interlude in the middle.

During the following Christmas week, Gilbert scarcely spoke to Jean, except to say good-morning and good-evening, and of course she did not attempt to begin a conversation with him. With the rest of the family, and with the visitors, she was a general favourite. She could sing, and skate, and dance, better than anyone else, and yet she was so kind, and unselfish, and unaffected, that even the girls were fond of her, and confided to her when they came into her dressing-room of an evening, and sat cosily round the fire, all the small hopes and fears with which a woman's heart is often so full for want of something better to occupy it.

Roy, too, told her one afternoon, quite, as he said, in private, of his unalterable love for a certain little guest called Maud Ellerton, which love Jean knew all about already from Maud, so that she was able to comfort the young man considerably about his prospects in that quarter, when the important moment should come, and he should decide to ask the final question.

But though there was such entire silence between Gilbert and Jean, they were not indifferent to each other. I suppose every bachelor in the world has his susceptibilities, and Jean's utter coldness towards him, her seeming ignorance of his very existence, stirred into activity Gilbert's, which had so long by flattery been lulled to sleep. He was piqued by her indifference, yet he could not keep himself from her presence, and all the while, silly fellow that he was, he refused to treat her, as every woman would wish to be treated, with chivalrous courtesy.

Jean watched his handsome face, and silently noted many of those good points in him of which Roy had spoken and still spoke to her, and settled in her own mind that Gilbert would make a very noble husband if only he married a wife whom he had to seek and deserve, and not one who insisted on becoming Lady Moreton.

CHAPTER II.

It happened at last that Jean was really obliged to question Gilbert. It was one morning when Lady Moreton and Roy and Effie were all variously engaged, and Jean, left pretty much to her own devices, had determined to pay a visit she had contemplated ever since her arrival, to the mother of her late favourite maid; the girl had died a few months ago, and Jean was anxious to show some kindness to the mother for her daughter's sake. But she did not in the least know her way to the cottage, and Gilbert was the only person present of whom she could ask it.

He was standing in the library window, when she came up to him and said:

"Can you tell me which is Elm End?"

If Jean had but known the thrill of pleasure which he felt even at that matter-of-fact question!

"It's the other side of the lake, and through the plantation to the right."

"Is it far from here?"

"No, not half a mile. May I escort you there?"

"Oh no, thank you. I shall find it, I am sure, without any trouble. I have the bump of locality!"

But what could this strange girl want to do at Elm End on a snowy morning? And, besides, when Gilbert watched Jean start off in her furs half an hour afterwards, and carrying an empty basket, she went straight the other way, towards the village.

He was intensely angry with himself for caring what she did, or where she went; but curiosity—or was it love?—prompted him to put on his hat, and at a safe distance to follow her. He had the surprise of seeing her go into the butcher's shop at the corner of the village, and by-and-by come out from it, with a heavy-looking piece of something or other wrapped up in paper in her basket, with which she trudged off in the direction of Elm End.

"Good angel!" he muttered to himself as the thought struck him what she must be meaning to do with it; "that's some meat which she's going to take to some poor body or other;" and then he positively longed to be able to dare to offer to carry her basket for her, as, again at a distance, he followed her, sometimes losing sight of her altogether, but always tracing her path by the little footprints in the snow.

At Elm End, a desolate hollow, where, as its name expresses, several avenues of elm-trees meet and end, there are a couple of small cottages, lying outside the premises of an old-fashioned and empty farmhouse, and generally inhabited by labourers employed on the farm.

Now, for nearly a year, ever since the death of the late farmer, Mr. Lake, this house had been empty; the lands belonging to it had been bought by a neighbouring gentleman who wanted to enlarge his estate, and it seemed that the farmhouse was likely to remain untenanted, unless someone should care to take it as an inexpensive country home, a chance which was by no means a probability.

Gilbert did not own the farmhouse, or he would have pulled it down and built good labourers' cottages in its place, for it was dreadfully out of repair. He thought over this as he wandered in at the open door and into the dreary deserted rooms, whilst he waited for Jean to come out of the neighbouring cottage, into which she had vanished half an hour ago.

Meanwhile Jean was sitting by the dying embers in the cottage grate, and listening to the long tale of one of the quaintest old women she had ever met. She listened without any desire to interrupt the narrator, for she found a strong attraction in hearing the views of life of one who had lived it in a cottage, and in finding that there, too, as everywhere else, love and self-sacrifice, and sin and suffering go hand in hand.

Betty Helliars, when she recognised in Jean her daughter's young mistress, grasped her hand within both her own, and repeated again and again:

"Sit ye down, my dear, and bless ye for coming to see an old woman like me, who has neither kith nor kin to visit her now."

Thus invited Jean sat down, and it seemed indeed that her visit had not come inopportune, for Betty was in no small trouble, though it took Jean some time to understand its exact nature. At last she gathered that since Farmer Lake's death, Betty's son, who had worked for him and had lived with her as her only companion, had gone away to America, and that, without his help, the old woman had not means enough to live in her cottage. This sounded probable, though hard, but then Betty explained how Mr. Futter—whom Jean had to conclude was the owner of the farm—had meant to be very kind, and had told Betty that she might live at the farm, at any rate until it was let, rent free, and take care of it for him.

"Well, and why don't you?" asked Jean.

Then the old woman's face changed its expression, and a mysterious uncanny look came over her as she said, lowering her voice to a whisper, and bending towards Jean till her head almost touched hers:

"My dear, they do say as Mr. Lake comes back so dreadful."

"What?"

Jean either did not hear, or did not understand.

"They don't want we to talk on't, but—he do come back so dreadful at noights!"

"Do you mean that his ghost is supposed to walk about the house?" asked Jean, a smile which she could not repress creeping over her face.

"Yeas, that he do; ever since poor Mr. Lake be dead—that's a year come next quarter-day—he doid on a quarter-day—oh, my dear creature, you don't know how dreadful it be at noight; he rattles and creeps about, I'd sooner go into the workhouse, and end my old life there, than I would live at the farm and listen to he."

"You know I don't believe in ghosts, Mrs. Helliars," said Jean decidedly.

"Now, doan't you indeed?" said the old woman, as if she considered Jean's opinion very valuable, though by no means convincing testimony; "and Mrs. Ward, down at the inn, her's a scholar, and her says as her believes it's all the rats. Now, you be a scholar, my dear, and what do you think about it?"

"I quite agree with Mrs. Ward that it is sure to be the rats. I've never known an old house that isn't a home for rats, and I've certainly never known any house at all with a ghost."

Then followed a long monologue from Betty Helliars, in which she gave vent to her conflicting opinions upon the subject. That it would be a great help and comfort to her to live at the farm, she did not deny, in fact it seemed her only chance of keeping herself out of the workhouse—that dread nightmare of every poor woman's thoughts. But stronger even than that fear was her belief in, and terror of, the walking, wandering ghost of poor Mr. Lake! She believed in its existence merely upon hearsay; but the maids who remained in the house after its owner's death, and two women who had since been put in, but who refused to stay to look after it, had told old Betty tales which bristled with horrors to her ignorant mind, and which neither common-sense nor kindness on Jean's part could persuade her to be silly inventions and exaggerations. Still, Jean saw that she had considerable influence with the old woman, and, unable to think of any finally convincing argument, she decided upon a bold action which struck her whilst she listened.

"Mrs. Helliars," she said, "if I came and slept at the farm one night, and saw, actually saw the rats, and nothing else, would you believe then that it was all right, and go and live there like a sensible woman?"

"You—you a lady born—sleep at the farm?"

"Yes, I will sleep there, if you will promise to believe what I tell you, and live there comfortably afterwards."

Old Betty considered for a moment, and then arriving at the conclusion that the evil spirit who did not care to harm such a beautiful creature as Miss Nowell certainly would not trouble itself about such an old woman as herself, she consented to promise.

"And you must keep your promise," Jean said as she rose to go, "and move into the farmhouse before I leave Moreton Hall, that I may know how comfortable you are there."

When Jean, with an amused, though puzzled look upon her countenance, for she could not help rather wondering how she would manage to accomplish what she had promised to do, left the cottage, her empty basket swinging on her arm, she was met by Gilbert coming out of the farm-gate.

"So you found your way down here all right?" he said, speaking to her more naturally and kindly than he had ever done before, and eliciting an answer from her in the same strain.

"Oh yes, and I did not come here straight, either; for I went round by the village. Do you know anything of old Mrs. Helliars, whom I have been visiting?"

"No, I really don't, for she has never worked for us; neither, I think, have any of her people; but I can easily find out for you, if you like."

"Oh no, thank you. I know something of her myself—at least, she is the mother of one of our favourite maids who died; and I have found out, during the last half-hour that I spent in her cottage, that she is a dear silly old soul."

"You ought to have learnt all about her, for what a long, long while you were with her."

Gilbert had not intended to admit that he had followed Jean's movements, but she naturally noticed the unconscious confession.

"You see, I did not know that you were waiting for me," she said.

"And I'm afraid you think that, after refusing my escort, when you had a chance of doing so at home, I did wrong to thrust myself on you now. I can go back by another way, if you like," he added quite humbly, and making her feel ashamed of her sharp retort.

"Please don't," she said, with the very first attempt at gentleness which he had heard in her manner when speaking to him; and then she hurriedly changed the subject, like a little child who does not like allusions to past faults.

"The old farmhouse," she asked, "is it very dilapidated and dreary?"

"The Elm Farm? Yes, it is in rather a sad state, certainly. It was a manor-house once upon a time, and would now turn into an excellent gentleman's place if any one with plenty of money and good taste chose to buy it, and rebuild it according to the intention of its first architect. But it was never fit for a farmhouse, and Mr. Lake, poor man, was all his life very hard-up and obliged to neglect it altogether, and since his death no one has been even put in to take care of it. I wonder its owner should care to leave it in such a condition. All the doors and windows are open, and actually one room I found was partly furnished with a bed and a few chairs and a table. I can't make it out!"

"Betty Helliars was telling me that two women have been put in to look after it, but that they did not stay. Perhaps they left their furniture, such as it was, for their successors."

"They are Futter's things, I expect, but I really wonder at his leaving the place so open. I shall write to him about it, I think, for I don't believe he can know."

"But what is the harm of its being so, so long as it is tenantless?" asked Jean; she remembered the lonely night she must pass there, and wanted to find out all she could about it.

"Why, it may be, for all we can tell, the —"

But at that moment, Roy and Miss Ellerton, now engaged, appeared before them, down by one of the avenues of snow-laden elm-trees which led from the park stables, and exclaimed with delight of the wonderful sledge which Roy had improvised, and which they had both been driving in.

"Come, Miss Nowell, let us see if we cannot get some amusement out of Roy's latest patented invention," said Gilbert.

But this proposal implied more friendliness than Jean was inclined to allow.

"Not now, Sir Gilbert, thank you," she said. "I must go in, for I have letters to write."

And, cruel beauty that she was, she turned away from him, leaving him to chafe and wonder why some women, or, more truthfully, one woman, could be so very aggravating.

CHAPTER III.

It took Jean three days to make up her mind how best to arrange for the night she had promised to spend at Elm Farm, but by that time she had settled everything satisfactorily. She began by taking her own maid, Morris, into her confidence. Morris was a middle-aged woman, who had been Jean's nurse as a child, and who, in spite of her devotion, thoroughly understood by this time her mistress's strength of will and determination. If she had not done so, she would have strongly condemned the idea directly it was mentioned to her, for it struck her as wild and foolish in the extreme. Still more dismayed was she when Jean declared her intention of sleeping at the farm absolutely alone. At this poor Morris protested earnestly.

"Why, you know, Miss Jean," she said, "my mistress would not let you come to stay at the Hall without me to take care of you, and whatever will she say if I let you go to a nasty lonely house all by yourself?"

But Jean insisted on having her own way. She did not mean to let her mother know of her freak beforehand, and when she told her of it afterwards, she could easily make her laugh over the whole affair. Jean had a more serious dread of Lady Moreton and Sir Gilbert, who, she felt sure, would decidedly blame her. But Jean was a mischief-loving girl, though she could pretend to be so very sedate, and the element of naughtiness which existed in her plan added fresh zest to her energy in setting about it.

She deliberated considerably as to whether or not she should tell Effie, and at last decided that she ought to do so; but she took care to have made every arrangement beforehand, and only to speak to her just before starting. She had sent Morris down to the farm during the afternoon with rugs and shawls and furs, and she had made her come back through the village and borrow a lantern from the butcher's wife, which she afterwards hid in the shrubbery near the back door of the Hall.

Jean was in the highest spirits all that evening, keeping the now diminished party of visitors—for guests were leaving every day—constantly amused, and attracting Gilbert to her side only to repel him by her sarcasms, as a moth is drawn to the light which burns it. When the girls went upstairs, Effie, who although fond of, had not become intimate with Jean, was about to say good-night to her as usual on the landing, but Jean prevented her and said:

"Come into my room for a few minutes, will you, Effie? I want to speak to you."

"Let me first say good-night to Maud, and then I will."

Jean went into her room, and began hurriedly to change her evening dress for a dark-brown serge she sometimes wore in the morning; then she put on her warmest jacket, her fur cap, her thick boots, and when Effie came in, expecting to find her sitting in her dressing-gown before the fire, she not unnaturally exclaimed:

"Good gracious, Jean, are you mad?"

"Not a bit, Effie dear, only I am going out for a walk."

"Then, I am sure you are mad to think of such a thing at this time of night."

And really Effie looked half scared, and as if she almost believed what she was saying. Jean hastened to explain the whole affair, and concluded her tale by saying:

"And now you are a dear kind girl, and won't mind my going, I am sure. I only told you about it because I felt that I ought to, since I was staying in your mother's house. I am sure there is no harm in what I am going to do, in fact I am sure it is right. Only please don't feel uncomfortable about me, nobody will ever know anything about it. The gentlemen are away in the billiard-room. I can go downstairs and out of the front door without the least chance of being seen, and Morris, who is going to walk down to the farm with me, will fasten up the door when she comes back. In the morning, when the house is opened, I will come back again, and shall be down to breakfast as usual."

Effie listened in silence, frightened by Jean's surprising determination.

"I suppose it is all right," she said; "I should not like to be going to Elm Farm myself to-night; but then we are not a bit alike, you and I!"

No, that was quite certain, they were not alike, but without waiting to consider that question, Jean called her maid, kissed Effie and thanked her, and putting out the light in her room, glided downstairs, stepped softly across the deserted hall, carefully opened the front door, and stood with Morris upon the hard gravel path outside. The snow had melted since her last visit to the farm; but a frost had set in again the night before, and now a drizzle of fine snow was falling and resting on the ground as it fell, and a bitter cold wind was blowing from the east. It was not a pleasant night to be out in, and when Morris rejoined her mistress, after leaving her to fetch the hidden lantern, she gave vent to the one and only complaint Jean ever heard from her kindly lips.

"Well, Miss Jean," she said, "I do think that if nothing else would hinder you from your silly freak to-night, at least the thought of taking a poor body like me out in such cold might have made you give it up!"

It seemed a much longer walk on this cold night by the lake and through the plantation to Elm End than it had done when Jean had gone that way before, in fact she several times declared they must have taken the wrong path in the dim lantern light; but Morris knew better than that, and by-and-by the gables of the farmhouse were discerned in the darkness.

Jean turned the handle of the creaking door and stood in the stone entrance-hall, where Morris had left a candle in the afternoon. They lighted it, and, without looking at any of the rooms down below, they went up the wooden staircase, and opened a door on the right of the first large landing, and entered the huge square room where Jean was to sleep. In spite of her disapproval, Morris, like the good soul she was, had done all she possibly could to make the place habitable, but that was not much. The rugs on the floor, though tolerably warm, did not look a soft or inviting bed; the table and chairs were dusted and cleaned, and so was the floor; but to a girl luxuriously brought up as Jean had been, the empty grate, and the carpetless, cushionless condition of her surroundings looked very dreary. For a moment her heart failed her, and she felt inclined to cling to her maid and beg her not to leave her. Perhaps Morris noticed this involuntary passing look of dismay on her mistress's face, for she said to her cheerily:

"I did what I could; but it's a sad-looking room for you to sleep in all alone. Won't you let me stay with you? I could pass the night quite nicely on the floor."

"No, no, Morris, thank you; I don't mind it, indeed I don't, and I am not afraid."

"Well then, good-night, and God bless you!" and Morris turned reluctantly away.

Jean stood with her candle on the landing, watching her old friend out of sight, and then, without a glance towards the rooms which opened out on all sides, she hurried into the one she had appropriated, and tried to lock the door behind her, but as might have been expected, the key refused to turn in its rusty hole, and Jean gave up her endeavours at last, and was obliged to content herself with pulling a couple of chairs in front of the door. Even that slight barricade gave her some sense of security. She did not believe in ghosts, and she had no fear of more material enemies; still, there came over her, in spite of all her endeavours to fight against it, a feeling of terrible loneliness, which made her dread to look into the dimly-lighted corners of the room. Then she harshly denounced her fears and her thoughts as mere cowardice, and resisting the impulse to keep her candle burning, she put it out, and threw herself down, without undressing, upon the rugs on the floor.

She had hoped to be able to tell Betty Helliars that she had slept soundly the whole night long, but though it was late, and she was very tired, she lay for more than an hour listening to every sound which disturbed the stillness of the night. The wind was sighing and sighing in the elm-trees round the farmhouse, and the rats of which she had been forewarned were scampering about overhead and up and down the passage. At last she fell asleep and dreamed, not of ghosts, but of the tall form of Sir Gilbert Moreton, which had lately been so constantly before her eyes, and more constantly still in her thoughts.

She could not tell how long she had been asleep when she was suddenly roused by a sharp knock upon the floor, close by her, followed by another, and a shuffling, and scuffling, and pushing, of which, even in her first waking moments, Jean knew but too well rats could not possibly be capable. She sprang up from the floor, and laid her hand on the matches by her side, but before she could strike one, and relieve her horrible fear, it was increased tenfold by hearing a rough voice growl out, "Confound it!" and by seeing through the now opening door a light shining from a lantern.

It was carried by a middle-sized shabbily-dressed man of ruffianly appearance, who was angrily pushing away Jean's frail barricade of chairs, and was coming into her room in an evil temper.

What the poor lonely girl felt, the first moment she saw him, herself still unseen, she never cared to describe; the situation was so far more terrible than anything she could possibly have found words to express—so hopeless, so altogether horrible, that for an instant her mind refused to understand the truth. She passed her hand over her eyes to rouse herself from her nightmare, but the movement attracted the attention of the man, who uttered an oath, and took three striding steps towards her. The room was a large one providentially, and Jean had stood at the end farthest from the door; now, quick as lightning, she had reached the window near her, thrown it open, and leaning far out of it, she startled the air by screaming at the top of her voice:

"Help, help!"

And as she did so she climbed on to the broad window-sill, intending the next moment to take a leap from it into the courtyard below.

CHAPTER IV.

MEANWHILE, at the Hall, Effie, after parting with Jean, had gone to her room, and in its solitude had seriously thought over Jean's escape, and had blamed herself considerably for having allowed her to carry it out. First of all, she imagined to herself Jean's catching cold and being laid up, and what could she then say to Mrs. Nowell of the care they had taken of her daughter? Then she thought of the anger of her mother and Gilbert when they heard of it, as they probably would do, somehow or other, and of the blame they would bestow upon her as well as upon the culprit. Then her fears increased. She remembered the stories she had heard, as a child, of the ghost which even then was said to haunt some of the uninhabited rooms of the Elm Farm, and at last she thought of real tramps, or possibly thieves, who might make that lonely house their nightly resting-place, and who would not merely frighten but harm Jean. When this idea took possession of her, she remembered no more her lesser fears, but, feeling as if she could not possibly bear the responsibility any longer, she determined to confide in Gilbert.

His ear was not to be had yet a while, for he was still in the billiard-room at the far end of the house, smoking, and enjoying what he had once upon a time insisted upon calling the best time of the day. This was before Jean came to stay at the Hall.

It was nearly one o'clock before Effie, sitting with her bedroom-door ajar, and listening for the sound of her brother's footsteps, heard them on the stairs; then he stayed some time longer, talking on the landing with Mr. Lethbridge and Roy, but at last there was a general saying of good-night, and a shutting of doors, followed by a profound stillness. Then Effie, candle in hand, went along the passage and knocked softly at her brother's door. He opened it to her immediately.

"What on earth is the matter?" he asked quickly, scanning her from top to toe.

There seemed nothing seriously wrong about her neat little person, but Effie was such a methodical young woman that something very remarkable must have occurred to tempt her to pay this late visit.

"There is nothing wrong," she said reassuringly, "only something has happened which I don't like to go to sleep without telling you of."

This answer was so exactly like the prelude a girl would make if she were about to confide in her brother that sweetest experience in a woman's life, and young Lethbridge had been paying so much attention lately to Effie, that no wonder Gilbert concluded she was about to unburden to him the secret of her engagement, and that, therefore, he tenderly put his arm round her waist, and drawing her into his room, said in that sympathetic, brotherly tone of his of which strangers never guessed him the possessor:

"Well, little one, and what is it—the wonderful event which you must needs sit up half the night to tell me about?"

Her fear of him came over her again, and she hesitated to speak.

"Tell me, Effie," he said persuasively; "you know well enough that you have my approval, though you have suddenly become so shy."

"No, I don't, Gilbert," she said bluntly, "for I'm afraid I've done what you will not think right."

"I don't expect you have," he said, puzzled; "but tell me what it is, for I can't praise or blame in ignorance."

"Why, it is about Jean Nowell. She is sleeping at the Elm Farm to-night."

"What in the name of all common-sense do you mean by that?"

"She asked me into her room when we came upstairs this evening, and when I went to her after saying good-night to Maud, I found her ready dressed in her outdoor things, and she told me she had promised to sleep at the farm to convince some old woman that there were no ghosts there, and she begged me so hard to let her go that I gave in."

"A crazy idea; she will get some bad chill, and be laid up for ever so long; but who did she find wild enough to go with her?"

Gilbert spoke as if he was annoyed, but Effie was relieved to find he was not more seriously angry, and answered quite bravely:

"Oh, Jean's maid walked down with her, and then came back."

"But who is with her now?"

"Why, no one."

"You mean to say you allowed that girl to sleep in the deserted farmhouse alone?"

"Yes; I—"

"Good Heavens, Effie, you must be mad!" Gilbert burst out as he seized a hat which was lying on the table, and strode towards the door.

"What are you going to do?" begged Effie, timidly hindering him.

"Do? Why, go and protect her, of course."

"But it is too late now, she will be sleeping quietly. You will only terrify her if you go into the house."

"Then I shall walk around it outside. Don't be such a fool as to think I can possibly leave her out of reach of all help an instant longer! I would not have had this happen for anything in the world!"

And without a single glance back at poor Effie, Gilbert left her to return to her own room, and there to toss sleepless with vexation upon her bed, until roused by events whose course must be followed.

Gilbert, not waiting to put on a great-coat, hurried out in his thin dress clothes into the cold east wind and driving snow. Fortunately he had learnt from his childhood to know every inch of the ground around his home, and could run even in the intense darkness of that night, without hesitation and without stumbling, straight along the path which bordered the lake, and on through the long row of elm-trees to the farm. He reached it panting and out of breath, and paused with a feeling of intense relief at the thought that at least Jean Nowell was safe now, though he was condemned to pass the rest of the night in wandering restlessly round this strange place in which she had chosen to sleep.

But he had barely had time to recover his breath, when he heard a sound of the window above his head being thrown open, and the voice he knew so well screaming in an agony of despair, "Help, help!"

Quick as lightning he dashed in at the front door, and began to mount the stairs. The man in Jean's room heard the noise he made, and instead of advancing towards Jean, went back to see who was disturbing him.

The two men met on the stairs, and instinctively, without thought, flew at each other's throats. Both were unarmed; Gilbert was the stronger made and in the best condition, but being a step lower down than his adversary, he lost in that way. The struggle between them was an affair of grim earnest, and first one and then the other seemed likely to gain the victory.

Jean, becoming conscious that the room was empty, stepped back from the window-sill into it, and listened breathlessly to the sounds of a struggle going on outside. Between whom it was, or what its issue would be for her, she could not tell, until what seemed to her an age-long suspense was broken by a cry. Surely, surely, it came from Sir Gilbert, and bravely now Jean rushed on to the landing in time to see him make a last desperate stand against his opponent.

Probably the arm which the ruffian raised would have smitten a blow which would have been decisive, but Jean, with sudden pluck and strength, seized him from the upper step where she stood tightly round the throat, and with a violent and unsuspected wrench, succeeded in dragging him off his feet, and in causing him to knock his head as he fell against the corner of the balustrade. He lay on the stairs senseless, and Jean and Gilbert, with his body between them, stood face to face in the dim lantern light.

Both were silent for a moment, and then Gilbert said in a firm earnest voice:

"Thank Heaven!"

And Jean in a faltering one repeated the words after him, and each looked into the other's eyes, and saw that there was more tenderness in them than they had known before.

"I hope the fellow is not more seriously hurt than he deserves. Hand me the light, Miss Nowell."

Gilbert took the lantern from her, and held it over the fallen man. There was a deep cut in his head which was bleeding freely, but that was the only injury they could see, and Jean took her handkerchief and Gilbert's, and bound up the wound as tightly as she could.

"We must get a doctor all the same—the first thing," said Gilbert.

"Don't leave me here, please," Jean begged in a troubled pleading voice, so different to the tone Gilbert had been accustomed to hear from her! "I am sorry to be a coward, but I cannot—cannot stay alone!"

"How could you think I should allow you to do so? Take my arm, and come with me."

"But the man?"

"I fancy he will not recover consciousness yet a while; but if he does, and can walk and get away—why, aren't you of more importance than a hundred such villains?"

As he spoke, Gilbert had taken Jean's trembling arm within his own and was leading her down the stairs and out of the farm door, which they succeeded in locking behind them.

Jean paused an instant in the courtyard.

"It's rather high, that window," she said, "and the paving-stones are very hard. I expect I should have been killed if I had jumped out of it. You have saved my life."

"What do you mean?"

"Only, that I could not escape from the man by the doorway, and so I intended to do so from the window; but you answered to my cry, and the man left the room, and I did not jump, but climbed off the window-sill, and stood listening to the fight. I thought it was between two ruffians until I heard your voice, and then I ran out, because I knew I was safe."

"You saved my life, too," said Gilbert. "The fellow was getting too much for me. I thought it was all up with me when he caught hold of my arm—"

"Ah, and hurt it!" interrupted Jean. "Why, it is bleeding, and—"

"Tis only a scratch. Make haste, Miss Nowell; I will leave you at home on my way to the village doctor."

Jean said nothing; it was not very easy for her just then to express her feelings, and she had a vain hope that she would find it less difficult on the succeeding days. Gilbert said nothing either, for he was very contented to go on walking as they were with her soft arm resting on his, and conscious that at least for once in her life she was leaning upon him, and trusting him, and needing him.

All too soon for him they reached the house. He did not mind the snow, or the wind, or the cold during his homeward walk, for when it was over, he knew his short-lived happiness would be over too.

At the Hall door Jean dropped his arm and stood away from him—already, he fancied, showing some of her old self-sufficiency.

"I must wake up the men," he said, "that we may do our duty to that wounded wretch."

"If he dies," said Jean, trembling, "it is I who have killed him, and not you—you will remember that."

"I shall remember that you saved my life." Both were hesitating and irresolute. "But you must go upstairs and get warm, and—"

"Yes—yes."

Jean moved a step or two in a trembling fashion.

Gilbert came up instantly behind her, and taking her arm again firmly, he said:

"I shall deliver you over to my sister's care."

Effie, hearing footsteps on the stairs, sprang out of bed and hurried on to the landing. A bright light shone on to it from her bedroom, and Gilbert, as he left Jean with his sister, had the satisfaction for which he had longed, of seeing clearly Jean's white face, and of knowing that at least the girl, for whose sake he had suffered, was surely a woman, and not a marble beauty, for her eyes were wet with tears as he turned away from her.

CHAPTER V.

THE following morning, Jean, though tired and nervously depressed by what she had gone through, appeared punctually in the breakfast-room. She intensely dreaded meeting the family again whom she had so much disturbed by her folly, and because she felt sure they would all be lenient towards her, she dreaded it all the more. Only Roy was in the room when she entered it, and the absence of Lady Moreton and Gilbert and Effie, when the clock struck nine, was abnormal and alarming.

Roy met her cordially, though there was an unusually serious expression on his face.

"I did not expect to see you down," he said; "at least you are not much the worse for your adventure last night."

"At least I! What do you mean? Who is ill? What has happened?"

There could only be two people who were the worse for it, Jean knew that, and her heart beat loudly indeed as she waited for Roy's reply.

"Well, Gilbert," he began—Jean caught hold of the back of a chair to steady herself, a movement which did not escape Roy's notice, as he continued—"Gilbert went off himself to fetch Dr. Morris for the wounded man, and when they had gone together to the farm, and had found the prisoner sitting upon the stairs, apparently wondering how he came there, and but little the worse for his blow, and had seen about having him taken into custody, then Gilbert seems to have fainted away, and Dr. Morris discovered, rather late, that it was from loss of blood from a wound in his arm; and since he has been brought home he has been in a high fever, because he got chilled, they say."

"And—and I suppose he is dangerously ill?" Jean asked in faltering tones.

"Oh no! I don't think so. Dr. Morris has telegraphed to town for further advice, because he does not like to bear the responsibility of the life of the baronet alone; but if it had only been I who was ill, he would have managed the case by himself, I am sure."

This feeble attempt at fun met with no response.

"And all this because of my folly," Jean murmured. "Mr. Moreton, will your mother see me? Can she leave the sick-room, and can she bear to speak to me once, just for a moment?"

"Don't talk in that way, please, Miss Nowell," said Roy, with a kindness which Jean found it hard to bear. "You know very well that we all feel you meant to do what was right, and because your pluck has turned out unluckily, it is not your fault—you are not to blame."

"If your mother will see me!" was Jean's only answer, and Roy left the room to find her.

When Lady Moreton entered it, a quarter of an hour afterwards, unwillingly having left the bedside of her son, and entertaining no kindly thought towards the cause of her trouble, she found the girl sitting down leaning her arms upon the table, her face buried in her hands, and sobbing bitterly. The tears went straight to a mother's heart, and altogether wiped out Lady Moreton's short-lived anger. Laying her hand on Jean's shoulder, she said affectionately:

"My poor girl, you too are overwrought; you must control yourself, or we shall have you ill next."

Jean did not lift her head, and Lady Moreton continued:

"At least we have to thank you for saving our boy's life last night, and—he is very ill this morning. Well, well, Dr. Morris does not think so very seriously of his case."

"Oh, how can you be so kind to me?" said Jean, suddenly starting up from her chair and turning round and grasping both Lady Moreton's hands within her own, and looking with her tear-stained eyes into the elder lady's face. "I have nothing to say for myself or my folly, only, if you will let me stay here until Sir Gilbert is better—out of danger—I shall be able to bear my self-reproaches better; they will not quite overcome me."

"Of course you must stay with us, Jean dear," Lady Moreton said. "We could not spare you now, and if—when Gilbert is better, he would not like to find his deliverer flown."

"Oh, when he is better I can go—I must go; only just now, not to hear how he is, and to know of all your trouble and not to share it—"

Excuses were needless, and Lady Moreton told her so. "You want to stay, and we wish you to," she said. "We need not analyse the reasons. We have not time, indeed, now, for I must go back to my boy, and you must have some breakfast and rest yourself. Ah, here come Maud and Roy. They will look after you and themselves at the breakfast-table."

Jean never forgot the four following days as long as she lived, and upon her whole character they left a noticeable and a lasting mark.

Gilbert lay desperately ill, and she was the cause of it. There is nothing like self-reproach to destroy all pride, and more scathing blame than Jean took to herself it would be impossible to appropriate. She could never be cold or reserved, or proudly confident, any more, for she felt that her own judgment was not to be trusted; that she, as well as other people, was fallible and timid; and as she lay awake at night, listening to every sound from the sick-room, or while she waited in the morning with almost uncontrollable anxiety for the report of the London surgeon who came down each day from town, she was obliged to acknowledge that she was a weak woman too in the matter of love, and that she had unconsciously drifted down the same path with most of her contemporaries, and was suffering from the same complaint she had so much despised in them. This conviction did Jean no harm, for it further served to humiliate her in her own eyes.

At the end of a week the crisis in Gilbert's illness was over; his arm began to heal, and, except from great prostration, all danger was over. And as his mind began to resume its usual tone, and his thoughts to run in their accustomed channels, he knew that a change had also come over the world for him, and that without the presence of a certain Jean Nowell by his side, it would never again seem the bright spot he had once thought it. He, too, had learned his lesson.

Gilbert did not have a chance of speaking to Jean for a long while, because the doctors, fearing all excitement for him, kept her from him, even when he could move from his bedroom into his sitting-room. They did not guess that he had any special reason for wishing to see her, and they naturally thought that her presence would recall a painful and exciting scene. Gilbert did not insist, because it was his nature to take things quietly and to bide his time. He saw her once or twice from his window when she was out in the garden, and he heard her voice sometimes, and that, together with the consciousness that she was within reach, was sufficient for him in his weak state.

But when Jean was fully assured that he was out of all danger, and was, in fact, more than convalescent, she returned to her old intention of leaving the Hall, and insisted so firmly on that point that at last Lady Moreton yielded to her entreaties, and consented to let her go. Possibly the fact that Gilbert had not asked sooner to see her may have influenced her in deciding to leave; but the movements of girls in the matter of love are strange and inexplicable. Jean knew that she loved Gilbert; but she did not know whether he loved her, and she would not wait to learn.

After Lady Moreton had seen Jean start for the station, in time to catch the mid-day train for the North, she went to Gilbert's room and told him to whom she had just said good-bye. She knew that Gilbert would not be best pleased, but she would rather he did not agitate himself until he was stronger, and then he could easily follow Jean to her own home. To her surprise, however, on hearing that Jean had left, he was moved and troubled as she had never known him before.

"Mother, mother, you have taken ten years off my life!" he exclaimed passionately, and then from lamentation he immediately and characteristically turned to action, and declared that if he started off at once, he would yet see Jean at the station and be able to bid her good-bye—at least, that was all he said he wanted to do. His mother resisted him as strongly as she dared; but she ordered his phaeton to come round at once, and as it really was a fine mild day, she hoped the drive would do him no harm. She did not believe he would get to the station in time to see Jean, although the old family coachman who was driving her always allowed himself time enough and to spare. Gilbert would not let any of his family accompany him, but telling the groom to drive with all possible speed, he sat with his watch in his hand, and his eyes fixed sometimes upon it, and sometimes upon the towers and chimneys of the town they were nearing.

"Express started yet?" he asked of the first porter he saw outside the station.

"Just off, sir."

With amazing speed, especially considering his invalid condition, Gilbert hurried on to the platform; the carriage-doors of the train were all shut, and the guard was giving the signal for it to start, but when he saw and recognised Gilbert he waited a moment, and Gilbert, catching sight of a well-known fur cap at the window of a certain carriage, opened the door and jumped in, and, as the train moved out of the station, found himself face to face and alone with Jean Nowell.

"I've only just caught you," he said, panting and laughing, and trying to put her at her ease, for she looked half scared with surprise. "What did you mean by running away without saying good-bye to me?"

"I left a message with Lady Moreton. I knew you were getting well. Oh, but why have you come out now to make yourself ill again? And—the train has started. What do you mean to do?"

"I mean to telegraph at the next station to my groom to take the carriage back again. You don't mind my escorting you to your home?"

"No," doubtfully, "but my maid is in the next carriage, and—you ought not to be out."

"Neither ought you to have come away without saying good-bye to me. You knew I wanted to see you."

"No; how could I? I was especially forbidden your room."

"And that hurt you—you cared, did you not, whether you might see me or not?"

Gilbert spoke anxiously, for he knew how much depended on her answer. She was silent for a moment, and then she said softly:

"Yes, I cared."

"And now that I have followed you, you are glad—you like being with me?"

"Yes," very softly and hesitatingly.

A pause, during which Gilbert leant forward and looked intently at her averted and blushing face.

"And more than that, isn't it, Jean? More than like—it is love, isn't it? Don't you love me?"

Then, with an attempt at her old spirit, Jean drew herself up, and said severely:

"No, I will not say that first; you should make love to me, and not I to you!"

"And so I will, and so I do, my darling. I have been always waiting for a girl who was to be won, and now I have found her. Jean, Jean, I love you with my whole heart, and I will guard and cherish you till my life's end, if you will only trust yourself to my care."

"I believe you, Gilbert," she said tenderly; "and I love you too, and will do my best to be to you the good wife you deserve."

The first time the train stopped, Gilbert sent telegrams to his home and to his groom to say that he would not be back for a day or two, and although he was none the worse for his early escape from the doctor's hands, he was either not able or not willing to return to Moreton for several weeks, and when he did so, it was to make arrangements for bringing a bride to his old home.

And meanwhile matters had there settled themselves very conveniently for him. Roy, stimulated by his engagement to Maud Ellerton, was only too glad to leave the Hall, and to take possession of a manor-house in a neighbouring county, which he owned, but which he had always declared a great deal too dull to live at.

And Effie had been obliged to write to Gilbert the happy story which she did not confide to him on a certain memorable evening, for she had become engaged to young Lethbridge, and, indeed, was married to him before Easter-time.

There remained only Gilbert's mother to provide for, and Jean felt so tenderly towards her, that she begged her husband to set apart a wing in the Hall for her permanent home.

And what became of the two other and humbler characters in the tale? The ruffian of Elm Farm, when brought to justice, was recognised as a notorious thief whom the police had for some time past been unsuccessfully endeavouring to arrest, and who, during the earlier hours of the night he had intended passing, as he doubtless had spent many others, at Elm Farm, had broken into and robbed a rectory a few miles off, and being found guilty of that and of similar offences, he was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment, during which period he died.

And as for Betty Helliars? Jean felt so completely humiliated that she had not been able to make up her mind to visit the old woman before she left the Hall, but she did not forget her, and intended to arrange somehow or other for her welfare as soon as she could.

It so happened that one of the first walks she took with her husband in her new home, was through the plantation towards the Elm Farm. Where the last long avenue turned off down to it, she stopped abruptly.

"Let us come this way," said Gilbert; "you must not shrink from it."

"No, no! I don't," she answered firmly; but the hand which rested on Gilbert's arm was quivering.

They reached the bottom of the valley, and stood by the tall elm-trees which had surrounded the old farm, but instead of its creeper-covered walls and mullioned windows, Jean saw a neat row of new thatched cottages.

"Why, Gilbert," she exclaimed, "what a transformation! Has Mr. Futter really done all this for the old place?"

"No, not Futter. I bought the farm of him. It was a disgrace as well as a danger to the neighbourhood, and I wanted more cottages for the labourers on our estate, and was glad to have them built here."

"Gilbert, how pleased I am! And they look such model houses too. Are they all inhabited, or may I go into one?"

"They are all occupied; but anybody about here will be only too glad to see you, Jean—in fact you must learn to know all our people. But come into this end one first."

And Gilbert knocked at the door as he spoke. A cheery voice answered, "Please to come in," and Jean, on entering, was met by Betty Helliars, who made a lower curtsy than ever on seeing whom she was admitting, and who, smiling and excited, began to tell how this was "quite the most beautiful house that ever was builded, and that no rain didn't come in, nor cold winds, and there wasn't no rats nor crying children, nor nothing to trouble we," and, indeed, before her visitors left she had assured them, with tears in her eyes, that "she hadn't expected two forenoons in one day, but that she felt as if life in this new cottage, rent free, was a fresh day altogether."

"Gilbert," said Jean, as she was returning with him to the Hall, "there are not many things in life which are wholly good, but disinterested kindness is one of them."

"So my bachelor susceptibilities taught me to discern; that is the reason why I married you."

"I am not kind, I am not good."

"I believe you to be both."

"Ditto, ditto!"

"And long may it last!"

Sharow Mires.

BY SUSAN K. PHILLIPS.

FAIR fall the July evenings, on hill, and glen, and moor,
Where down from storied Wensleydale rolls her own river, Ure,
Chafing amid her boulders, or glimmering, calm and deep,
Where her oak shadows rest serene, and her white lilies sleep;
Sweeping beneath the arches of many an ancient bridge,
And broadening as her tribute becks, pour down from cliff and ridge,
Past thorp and farm and hamlet, past towns with tapering spires,
And rushing by the sullen pools that lie in Sharow Mires.

Along the wooded banks of Ure will youth and maiden stray,
As on the furze on Winnie Hill red gleams the dying day;
While the soft breezes of July wave every wild rose head,
And kiss the thousand flowerets, that blossom where they tread;
They linger where the Red Bank wears his fir-trees like a crown,
And look where the grey Minster stands, as guard of Ripon town;
But the whisper falters on the lip, the careless laughter dies,
As they wander where the Mires stretch, beneath the darkening skies.

For the shadow of a treachery hangs ever o'er the place;
Amid the flags and bulrushes might gleam a ghastly face;
A moan might mingle in the sound the evening breezes make,
As they rustle through the meadow-sweet the willow leaves to shake;
Since, when July days, in bygone times, were counted to the third,
They say, one alder's slender boughs without a wind were stirred;
While o'er the marshes, at its side, fast flitted ghostly fires,
And an echo, as of flying feet, was heard on Sharow Mires.

Two hundred years and more have passed since the dark deed was wrought,
That to the lonely haunt by Ure its evil memories brought,
And fainter show the shadows of love, and wrath, and wrong,
That stamped the bitter impress that Nature wears so long;
Yet still the story lingers of the gallant Cavalier,
Who crossed the moat at Markington, when Rupert's call rang clear;
And the fair girl, who, heedless of Roundhead kith and kin,
Gave all her maiden fealty to that knightly "man of sin."

Fast by the hoary Minster, her stern old father dwelt,
Whose iron will nor manly troth, nor girlish tears could melt,
Who crushed the young heart's pleadings beneath his iron laws,
And sent his sons to battle, for the Saints and for the Cause;
Yet eve by eve she stole away, and down the silent street,
And by the long beech avenue, went the "small glancing feet,"
Nerved by the hope that never fails, the strength that never tires,
She went to meet Sir Roger, at the tryst in Sharow Mires.

"And if I die, love, your sweet name shall soothe my parting breath,
And I'll hew a place in Cromwell's ranks to grace you in my death;
And if we win, I'll come again by bold Prince Rupert's side,
Despite of prayer and Puritan, to claim my bonnie bride;
And if we lose, and yet I dare to bring you from the fight
The broken blade and colours torn of your defeated knight,
Will you meet me, in the gloaming, here, at our trysting-place,
To give to that dark hour of mine, the sunshine of your face?"

Thus to fair Alice Letheby, Sir Roger Graham said,
As sobbing on his steel-clad breast, she leant her golden head;
And so they kissed and parted, that morning of July;
Ere with trumpet blare and roll of drum, the Royalists marched by.
Some saw them pass with curses, some watched them go with tears,
Some muttered, "Down with Belial!" some, "God bless the Cavaliers!"
And sweet Alice knew her lover's gain meant ruin of her sire's,
As through the crowds in Ripon streets, she stole from Sharow Mires.

And all next day dark rumours, grew thickly in the town;
Wild news of fear and fight and flight, flew fast from Marston Down;
And flying bands had dashed at speed, through the watchers in the Square,
And Leslie's, Cromwell's, Rupert's names, were hurdling in the air;
Old Letheby buckled on his belt, and took his heavy sword,
And barred his low-browed portal, and bade his men keep ward,
And forth he went to gather the tidings of the hour,
And deemed his daughter was bestowed, safe in her maiden bower.

Was ever yet the way of love by earthly barrier stopped?
Down from her rose-twined lattice fair Alice, trembling, dropped,
Her eye by love-light quickened, her step by love made sure,
She gained the tiny shallop moored, on the birchen banks of Ure,
And even as Lord Fairfax' Post, drew rein beside the Cross,
While the rabble's fickle cheer arose to hail their monarch's loss;
E'en as the Minster bells clashed out, and blazed the beacon fires,
She glided to the farther bank, and stood on Sharow Mires.

Not long alone she waited beside the alder tree,
While the night-jar warbled at her side, and the bat swooped fitfully;
Not long, ere starting to her feet, she held her breath to heed
The echo of a horse's hoofs, as spurred to desperate speed;
And thundering down the Roman Riggs the reckless rider came,
She heard him spring to ground, she heard him falter forth her name,
And for a moment, wounds, defeat, and dangers and alarms,
Were all forgotten as she sought her shelter in his arms.

One moment only, treachery had dogged her on her way,
For jealousy had watched the flight it hated to betray;
E'en as she knelt beside him, and strove his wounds to stanch,
A furious hand drew backward the alder's sheltering branch,
A passionate oath the silence of the lonely marshes broke,
A sudden, brief, unequal strife, a deadly dagger stroke,
And a bitter shriek, the shriek of one whose light of life expires,
As they tore her from her lover's corpse, rang out o'er Sharow Mires.

So, says the tale, her sire bore his fainting child away,
And left her slaughtered soldier to moulder where he lay,
For terror was upon the land, and no man dared to stir
To bear the knight to holy ground, to soothe or succour her;
And while the robin sang his dirge, the woodbine wove his shroud,
Beside the silenced Minister, 'neath her weight of woe she bowed,
And ere upon the alder the leaves grew gold and red,
They bore the blighted blossom to her rest amid the dead.

To rest!—as every fresh July (the story rose and grew)
Came to the three broad Ridings, their beauty to renew,
On its third day, as gloaming fell, a shadowy form would glide;
From the tomb beneath the yew-tree, and seek the riverside;
And in a phantom shallop to the willow copses pass,
And sink below the alder boughs, upon the lush-green grass;
While round her and above her would dance the mocking fires,
And the echo of a horse's tread was heard on Sharow Mires.

At last they dug the earth away around the alder's root,
And found the good knight's skeleton, found wild war's bitter fruit,
Bore it away in reverence, and at length in hallowed ground,
For him who died for Church and King a fitting rest was found;
And, guided by a gentle thought, they made her warrior's grave,
Where over the fair Puritan, the white rose loved to wave,
And so, when nigh two hundred years of time and tide were passed,
They whom life held apart were joined, by kindly death at last.

And since the holy rites were said under the old gnarled yew,
Quiet, as their united souls they lie, that faithful Two.
No spectre haunts the river bank, or scares the narrow street,
And upon Sharow's meadows green, no phantom horse-hoofs beat;
Yet still a shapeless something hangs about the lonely spot,
The spirit of the evil deed whose fame is nigh forgot,
And the whispering of the July breeze a nameless awe inspires,
As it ruffles the bright breast of Ure, and sighs through Sharow Mires.

A Nine Days' Wonder.

By M. F. THEED.

CHAPTER I.

IN one of the best furnished and most commodious bedrooms in a Baywater boarding-house, within a stone's-throw of "the Grove," and its great distinguishing feature, "Whiteley's," between seven and eight o'clock on a fine June morning, two years ago, a lady of a certain age was engaged in leisurely surveying from her elevated position in the bed she had not yet quitted, an elaborate costume of silk and cashmere, which had been carefully arranged, apparently with a view to the inspection, over the back of a chair exactly facing her.

"I don't know how I shall look in it," she was saying to herself doubtfully, her head bent critically upon one side. "I was a fool to let that woman overpersuade me. They will say anything to put one in a good temper with oneself and with them, and I shall look as brown as a berry in that delicate fade grey. If I had stood by my original idea, and had a good, rich, sensible brown silk, which I could have taken to and lived in for the next six months— Good gracious, Annette, how you startled me, to be sure! What do you want, child?"

The question was addressed to the little housemaid, who, without having so much as waited for her timid knock at the door to receive an answer, had suddenly invaded the privacy of Miss Dacre's room, and was standing "fly-catching," as that lady mentally observed, at her bed-side.

"If you please, ma'am, there's a lady wants you, and she says as, up or not up, she is bound to see you."

For a moment Miss Dacre stared and knitted her brows. In that moment her thoughts travelled far and fast. She was thinking of the ill news which travels proverbially at the same rate; but there was nobody in London who was likely to have had such to bring her, at that untimely hour.

Her brow cleared, and she laughed.

"What is she like?" she asked; "and what have you done with her? You are sure she is a lady, Annette? Have you never seen her here before? She gave you her name, surely?"

"No, ma'am, she didn't," the girl replied decidedly. "And she is quite the lady—such a pretty young lady! I should have known her well enough if I'd seen her before. And please, ma'am, she's waiting in the hall."

"But please, ma'am, she is not—she could not wait there any longer," broke in a second voice—a sweet, tremulous, high-bred voice, which sent a thrill, which had in it more than surprise—a souppçon surely of pleasure or pain—or both, through the listener in bed. "I was obliged to come up to you myself, dear, dear Miss Dacre. I was so afraid you might refuse to see me, and I am—oh, in such trouble!"

There was no further appeal against her entrance possible. She had come into the room, and motioned the servant out, and fastened the door behind her, almost before her hostess had arrived at her identity. And she was a most unlikely person, it must be confessed, for anyone to feel disposed to turn out. She was, indeed, a very pretty young lady—a tall, slight, graceful girl, with a carriage that, in spite of her youth and slenderness, was singularly commanding, and a face not easily forgotten.

Miss Dacre remembered it well, with its small features, and large eyes, and rich bloom, altered in no wise, save for the better, since she saw it last, two years ago.

The intrusion of an utter stranger would have been less extraordinary—less indeed of an intrusion than that of this girl. She had emphatically no business here, but her appearance was so sudden, and Miss Dacre was so completely taken aback, that she had no time to remember that she should, in the fitness of things, be no less resentful than surprised.

There can be few things more trying to a well-preserved spinster lady, far on the shady side of forty, than to find herself called upon, without any notice whatever, to give audience before she has made her toilette to a comparative stranger, and it was well possibly for both parties that the ordeal was a less trying one to Miss Dacre, with her fair, plump face and still luxuriant hair, than it would have been to most people.

She was amazed and a little scandalised at the liberty which had been taken with her, but she was not offended past redemption, and she had no unpleasant consciousness of having been found en déshabille in more ways than one, as the bright eyes of her visitor met her own.

In her astonishment, only two words escaped her lips. At the sound of the name they framed, the young lady came close up to the bed-side, and took the hand, which had not been offered her, eagerly in her own.

"Oh, Miss Dacre," she exclaimed, "how am I ever to apologise to you, and what can you think of me? If you only knew what a state of mind I have been in—what a terrible night I have spent! To feel that every minute was bringing it nearer and nearer, and that if I did not escape from it at once, there would be no chance for me again as long as I lived! And there was nowhere I could go. I could think of nobody but you! Do tell me you are not too angry with me—that you won't turn me out, if it is only—"

She stopped and coloured in such palpable confusion that the last thing in the world possible to so good-natured a person as was she with whom she had to deal, was to be angry with her; but the reference was scarcely a happy one, and there was a certain contraction of Miss Dacre's lips as she answered:

"We won't say anything about anybody's sake but your own, Lady Florence, and I shall not be so unmannerly as to turn you out; but I am so entirely at a loss to know what has brought you here, or what I can do for you, that until you tell me I cannot promise. It is nothing very dreadful that has befallen you, I hope? I am so out of the fashionable world," she added stiffly, "that I do not even know whether I am speaking to Lady Florence Innes or Lady Florence Templeman. Your marriage was, I know, announced for this month, but the date of it has escaped my memory."

"Is it possible you do not know?" the girl exclaimed with mingled surprise and amusement. "It has been fixed for the last three weeks—fixed for this morning, at St. James's, Piccadilly."

For a moment the other stared at her aghast. "This morning, at St. James's!" she repeated; "but you have put it off—why? Do you know it is a most unlucky thing to put off a wedding? You should never have done it—never! If you had never arranged it—ah well! it is useless to go back over that old ground. Once having arranged it, you should not have put it off on any account."

The girl was half laughing, half crying. "But I have not put it off, dear Miss Dacre," she tried to explain. "That is the worst of it. The breakfast is all ready, and the guests are all bidden, and the bride, unfortunately, is such an indispensable adjunct! A bridal without a bride—conceive it!"

"My dear, I don't understand you," Miss Dacre said gravely, not quite sure whether her visitor's brain had not become affected suddenly. "You must excuse my saying so, but you seem to me to be talking the wildest nonsense. You can never seriously mean to suppose that you intend the whole thing to come to nothing—that, in fact, you have run away!"

"I am afraid that is what I do mean, Miss Dacre, and I want you to help me. Indeed and in truth I do." She had seated herself near the foot of the bed, and as she spoke she leant forward, a beautiful, bright piece of colouring, full of life and grace, in the subdued light of the room.

"You want me to help you," Miss Dacre exclaimed warmly. "You should think first—pardon me for reminding you—what you are asking me to help you to do. If you did not think you liked this

Mr. Templeman well enough to marry him, you must have found it out long ago, and you should have spoken out and said so. You have no right now to make him and yourself the talk of the town, or to ask other people to aid and abet you in doing it."

The flush on the girl's cheek deepened.

"I know," she said, with a little dignified reproach in her tone and manner, "that what you say is all I could expect to have said to me by anybody else, but I did think that you would see it differently, that you would understand and be able to make allowances for me. Of course, if you don't—"

There was a forlorn cadence in her voice that touched Miss Dacre.

"Cannot you see for yourself, my dear child, that it is impossible? If, before things had gone so far, you had chosen to come to me, it would have been another thing. But now—I can only repeat it—now, there is only one thing that anybody who has any regard for you can advise you to do. You have still time to go back and appear in your proper place, at the proper time, and, as to this little escapade, nobody need be any the wiser."

There was no mistaking the earnestness with which she spoke. In her mind there was no doubt as to the course to be pursued, but in Lady Florence's there was no such clear conviction. She had a much stronger perception of the wrong she had already done Alan Dacre than of that she was about to do this other man, whom she had allowed to supplant him, and it seemed to her extraordinary—not to say unnatural—on the part of Alan's aunt to condemn any step which should be the means of restoring the old understanding between them.

Here, at least, she had expected to be received with open arms, and, lo and behold! Miss Dacre's one thought was to get her back again in time! And back to what? She was an old maid, certainly, and possibly was never near marrying anybody herself, but surely she might understand what it must feel like to bind yourself for life to a man you don't care about, when the man you do is on his way home to you!

"But Alan!" she exclaimed piteously, and a shade impatiently to boot. "You don't think of Alan, and the difference it will make to him."

"The time for thinking of Alan is past and over, Lady Florence. But that I do not wish to say anything unkind to you, I should say it would have been well for him had you thought as much of him whilst you had the right to do it, as I did."

"Whilst I had the right to do it!" the girl exclaimed pitifully. "Oh, Miss Dacre, I deserve to have hard things said to me, I know, but you need not put it as if there must be an end to everything between us for ever and ever. And you know so little about it. You don't know how I was driven into it. You never had to live with Lady St. Oban, and you don't know how impossible it is to hold your own against her. And it was, oh, such a long time to look forward to Alan's return!"

The elder lady was watching her with keen eyes. There was not an inflection in her voice, a change in her countenance, which escaped that scrutiny.

"And this Mr. Templeman was very rich?" she added quietly, and as if by way of conclusion, as the girl paused.

If it was her object to discompose her by putting the question at all—above all, by putting it, as she did put it, significantly—she failed in its attainment.

"Yes," Lady Florence said simply, "he is very rich, and he is very kind. He made so much of me always, and they all thought so much more of me because of it."

"And your engagement? That was too small a thing to be spoken of, I suppose?"

At this home-thrust, the delicate colour in her cheek deepened again perceptibly.

"You know, Miss Dacre," she said plaintively, "it was scarcely a recognised thing at home from the first. Papa's was only a half-and-half sanction, conditional on circumstances—on our continuing to care for each other, and so forth. And Mr. Templeman knew nothing about it."

"Whilst Lady Florence Innes did not think it worth her while to enlighten him? Well, my dear, I am glad to find there was, at all events, one person blameless in the matter," Miss Dacre observed calmly. "Perhaps, as you have told me so much already, you will not mind finishing the story, and explaining what induced you, at the eleventh hour, to change your mind? Was there any change in your fiancé?" she added dryly. "Was he any less kind to you?"

She was determined, and the other saw it, to set her conduct before her in its worst possible colours, to make her out, as she indignantly said to herself, as ungrateful as she is fickle. She must be very fond of Alan, she reflected, after all, to endure so much so patiently at the hands of his aunt, and yet she was not, she could not bring herself to be, really angry with Miss Dacre.

"No," she said; "he was as kind as ever. I have acted very badly by him, and I am very sorry, but I cannot help it. It had nothing to do with him, Miss Dacre. Can't you guess what it was? You know surely? It was in the Times yesterday? Alan is ordered home on sick-leave. He will be here in England—here in London, most likely, in less than a month."

"Yes, I know," said Miss Dacre. "And you thought that his illness, whatever it might be, lay at your door?"

"Oh no, indeed I did not," laughed the girl unconcernedly. "His health is all right, I have no doubt. He has been dying to get leave ever since he went out, and at last he has managed it."

"You speak very confidently. You don't mean me to suppose, Lady Florence, that you have kept up a correspondence with him all this time?"

Again the blue eyes dropped, and the colour rose hotly in the fair cheeks.

"I have not written very regularly," she said; "but I have never ceased writing—quite."

"In fact you have never told him the truth?"

For a moment the girl hesitated, then she threw her pretty head back with a gesture, at once petulant and defiant, and laughed out her answer:

"Come now, Miss Dacre, confess that it is a very good thing that I have not."

She was laughing, but her companion looked graver than ever.

"I am not so sure that it is so," she replied in a tone that was in unison with her face. "It would have come with a better grace from you than from me, and I mentioned you when I last wrote, so that he cannot have misunderstood. I did it never thinking, but it is done, and it cannot be helped. And I am glad that you know it, my dear. It will make it easier for you to accept your fate, now that you know that, by this time, he must have made up his mind to his."

For a moment there was a silence between the two women, and the bullfinch, whistling away in the window, had it all to himself. Then her young ladyship looked up with a little sigh, and remarked plaintively to her hostess:

"Yes, of course, as you say, you did it not thinking. But, poor dear boy! how unhappy you must have made him to be sure. Do you know I never felt, until now, what a horribly wicked thing I was going to do. To think that before twelve o'clock to-day, if Lady St. Oban had not happened to make such a fuss about the Times being sent back into the library, which, of course, made me wish to see it, I should have perjured myself for life."

Miss Dacre was beginning to feel what a woman may be supposed to feel, who has arrived at the end of her resources. Nothing she could say apparently had any effect upon this eccentric young woman, and what it was open to her to do she scarcely knew. She could not exactly give her in custody, on a charge of refusing to allow herself to be married, nor could she be sent back by force to the paternal mansion. She could, of course, telegraph to the earl to come and fetch his daughter, but to do this would be to make the matter almost as public as she seemed bent upon making it herself.

She suggested it, nevertheless, by way of intimidation.

"It would be no good," Lady Florence replied coolly. "I should not go with him. I will never return to that house, until I am Alan's wife. They may say and do what they like then."

"If you really mean that for your ultimatum," Miss Dacre said at last, "I must beg of you to go down into the drawing-room, whilst I get up, for, if you won't go to Berkeley Square, I must."

"I beg you a thousand pardons," springing to her feet; "I forgot I was keeping you a prisoner all this time. But, Miss Dacre, you don't really mean you are going? What will you say to them? They will be so angry about me." She hesitated for a moment, then added ingenuously: "Forgive me, but they might be rude to you."

"They might," was the laconic reply, "without reason. What I wish to prevent is their being so with reason. To harbour your ladyship here, without your father's knowledge, is to give him, at all events, very good cause of complaint."

"You have heard all I have to say, and you would have me, in spite of it, go back and marry that man?"

She put the question to her hostess, standing with her hand on the door, and looking, as she did so, full into the other's eyes.

Miss Dacre shifted her position in bed uneasily.

"I should be very sorry to advise you either one way or the other," she said desperately. "It would be a responsibility I am not prepared to undertake. But, as Alan Dacre's aunt, I cannot allow Lord St. Oban to suppose for one moment that I have sanctioned the part you think of playing to-day. Whether, had Alan been in England to do it, he would have condescended to run away with the young lady who had once openly thrown him over for a better match, I cannot say; but you must excuse me if I venture to doubt it."

Never, perhaps, had Lady Florence Innes been called upon to submit to plainer speaking.

She had known Miss Dacre for years, it is true, but it had been in the slightest, most superficial way, and as to her real opinions and feelings they had not, sooth to say, concerned Lady Florence at all. She had known quite well all along that Captain Alan Dacre was no match for her—that there should be any question as to her being in every way desirable for him, had never crossed her mind.

The way in which things were being put to her now is so much more novel than pleasant, that she could almost find it in her heart to wish her hostess a very good-morning, and really take her advice, and go back again.

But Alan is no more responsible for his aunt than she is for him, and then there is that note to her father, the contents of which are by this time known to more than him. Go back and face them all after that! No; she has crossed the Rubicon, whatever she may have to put up with on this side of it, until her lover returns!

"You give me no quarter," she said with a faint smile; "and I am quite at your mercy. If you won't have me, I must go and find a lodging for myself, I suppose. Only I thought it better—that everyone would be better pleased."

"My dear," Miss Dacre broke in unceremoniously, "you know very well you can do nothing of the kind. If you will go downstairs, I will dress as quickly as I can, and they will get us some breakfast. Possibly our heads may be a little clearer when we have had something to eat."

CHAPTER II.

"AND you really mean what you say, my lord?"

"I am in the habit of meaning what I say, madam." The clock on the library mantelpiece chimed the half-hour past ten as Lord St. Oban spoke, and he glanced significantly at it. He was still standing, as he had been pleased to stand, throughout his interview with Miss Dacre, and she could not but take this additional hint that it had, in his opinion, lasted long enough.

She rose to her feet reluctantly, with the unpleasant conviction strong upon her that, for once in her life, she, a clever woman, had had the worst of an encounter with a dull man. She had made the best of her case, but the case was too bad for her. She had defended the girl behind her back, as she would not allow her to defend herself to her face; but she felt that her father had every right to be angry and indignant.

"She has made fools of us all," the earl asserted savagely. "I do not know, madam, whether you have the least idea what this freak of Lady Florence's is likely to cost me in pounds, shillings, and pence? How much I shall have to pay for the wedding-clothes and the wedding-breakfast she has been so obliging as to leave behind her, to say nothing of the scandal and annoyance to Lady St. Oban and myself. When one gentleman breaks his word to another, there is some possible redress—some reparation. In a case like this there is none. There is not in town a man better known and more respected than the man who has paid my daughter the honour of his addresses, and it will be a pain and a grief to me to the last day of my life that he should have received such scandalous treatment at the hands of any one belonging to me."

"You cannot feel for Mr. Templeman more than I do, Lord St. Oban," Miss Dacre pleaded earnestly. "But surely if Lady Florence felt so strongly at the eleventh hour that she could not do her duty by him, it was better for her to do as she has done than to make him and herself miserable for life. After all, the mortification of the moment was preferable to the risk of that."

"I have no more to say upon the subject," he replied doggedly. "She has behaved abominably, but if she chooses to come back even now, prepared to keep her word and behave herself, she may trust to Lady St. Oban to hush it all up and find some excuse for the postponement of the ceremony. It is not everybody, let me tell you, who would do so much, in the case of conduct so disgraceful, so unprecedented, as Lady Florence's."

"I don't defend Lady Florence's conduct," urged the lady. "She has behaved badly all round—in the first place to my nephew, in the second to Mr. Templeman; but I believe she is honestly trying to be true to her better self now, and I do not think, if I were her father, I would try to force her inclinations."

"Perhaps not, madam; only, as you do not happen to be her father, and I do, the responsibility lies at my door, not at yours, and you have my ultimatum. In plain words, Miss Dacre, Lady Florence Innes has to choose between her father and her family, and your nephew and yourself."

"And suppose there should arise this further complication—suppose Lady Florence should refuse to accept the terms you propose for her return, and I, as Alan Dacre's aunt, should decline, under the circumstances, to keep her? What then, my lord?"

There was something in the calm, clear tones, from which, hard as the speaker strove to do so, she found it impossible to eliminate a certain involuntary contempt, which stung her listener, already past his patience, to the quick.

"What then?" he exclaimed furiously; "why then she may go—"

The destination he suggested for his daughter need not be specified here, and he had the grace to mumble an apology, but Lady St. Oban herself could not have wished his lordship a very good-morning with a more imposing air of offended dignity than this quiet elderly lady from the Bayswater boarding-house. Angry as he was, he felt, as she took her departure, that, in the manner and matter of that last speech, he had played into his daughter's hands with a vengeance.

"Will the old woman be vicious enough to tell her?" he wondered, and, thereupon, he fell to wondering somewhat more anxiously how much the culprit really knew of the position in which she would find herself when she came of age this next December.

"It would be little enough for them to live upon, the young idiots! but, doubtless, they would think it plenty;" and in his heart he felt a miserable certainty that neither that day, nor for many days to come, would his daughter's shadow darken the threshold of the house in Berkeley Square.

There were few busier women in London, in any sphere whatever, than Lady St. Oban; but never, perhaps, did she get so much into the short a space of time as on that memorable 20th of June. The bundles of telegrams, all to the same effect, made quite a sensation at the different receiving-offices, amongst which they were judiciously disseminated, and the female mind in that particular department was so sympathetically exercised as to the origin of the simple announcement, which was to change the day's arrangements for so many fine folk, that the wonder was that any other despatches got attended to at all. The great question at home was, What was to be done with the bridegroom-elect? So long as there was the faintest chance of the return of the runaway, he, too, must be put off with an excuse, but the less deception practised in his case, should she be really irremediable, the better.

"She will not return," Lady St. Oban observed coolly. "I know her delightful obstinacy too well; but it will be better to have it from her own lips than through the medium of that meddling old woman. She left the number of the house, you said? Why not send Kirloch for her? Tell him he is to take a hansom and bring her back in it. Let him tell her you have made up your mind to have no more nonsense about it, and that she is to come home at once. She won't obey you. She has been a rebel at heart all along; but I suppose the more trouble she could cause me, the better she was pleased, and she has made a coup certainly."

The advice, thus ungraciously given, was acted upon with such celerity, that Miss Dacre's four-wheeler had not set her down more than a quarter of an hour, when the hansom containing the pretty, fair-haired boy of sixteen, who was heir to all the family honours, drove up to the door of that lady's temporary residence.

"Will you tell Lady Florence Innes that her brother wishes to speak to her?" he said hurriedly, and with a slight flush on his face, to the servant who opened the door to him.

"I beg pardon, sir—what name did you say?" opening her eyes a trifle wider at the unfamiliar prefix.

There was not a more respectable establishment in the square, nor for the matter of that, in all Westbournia, but the "connection" could not be said to be a titled one, and boy as he was, Kirloch saw the surprise in the woman's face, and felt almost intuitively that he had made a blunder.

"Will you tell Miss Dacre—the lady who is staying with Miss Dacre, I mean—that her brother wishes to see her?" he replied confusedly, and upon the strength of this amendment, was shown upstairs to the public drawing-room.

Fortunately for him, it was empty; it was a pretty, bright room, carefully kept, and had French windows, lace-curtained and opening on to a balcony full of flowers, not unlike Lady Florence's own, in the more aristocratic square, where lords and ladies fail to create a sensation.

"It is not half a bad sort of place," Kirloch was pleased to observe mentally, "but of course everybody knows it is not the place for Florence."

She came running in to him, two minutes after he was announced, and threw her arms round his neck and kissed him, so that he felt quite satisfied, ere ever he began, that it was all right, and that he had nothing but plain sailing before him. But the truth of it was, the girl's mind was so fully made up, she felt a sort of tender compunction at allowing him to plead with her at all, knowing all the time how fruitless such pleading would be. The more she thought of it, during the little time Miss Dacre was away, the clearer it appeared to her that the path she had turned into so suddenly was the path she must continue to follow, and the general tone of her father's message, softened down though it had been in its transmission, had fixed her in her resolve. Nothing the lad could say would alter it, and the more apparent his simple confidence in his own powers of persuasion and in her love for him became to his sister, so much the more pitifully did she cling to him, and try to make him see the thing through her eyes.

"You know, Kirloch—dear, dear Kirloch, it would not be right. I ought never even to have thought of breaking my word; I ought never to have listened to Aunt Emilia, or Nathalie. It was dreadful of me, to begin with, when I knew of nothing amiss with Alan, but now, when he is coming home, invalided—whether it is that he has really been ill, or just that he may get back to me a little sooner, either way, you must see for yourself, I could not go deliberately the way to break his heart by letting the first news that reached him about me be the news of my marriage. How could I?"

It would be hard lines on Alan, Kirloch allows, but it will be equally hard the other way—on Templeman, who is such a good fellow—an out-and-out good fellow; and it is playing a mean trick on the governor and on Lady St. Oban; it is not fair play—anybody would say it was not. Why, the breakfast is laid, and the house has been turned upside down, and as to the presents, there is a cart-load of them, and Nathalie says not one of them will be Florence's any more than it will be hers, if she does not return.

"It is getting yourself so awfully talked about," he wound up in a kind of desperation, having indeed by this time acquitted himself nobly of the task that had been set him, so far as an accurate rendering of his aunt's sentiments was concerned. His father's were more pithy and more to the point.

"Oh, you need not tell me what papa says," Lady Florence broke in with a certain impatience. "He will never have anything more to do with me, he is kind enough to say. Of course, I expected nothing less, at first. He was bound to storm at me, and I don't wonder. I ought to have stood up to him long ago, and not been so supine and stupid, but I never realised what I was doing until the time came. I am sorry about papa, but he will come round when he finds it is no good, and that I am really in earnest."

"No, he won't," said Kirloch in his most convincing manner. "And he won't let me. That is the worst of it, Flo. I shan't be allowed to have anything to do with you, and what on earth is to become of me, when I get into a scrape? If the governor cuts up rough, or my lady 'twigs' anything she don't like the look of, there won't be a soul to go to! Now, if you had married Templeman, he is such a rattling good fellow, and it would all have been so serene at home about you and him, it would have been as good as your not being married at all."

"In some sort of scrapes, better," the girl replied with a little irrepressible amusement. "Ah well, Kirloch, I hope Mr. Templeman never visit the sins of the sister upon the brother. I should try and keep friends with him if I were you; and you might tell him from me that, so far as he is concerned, I am more sorry and ashamed than I can say, and that I hope—— But no, I don't think you shall say anything about what I hope. That will be for me to say when I write. And you might as well tell papa that, too—that I mean to write to Mr. Templeman, and say what I can to explain myself. And as for you, Kirloch dear—you know as well as I do it will not be a lifelong quarrel or separation for any of us. Papa is rough, but he is not cruel, and his bark is worse than his bite."

So the young lord had nothing for it but to go back as he came, and there was no longer any hope of sparing the wealthy fiancé, the conquest of whom had been a source of envy to so many of the mothers and daughters of his acquaintance, any portion of the hard truth.

Miss Dacre, in the meantime, was more puzzled than she had ever been, perhaps, during the half-century or so of her prosperous existence. She was a clever, self-sufficing woman, who was left mistress of herself and of a comfortable independence at a comparatively early age, and had not merely liked her own way, but been tolerably successful in getting it, ever since. In addition to a kind heart and a keen moral perception of right and wrong—neither of them so common a human attribute as some of us imagine—she had a clear head which had escaped the muddling process of constant worry of any sort, and a fair share of worldly wisdom and foresight. All her life long she had striven to make her wishes subservient to her judgment, and she was anxious to do so now. She was as eager as ever she was to do right, but never had she found it so difficult to decide what right was.

For once in her life she wanted time to think, and no time was given her. She had been forced into a position in which she must act, and act decisively, at once. And the worst of it was, her action would affect the whole future of the person whom of all human beings she loved best. What was the best thing to be done in Alan's interest?

In her own heart she was not at all sure he would not be better off without this capricious fine lady than with her, and by this time, supposing he had received her letter and read it aright, he might have arrived at a similar conclusion himself; but there remained the fact that he was very much in love, and that the girl now, however badly she might have behaved in the interim, was literally giving up everything for him. Under such circumstances, though she had no sympathy with her disobedience, and though it involved herself in present difficulties, how was she to refuse Lady Florence a shelter?

Clearly, it was a thing not to be done, and equally certain a London boarding-house, just at the present juncture, was not the shelter to be desired. Annoying as it was, when she had made up her mind to six weeks of the season, and had only accomplished a month of it, she must leave London, and take this uninvited and unwelcome guest with her.

In three weeks Alan will be home; in three weeks, then, she will be in her own house at Deepdene, ready to receive him. In the meantime, she will take Lady Florence to a certain quiet little nook by the sea, which, at this early season, they will be tolerably certain to have to themselves.

"I scarcely think any of your world will find us out at Balmington," she observed dryly when she told that young lady that this is how it was to be.

CHAPTER III.

In telling the story of her own adventures at this stage of her history, Lady Florence always maintains that the oddest of them all was the coincidence which befell her, not long after her withdrawal from London to the seclusion of the South Downs. That it was a coincidence, and a curious one, there is no denying.

With some little difficulty she had induced Miss Dacre to agree with her that the risk she was likely to run of meeting with any one who had the honour of her acquaintance, in the course of a few hours' shopping at Brighton, in the month of June, was too infinitesimal to be worth consideration. There would be none but the most dreadful people there, at that season, everybody knew, and it was not, as she sagaciously observed, as if she herself were either very bad or very beautiful. She had never figured in the shop-windows, or been, as far as she was aware, pointed out to country cousins in the park as a special object of admiration and amazement. None of the dreadful people were in the least likely to recognise her, and she really did want certain things which Balmington did not supply. That the ten days she had already spent there alone with Miss Dacre had been among the longest in her life, she would not for the world have had that lady suspect, and had, indeed, been at such pains to conceal it, that the more the latter saw of her the more satisfied she felt with her own share in recent events.

She was a nice girl spoilt, Alan's aunt said to herself, with a growing conviction that the spoiling was such as might be undone, under better auspices.

They made their little excursion together, and made it, up to the time of their departure, very successfully. The King's Road, if not absolutely a desert—and for heat and glare it could scarcely have been surpassed by one—might have been Sahara itself for any indication it presented of association with the fashionable world. The two ladies did such small shopping as they were concerned about in perfect peace, and it was only upon their arrival at the station they found they had mistaken "five to the hour" for "five past," and that time was up. But for a good-natured guard, who had reason to remember them, they would have been left behind, and, as it was, there was no room for Lady Florence in the compartment into which Miss Dacre was hustled.

To this mere accident was due the coincidence already referred to. In the carriage in which a seat was thus hurriedly found for Lady Florence one other place only was occupied. Comfortably ensconced in the far corner, with a pile of newspapers ready to his hand, and all the paraphernalia the male passenger delights in about him, was a man of about eight-and-thirty, with a somewhat plain-featured, heavy face, but with the kindest and most honest eyes one person of his acquaintance had ever known. If anything, the face looked a little phlegmatic, that of one who would not be easily startled or moved, but if this were indeed its owner's ordinary temper, it failed him now.

"Is it possible?" he exclaimed, and the change that came over his countenance as the words escaped him caused the girl who, as she reciprocated his recognition, would have given all she possessed to be able to turn and leave him, a sensation of such keen shame and self-reproach as she had never before experienced.

"Oh, Mr. Templeman," she stammered forth, "I never thought—I am so very, very sorry;" and then, with a sudden impulse, she leant across, and held out her hand to him. "I don't deserve it, I know, but you will shake hands with me, won't you?"

He rose from his seat at once, and came over to her. "To shake hands means to make friends again, does it not?" he said in the quiet low voice she knew so well; "I have no wish to be anything but friendly to you. I think I said as much in the letter I wrote you."

They shook hands as he spoke, and he sat down opposite to her, but he did not look at her, or she at him. If the train would only go faster, she thought, and bring them speedier release from each other's company! And yet there were things it would be such a relief to say to him, if she could muster up courage! She had written to him, but what she had written had seemed so cold and commonplace, and she was sorry, she said to herself, and grateful—grateful for a great many kindnesses, big and little, to herself and to Kirloch—kindnesses of which she had thought more lately than at the time. It was no use, she thought—she must try and say it, however her cheeks burned, and however gloomily he watched the landscape and ignored her.

There was no possibility of ignoring her when she began to speak. She was too pretty and too much in earnest for one man in a thousand to have refused—in cold blood, that is to say—to listen to her. And this man, in particular, though he had suffered a great deal at her hands—more, perhaps, than she imagined—had had time to have it out with himself before he met her, and had already in his heart forgiven her.

There was one person he found it harder to forgive, and that was Lady St. Oban.

"She might have known," he said, "that however much I might have admired you and desired to make you my wife, I should have put away the thought of you at once and for ever had I known it could only be accomplished at the cost of your happiness, and—forgive me if the truth sounds harsh to you—your honour. She should have remembered that the right to dispose of you rested no longer either in her hands or in your own."

"No, of course not," Lady Florence assented meekly. But she was not sure she liked being talked to in this fashion now she had once been assured of his forgiveness. Still, it was a great thing that he had forgiven her.

Would her father be as easy of persuasion? she wondered. It was just what her companion was wondering too. To him the step she had taken seemed more serious in its possible consequences than it did to herself.

"Then I am to understand," he observed at last, "that you expect Captain Dacre home from India in about ten days' time, and that then—" He hesitated for a moment, uncertain how to put it, and added: "And then it is all to be settled."

"I hope so," she replied shyly.

"And what about your father? Do you think he will come round?"

"I don't know—I can't tell," with a little involuntary tremor in her voice, which did not escape him. "Perhaps not just at first. He vowed that he never would, both to Miss Dacre and to Kirloch, and the other day, if you will believe it, they sent all my things—a van-load of them, the servants say—down to Deepdene, as if that were to be my home and they would really have nothing more to do with me."

Mr. Templeman knit his brows and looked grave. "I am afraid you will have to be patient," he said, "and to induce your husband—when he is your husband—to be patient, too. Do you think, if you were to let me know when Captain Dacre arrives, I could be of any use as a go-between? Your father might listen to me more readily than to you—either of you," he added with a wry face.

"Is he not quite too good, Aunt Susan!" Lady Florence demanded of Miss Dacre as she walked home with her from the station.

"Quite too good for the treatment you gave him, my dear," was the prompt reply. "And so much better than the generality of the sex that I should strongly advise you not to measure Alan or anybody else of your acquaintance by the same standard."

Yes, he was quite too good; and yet, such is the perversity of human nature that—grateful though she was for his proffered assistance, relieved though she was by his forgiveness—she was not, altogether, wholly glad. It would have been more flattering to her vanity had he vowed that he could neither forgive nor forget. Perhaps, after all, that first pained look in his face was that for which she remembered him most kindly as she thought over all that had passed between them. She had taken him at his word, however, and she felt that if promised to write to him upon Alan's arrival, the man whose quarrel Lord St. Oban might be said to be espousing, was of all men the most likely to be able to do so.

"It was not merely because he was going to marry me—papa thought so much of him, you know," she explained to Miss Dacre. "He liked him long before there was any question of that. I don't know anybody whom papa looks up to so much. He thinks him so clever about all sorts of business and so upright in every way. I do believe he thought I was the luckiest girl in England. Poor dear papa!"

Miss Dacre looked up quickly and bit her lip. There were times, though she was learning to love her, when the girl's tone jarred upon her inexpressibly—when it seemed to her that she took all that had happened with a flippancy which was incomprehensible. Sometimes she said as much.

On the present occasion she contented herself with an enquiry as to the actual source of Mr. Templeman's wealth.

"He has no profession—no calling—that I understand; but there are works or something, are there not? He is not a simple bond fide country gentleman, that is what I mean to say?"

"You mean that there is no question of an old family and hereditary acres," laughed Lady Florence, with a little contemptuous putting aside of any pretence in the matter. "I was to contribute the family and Mr. Templeman the fortune—that was well understood all along. But I don't think there are any works now. His father made a fortune out of iron; but there was a time, I believe, when iron did not pay, and old Mr. Templeman managed to get out of his. His son is what you call a capitalist. I don't understand it myself; but I believe he has all sorts of shares, and sits upon any number of committees, and is very rich indeed."

"And is Lady St. Oban as partial to him as your father?"

"She was," the girl replied. "But he is very vexed with her about all this wretched business, and if he really went so far as to speak his mind to her, the other day, she will not be in a hurry to forgive him. And she will prejudice papa. It is quite dreadful, Miss Dacre, the influence Aunt Emilia has over papa—far more than if she was his wife. You see he never expected to come to the title, and poor mamma and he were the simplest couple possible, so that it was most natural they should turn to Lady St. Oban, who had always had more voice in the management of everything than my uncle himself. And then, you see, my mother lived such a short time, and nobody could be kinder or more charming than Aunt Emilia can be when she likes, and everybody thought it such a great thing for my father to have his sister-in-law to bring us all up! Why, I believe society at large would cry shame upon papa if he were to take the part of anybody living against Lady St. Oban."

Here the conversation ended, and a few days later the two ladies brought their sojourn at Balmington to a close.

CHAPTER IV.

THERE is a very pretty village, lying quite close to a grey cathedral town, in the heart of the richest scenery in the West of England. It is so close indeed that one is tempted to wonder how it came, in the beginning, by any separate name or separate identity, for the fine old trees in the cathedral-close look lovingly down on it, and it is possible, standing at the cottage-doors, on a calm summer afternoon, when the wind is in the right quarter, to hear the grand swell of the organ, as the people are being played out of church.

It was to the prettiest house in this pretty village, a Gothic cottage covered with creepers and perched upon the summit of a succession of little terraces, always gay with flowers, and always most beautifully kept—it was to this house, I say, that Miss Dacre, to whom as the child almost entirely of her own taste and fancy, it was dearer than words can say, brought Lady Florence.

The little place itself, its situation, and surroundings—the flowers and fragrance that crept in at the lower windows, and the exquisite panorama upon which the eye rested from the upper—the whole coup d'œil, in short, was so perfect and peaceful, that the most critical must needs have admired; and the girl, who had no inclination to be critical, was enchanted. From the pink and white nest, which had been so daintily decked out for herself, down to the queer-shaped little snugery, by the garden-door, which went by the name of the study, and was really, as its mistress confessed, nothing more nor less than a receptacle for rubbish, everything in and about the place commended itself to the favourable notice of the grand young lady from London.

And as there is no surer way of pleasing than to show pleasure, be sure the little establishment was not less satisfied with its guest than she with it.

"It is all so different from what you have been accustomed to, my dear," Miss Dacre said doubtfully. "I sometimes think it would have been better had I had you to stay with me long ago. People should always be quite sure what it is they are marrying to, and even if Alan were to blossom forth into a general some day when you are both getting grey, he would scarcely be able to give your ladyship —with a little mischievous emphasis on the last words—"a better home than this."

"But I shall not wish for any better. I was not so happy in my grand home when I had it, and I would rather have a little house, and look after it myself, than have a tribe of servants and a fine lady-housekeeper, who would always imagine she knew better than I did—indeed I would," cried the girl.

It was rather a comfort to her hostess privately that Mrs. Bishop and Mrs. Dean, and the "Close" generally, were taking their pleasure elsewhere at this particular season.

Lady Florence had made herself just sufficiently conspicuous to take the bloom, so to say, off such innocent pleasure and triumph as the good lady might naturally have felt in introducing her, under any other circumstances, as her niece-elect. In some places and in some circles such an offence against the proprieties might have been condoned, but not in Oldchester.

When once Lady Florence Innes should have subsided into Lady Florence Dacre, it would be all well and good, but the less said or thought about her in the meantime the better.

So they kept very quiet, and watched the papers, and waited for Alan.

And all this time there was no word from the house in Berkeley Square. Florence had written to her father and to Nathalie, her next sister, who was, however, a good deal younger than herself, and had never had much in common with her; and she had written also more than once to Kirloch; but she had received no answer to any of these letters. Her "things" had been sent to her, as she had told Mr. Templeman, and had been stowed away, most of them, with no little difficulty, in one of the attics; and there had been a puzzled, distressed little letter from her maternal grandmother, who declined to accept any version but her favourite's own.

For Miss Dacre, as a matter of course, there was plenty to do after her absence from home—this to be renewed, that to be replaced, a variety of little things to be seen into, and of dropped stitches to be taken up; but for her young guest there were no such distractions. She worked and read, and did what she could to loosen the stiff keys of the pianoforte, and she took upon herself the replenishment of the flower-vases. But, after all, the one solitary object upon which all her thoughts were concentrated at this time was the homeward voyage of the Orontes.

It seemed to her an immense time on its way, although in reality it reached England a day sooner than they expected, and instead of the telegram, for which Miss Dacre was preparing herself, the first notification they received of its arrival was through the medium of the morning paper.

It was Lady Florence herself who read it out, and who, skimming the list of passengers for the name she was in search of, found this: "Captain Alan Dacre, 220th Rifles, and Mrs. Dacre."

If a bomb had suddenly exploded in the pretty little drawing-room, it could not have startled its occupants more.

"What!" exclaimed Miss Dacre, and then she gathered herself together, as it were, though she could not disguise the troubled expression of her face, and added quickly: "It is too ridiculous. There is some absurd mistake somewhere. Give me the paper, my dear."

"You can make nothing else of it, it is quite plain," the girl said quietly, as she complied with her companion's request, and pointed out the offending paragraph for her perusal, and then she walked to the open window a few paces farther off, and stood there in silence, with her back to Miss Dacre.

She stood quite still, and she was not crying, but her heart beat as it had never beat before in all her life, and her face burned as though the eyes of the universe were upon her.

Was it possible he had cared for her so little as this? And she—what an idiot she had been!

"My dear," said Miss Dacre almost timidly, unable to see her companion's face, and somewhat fearful as to the way in which she might be taking it, "you surely don't think there is anything in it? You cannot suppose for a moment that Alan would go and get married without saying a syllable about it in his letter to me, to say nothing of his engagement?"

"Ah! but he was released from his engagement. You wrote and told him what I never did—what I never had the heart to do. He was free, of course, and he must have taken advantage of his freedom. That is all. One has no right to blame him, only it has happened a little unfortunately for me, as I suppose I deserved it should," she added rather bitterly.

"I don't believe it; I shall not believe it till I see it," Miss Dacre maintained stoutly. "He will be here presently."

"He is here now, I believe," Lady Florence broke in in a voice which she could not quite steady, and as she turned from the window and came hurriedly forward into the room, her hostess, too, heard the rumble of wheels on the gravel outside.

It was as though the sound gave wings to the feet of the listeners. In another minute Miss Dacre was in the hall, standing at the door she had herself opened, ready, if it should really be he, to welcome her nephew to what was now the only home England held for him, whilst, with equal celerity, her guest flew upstairs to the sanctuary of her own room, or, to be quite accurate, to the portals of that sanctuary.

For the dainty little chamber lay conveniently close to the landing, and the girl would have been a very exceptional girl had she not paused to try and distinguish the number of footsteps and voices in the hall below. See she could not, without being seen, and there seemed to be more clatter and commotion than would be made by the arrival of any one person, but the only strange voice she recognised was the one which was not strange in her ears at all, and she felt her heart beat more freely. Surely, if there were a Mrs. Dacre, she would be with him, and would be audible.

"My dear," Miss Dacre called from the foot of the staircase, after a couple of minutes.

"And then, you know," Lady Florence says, when she tells the story, "I felt sure it was all right. Nobody need ever talk to me about intuition after that, for I don't believe in it. I ought to have had an intuition that it was all wrong, and I had nothing of the sort. I went down to my fate, smiling."

She smiles now, saying it, but it was no smiling matter to her at the time. She ran down so happily and innocently, just as happily and innocently as her kind hostess had hastened to summon her the moment her own misgivings were set at rest.

"It is all a mistake, as I told you I was sure it must be," she exclaimed, taking the girl in her arms in an access of relief and delight, and kissing her. "There was a Mrs. Dacre on board, but she had nothing to do with Alan. It was too absurd, the mere idea of it. A strange niece at a moment's notice would not have been a pleasant surprise for the old aunt," Miss Dacre added with a soft little laugh of content. "But I think there is one in store for the nephew, which will be more to his liking."

She was standing, as she spoke, out in the hall, where she had waited for the girl to join her, and now, as she drew Lady Florence's arm through her own in a caressing way, which showed how much her guest had won upon her, she called Captain Dacre by name, and the young man, who had betaken himself to the drawing-room, came hastily forward to meet them.

"Oh, Alan, I am so glad! You never expected to see me here, did you?" Lady Florence exclaimed eagerly, both her hands outstretched, and her radiant face, all the more radiant for the clouds which had been so recently chased away from it, raised to his. It was an apparition and a greeting which, to a happy lover, would have conveyed the sweetest of surprises. There was the adored object suddenly and unexpectedly within reach, looking her brightest and loveliest, and overflowing with welcome! And there, too, was his aunt, showing by her attitude that no warmth of reciprocity on his part would be too warm for her approval. Even allowing for the shadow of misunderstanding or misrepresentation which had arisen between them in his absence, was it possible to misinterpret or to withstand the frank unequivocal delight with which she hailed the sight of him?

What was the matter with him? Even to the less sensitive ear of the looker-on, the ejaculation which escaped him as he saw who it was his aunt had brought in with her, bespoke a surprise which partook of dismay rather than pleasure, and was it—could it be possible?—they were simply shaking hands!

"No, indeed. You were the last person I should have expected to find here," the young man was saying in an odd voice. He was a fine young man, and had a handsome face, and—taking him as one generally found him—a gracious presence; but he stood now very stiff and straight, looking from the young lady to the elder one with an inquisitorial expression, which was new to their experience of him. "Perhaps," he added, after a brief silence, "you will be kind enough to read me the riddle, for I fear I shall never be clever enough to do it for myself."

His eyes addressed themselves to Miss Dacre, whose perplexity was rapidly giving place to annoyance. As for Lady Florence, she stood with her head thrown back and her eyes sparkling, a fine study of a beautiful young fury ready to spring.

That any man living should have dared to snub her as she had been snubbed, was a thing scarcely to be credited on the evidence of her senses. The enormity of it threw every other sensation, for the time being, into the shade. The insult, at first sight, outweighed the injury.

"Really, my dear Alan," Miss Dacre began with some asperity, "I don't understand the tone you are taking at all. Here is Lady Florence—"

"Oh, pray do not say anything about me; that is to say, about Captain Dacre's reception of me," the girl broke in hotly. "It is not worth discussion. The mistake was on my side, not on his. We will let it pass, if you please. But he has the right to an explanation. Perhaps it will be better for me to give it, as it is I who owe it," with a slight movement of her head away from him. "I believe Miss Dacre wrote you a letter some time since, about me?"

"She wrote me a letter, in which she alluded as a matter of condolence with me—not as a piece of news to me at all—to your approaching marriage. Is that the letter you mean?" he demanded with uncompromising directness. Of all the tones he could have adopted with her, it was the best for the preservation of her own dignity and self-possession, and she felt it. Had he been gentler with her—had he shown signs of yielding or of compunction of any sort, the restraint she had put upon herself might have given way. As it was, she maintained the appearance of composure as perfectly as himself—of the two, perhaps more so.

"The intelligence Miss Dacre referred to," she said quietly, though she did not look at him as she spoke, and was playing nervously with her rings; "the intelligence of my engagement to Mr. Templeman was quite true. I did get engaged to him. You were at such a distance, and it was so uncertain when you would return, and I was not happy at home—in short, I allowed myself to be worried into it. I ought to have written to tell you, but I hated doing it, and so I put off—"

"Pardon me for a moment," the young man interrupted her to say, "you did not put off writing. I had a letter from you only the mail before I received my aunt's. You only put off telling the truth."

"It is scarcely polite to say that," she replied freezingly; "nor is it quite fair. I never wrote to you after it was a settled thing. If I never gave you the clue to any change in my feelings, it was because—" she paused, colouring deeply.

"Because?" he repeated interrogatively.

It was hard to say it, as things now stood between them, but she said it bravely:

"Because there never was any. I hated myself for being talked over. I liked Mr. Templeman very, very much—better, I suppose, than any girl ever liked a man who was being forced upon her, before—but I was not in love with him."

"You were not in love with him, but you were going to marry him, all the same? I cannot help it, Aunt Susan. You may think me a brute—I see it in your face; but it is the sort of thing you women may understand and make excuses for—I cannot."

"I think you had better finish it, after all," Lady Florence said quietly to Miss Dacre. "Perhaps you will not meet with so many interruptions."

"I won't interrupt you any more," Alan Dacre said quickly; "and I would rather have it from your own lips."

It was an effort to tell it him face to face, after the manner in which he had met her, and in which he was still bearing himself towards her, and her whole heart was crying out indignantly against him as she did it, but she went through with it, whilst Miss Dacre stood by, awaiting with an almost pitiable anxiety the upshot of it all. She was so fond of them both by this time, and so anxious they should understand each other and make friends, without more ado. And to think the mischief had all been made by a letter of hers! She had never been a great scribe. Assuredly, henceforth she would be less of one than ever.

"And that is how it is I am here," the girl wound up.

Almost involuntarily she drew herself up and shrank a step farther away from her lover—a step nearer Miss Dacre as she spoke. She was not ready for reconciliation and embraces—not yet, if ever. She need not have concerned herself. Apparently, Captain Dacre was equally unprepared for any such open demonstration. There had been no clearing up of his countenance, as he listened to the explanation, which, dryly as it was put, could not be rendered other than flattering to himself. The hardness of his expression did indeed soften, but it was not to rapture—not even to pleasure, it gave way. If ever a man's face spoke unmistakably of pain and perplexity, it was Alan Dacre's face just then.

"I am awfully sorry," he said at last. "It seems to have been a chapter of accidents all the way through, and I don't see the end of it yet. I am sorry I should have been such a bear to begin with—but frankly, I never was so 'taken to' in my life, and I think most fellows in my place would have felt a little sore."

"I am sure we both understand that—don't we, dear?" poor Miss Dacre said appealingly to Florence, but Florence made no answer. She felt there must be something coming, and she was waiting for it. Alan may have seen she was. At all events, he plunged in medias res.

"It is no use beating about the bush," he said desperately. "Nobody can be more sorry than I am that things should have gone so cross, but I could not possibly foresee what was going to happen, and I do not know that I can be said to be to blame. You asked me just now whether I was married, Aunt Susan. I am not married, as I told you, but I am engaged."

There was a moment's silence, broken only by a little cry of astonishment and dismay from Miss Dacre. Then Lady Florence took a step or two forward, and deftly slipping from her finger one of the rings she had been playing with whilst she told Alan Dacre the story of her engagement to Mr. Templeman, held it out to him.

"I do not know whether my ring will be as easily replaced as I have been," she said with a smile and a flush, "but I quite agree that there is no blame to attach to you, and I hope, whoever the lady is, you will be very happy."

She did not wait for the answer, which, indeed, did not appear to be forthcoming, but walked quietly out of the room and upstairs, leaving Captain Alan to his aunt.

CHAPTER V.

"HE is coming, is he not, Flo?"

"Yes, dear, he is coming."

"You wrote to him yourself?"

"Yes, dear, I wrote to him myself."

"It was awfully good of you, Flo!" And the speaker, who was none other than Kiroloch—or, rather, the shadow of what Kiroloch had been on that bright summer day, when he was sent in the wake of Miss Dacre to the Bayswater boarding-house—made a faint motion of his lips towards his sister, which she, with tears in her eyes, stooped and obeyed.

It was nearly three months since that unpleasant little scene in Miss Dacre's drawing-room. It had been July then, it was the middle of October now, and these three months had been, perhaps, taken all in all, the hardest in Lady Florence's life. She had not, as she had been wont to say at Deepdene, been accustomed to a bed of roses at home, but there had never been any real trouble, as people who know life as it is understand trouble. She had never known what it was to be in a false position, exposed to ridicule or contempt, or to that pity which is akin to both, and she had never, since she had attained an age at which she could realise its gravity, either lost or been near to losing anyone who was dear to her. And now, within this brief space of time, she had experienced trouble of both these kinds.

As to that other trouble, which to some might have appeared the most disastrous of all—the loss of the lover for whom she had sacrificed so much—it weighed lightly enough in comparison with the rest.

She had been very fond of Alan Dacre, but her love for him had been born rather of his love for her, as he had taught her to believe in it, than of any special quality in himself. It was the same load-stone which had drawn her afterwards to Mr. Templeman. She had a nature, in short, more apt to respond to love than to lavish it unasked. That it is the finest sort of nature it would be rash to say, but it may be allowed that it is the happiest. At any rate, it was Lady Florence's, and it had come to the assistance of her pride now.

Alan Dacre could not have consoled her more effectually than by that rapid consolation of himself.

But the mortification had not been so easy to bear. It would have been hard even had the rest of the world been like Miss Dacre, all friendliness and sympathy; but there were so many who would be only too glad to join in the laugh against her. And there was no hope of the pitiful dénouement of her little romance passing unheeded. She had drawn the eyes of her world upon her too powerfully for any such escape from them now.

There had been all this to be contended with, though Fortune had so far favoured her that Lady St. Oban, having made arrangements for Homburg which, naturally, did not include her niece, her father had not hampered his forgiveness with any conditions as to her immediate return to the bosom of her family. She had gone direct from Deepdene to her grandmother's house in Midlandshire, and there she had been allowed to remain. For so much she had had reason to be grateful, but then there had come this last and worst trouble, all the harder to bear that for this, too, indirectly, it might be said she had herself to blame.

"If only I had never left home as I did, it would never have happened," she was crying out to herself now as her eyes rested, through a mist of tears, on the white, wasted face, and her hand trembled in the boy's hot hold. And, indeed, humanly speaking, it was only too true, for had things gone smoothly, there would have been no such impatient longing to see his sister aroused in the lad's heart as to lead him to take French leave of his "crammer," one day, to go in quest of her! That there should be no kind of conveyance at the little wayside station at which he alighted, and that he should be overtaken by a thunderstorm and drenched to the skin before he arrived at the Court—these were fortuitous circumstances, over which nobody had any control; but that he should fall so dangerously ill of the effects of the exposure and excitement as to be pronounced in peril of his life, this did seem to Lady Florence as a direct visitation of her sins upon her.

The very silence of those about her as to her share in the catastrophe—the unusual gentleness of Lord St. Oban, summoned in hot haste from his own daily attendance at the Elisabethen Brunnen to the sick-bed of his son—the pitiful patience of the lad himself—all these things made it worse for her.

And yesterday the doctor had told her that any wish he expressed that could, by any possibility, be granted, must be.

There was only one, and the gratification of it did not depend upon Lady Florence; yet the mere effort to procure it for him cost her something.

"I must see Templeman; I shall not be right till I've seen Templeman," had been his constant cry, and there had been no pacifying him until the letter was written. It could only have reached its destination this morning, and already they had received a telegram to the effect that its recipient would be with them in the afternoon.

"Just like him—dear old fellow!" Kirloch sighed out happily. He was not in any pain to speak of now; the inflammation, which had threatened his life in the beginning, had subsided by this. What they feared now was the terrible weakness it had left behind, and the persistent refusal of nourishment. "I can't touch it—it is no good," the boy would say, turning now from one delicacy, now from another. "It makes me worse, worrying me. I would, if I could, just to please you all, but I can't."

"I have not liked to say it to any of the family, sir, but I cannot help thinking there is something on his mind," the nurse had remarked to the doctor, the day before, and the doctor had addressed himself at once to her who was most in the patient's confidence.

But Florence knew of nothing that either was or was likely to be on Kirloch's mind.

She thought of it now, though, as she sat watching him, and, "Kirloch," she said suddenly, "I have been wondering. Was there any special reason for your wishing to see Mr. Templeman so much?"

The boy turned his head away languidly, and without looking at her.

"No," he replied, "none—at least, that concerns you. I wanted to see him because—because I like him, I suppose," with a wretched little attempt at a laugh.

"And a very good reason, dear," Florence said cheerfully; but it was not the reason, and she knew it.

The only comfort was that he had said distinctly it did not concern her, and he would not, she knew, have told her a direct untruth.

"Flo," he asked presently, after so long a silence that she had thought him asleep, "when is that snob of a Dacre going to get married?"

"I don't know. I have not heard very lately from Miss Dacre. And, Kirloch dear, it is not kind to call him a snob."

"But he is, you know—he 'behaved as sich.' Now, Templeman would never have done that kind of thing—couldn't if he'd tried. He was in love, you see—not 'shamming.'"

"The real thing, dear?" his sister said with a forced laugh. "Such as you mean to go in for yourself, by-and-by?"

There was no immediate answer, but presently Kirloch said quietly:

"The kind of thing I should have gone in for some day, perhaps, if I had got better; but I don't think I am going to get better—that is just it, Flo."

"But, Kirloch, dear boy, why?"

People who loved and admired Lady Florence—and there were a good many who did, in spite of her faults—said that what was wanting to her bright, beautiful personality was tenderness. Had they seen and heard her at that moment, they would have acknowledged that if it was not discernible so often as it might have been, it was none the less there. As for Kirloch, he had always known it. In all his boyish troubles he had been accustomed to come to her, and how many of them had been soothed by her sympathy, even when she had been powerless to help him really out of them, nobody else knew. He was not happy in having a secret from her now, but had he told her what he really wanted with his friend, she would never have sent for him, he thought, and he did want him so badly.

"I don't know why," he said, in answer to her question, "only I feel as if I were just drifting away, and there was nothing to catch at to keep me. And I don't seem to care. I used to think I should care awfully, when the time came for me to die, but somehow now I don't feel as if I should. It seems as if it would be too much trouble to get well."

His sister stooped down and kissed him.

"My poor boy, that is only because you are so weak," she said. "I suppose everybody who has been very ill feels like that at first. And you must not talk about not caring. It would break papa's heart to hear you say that you did not care!"

The lad moved uneasily on his pillows, and the feverish flush on his cheeks deepened.

"He has Ralph and Charlie," he murmured, "and they'll never be the trouble I have been. They're ever so much steadier. I have always been out of one hole into another, Flo."

"You have been no worse than other boys, dear, only you have been lying here thinking of it, and you know papa is prouder of you than of all the rest of us put together. Oh, Kirloch, what did I say?" for something in these last words had touched a tender spot in the lad's heart, and he was sobbing piteously. It needed all the tact and tenderness she was mistress of to calm and compose him, but the evil might almost have been said to work its own cure, for the exhaustion procured him what nothing of late had succeeded in doing—a few hours' quiet sleep.

Poor Lady Florence! It was, perhaps, as well for her that she had as little time to think of herself just then, as other people had to think of her. It did indeed occur to Lord St. Oban, even in the midst of his anxiety for his son, that there would be a little awkwardness in the meeting between his daughter and the gentleman from whom, on the day appointed for their nuptials, she had seen fit to run away, and it was not without a certain relief, though with considerable surprise, that he heard of the interview which had chanced between them in the meantime. It was only right, Florence felt, that he should know all, though, but for Mr. Templeman's good offices as a mediator, the occasion had been wanting, and she had found it impossible to write and tell him.

"Well, it is all over and done with, and there's enough for us all to think about just now, without raking it up again," the earl said with a sigh; "but if ever you get such another chance again, I will forgive you. What is it the boy wants with Templeman?" he added suddenly. "It is not that he has got low about himself, and thinks—"

A little huskiness came into his voice and stopped him.

He had his face turned away from Florence, and she did not venture to look up at him, but she took the hand that was nearest to her in both her own, and fondled it.

"No, father," she said gently, "I don't know why he is so anxious to see Mr. Templeman, but I do not think it is for that."

A little later in the day, the guest, whose advent was awaited with such varied sentiments, came. If there had been apparent to him any strangeness in the fact of his having been summoned, there was nothing in his manner to betray it. It had been very good of him, he was told, to come so far to humour the whim of a sick boy.

"I could have done no less," he said, "had he been no more to me than any other boy, and he is much more. Had I known how ill he was I should not have waited to be sent for, even to a strange house."

As for Kirloch, he made no apologies. Only he held out his poor thin hand with a faint, "I am so glad!"

"That is all right, old fellow," said the other cheerily, and then they left them alone.

"But I don't want to hear all about it," Mr. Templeman was saying as he sat by the lad's bedside a little later on. "You can tell me anything you like by-and-by. All I want to know now is the man's name and address, and how much it comes to altogether. He shall be as happy as his money can make him in the course of to-morrow. Not that that will be very happy—he'll have a bad quarter of an hour first."

Kirloch looked up at him with a little languid surprise.

"You don't mean to say you are going to him yourself—a cad like that? And it won't be of any use," he added ingenuously. "He won't take a penny off, not if you jaw ever so!"

"Of course he won't," the other replied equably. "But he will think twice perhaps before he swindles any other youngster of your age to the same tune again. How much do you say, my boy?" and he produced his pocket-book.

"It does seem a lot," Kirloch observed in his weak voice as he watched his friend make the entry. "And I knew all along I had no right to ask you. But I could not rest thinking of it. When I lay tossing here night after night, the thought of it was like a nightmare. I knew if I were to make a clean breast of it to the governor, he'd pay it without a word. It was not the fear of anything he would have said to me, but I had promised him so faithfully—I could not tell him I had broken my word; and then," the boy added with a half sob, "for it to come round to him afterwards when there would be nobody to explain it, that would have been worse."

Mr. Templeman had finished his memorandum, and put by his pocket-book.

"Now," he said quietly, "suppose we talk sense. I sleep here to-night. Your grandmother has been good enough to offer me a bed, and anyhow I should not have returned to-day. But I shall tell your father I have to be in town to-morrow, and I shall suggest—if you wish it, as I suppose you do—that I run down again the day after. You may be as sure now as you will be then that it is all settled and right, and that you need not give another thought to it; but I shall come back, nevertheless, if only to see that you are obeying orders."

"I'll do anything you like," murmured the boy—"anything."

"Then, in the first place, make up your mind to get well. It

There was a lingering emphasis on the two last words which told Lady Florence, before he said another syllable, whom it was he wished to substitute for Miss Dacre. Her consciousness showed itself in her face—in the sudden droop of her head—perhaps, most of all, in the silence in which she let his words, as it were, pass by her. And he knew how to interpret it.

"You know what I mean," he said, taking her hands in his, and looking lovingly down at the bowed golden head; "will it be too hard away out of the difficulty to let me take you?"

And so, at last, it all ended happily, and nowhere was the news received more gladly than at Deepdene, where the kind heart of the mistress had never ceased yearning after the wayward, impulsive girl she had learned to love. Indeed, it is more than doubtful whether Miss Dacre would have assisted with any heartfelt pleasure at Captain Alan's grand wedding with his heiress, had not the tidings of that quieter and less ostentatious ceremony reached her before. For Lady Florence never made up to the guests she had so cruelly disappointed in the summer, for the shabby trick she had played them, that is to say, not in the matter of a wedding-breakfast. How she has done it since—with balls and dinners, with garden-parties and picnics, with "small and earlies" and "Cinderellas," and all the rest of it, let Society say!

The Ghost on the Canvas.

By W. W. FENN.

"HARK! There! Listen! That was the same strange noise we heard more than a week ago. I was in hopes that we should not be troubled with it again. What can it be?"

"Surely, Walter, there is someone in the studio? Just go very softly, and peep over the gallery."

"What is the use of that? The place is pitch dark, for I drew the blind across over the top light before I came out of the room, and as to there being any one there, that's impossible, for no one was there when I left, and I know the door into the garden was fast locked and bolted inside then, and certainly no one has gone through this room since we have been sitting here. There is no other way into the studio."

"Then the noise must come from rats under the floor."

"Nonsense, my dear; rats, whether under the floor or over the floor, don't push up the rack of the easel, and that is what the noise was like."

"Perhaps the catch slipped, and let it drop of its own accord."

"Really, Gertrude, you are too foolish! Did I not say the rack was being pushed up, not down, and the catch would not let it slip up of its own accord. There it is again; don't you hear? plainly it is as if someone was pushing up the rack. By Jove! this is quite unpleasant—quite uncanny; I don't like it!"

"No more do I, Walter. Pray go and look. No, don't take a light—do as I say; creep very softly—open the door quietly, and look over the gallery."

The young man, to whom these words were addressed by a tall slim girl, rose from the table at which the two speakers were sitting, and went towards a door at the farther end of the long low room. She also rose and followed him.

At the door they both paused and listened intently; now with anxious, eager, and somewhat pallid faces, for the sound which had disturbed them was repeated for a moment. He was about to lay his hand on the handle when she laid hers on his arm as if to arrest him, saying, as she did so, in a hurried whisper:

"No, no! you had better not, perhaps! Let us call up the old man—old Gates who has been left in charge of the place; possibly he can tell us what the noise comes from; he may know all about it."

"Foolish child, don't be nervous, we can solve this mystery without old Gates's assistance. We should indeed look like a couple of idiots if we called the old fellow up at this hour about a matter upon which we can satisfy ourselves in a moment. But I must have a light, it's nonsense attempting to look into the place in the dark, and the fog is almost as thick inside the house as out—here, give me the lamp."

The young lady turned back to the table evidently with the intention of doing his bidding, but he, apparently impatient of delay, opened the door and stepped through on to the gallery upon which it gave.

At the moment she took the lamp from the table, a wild exclamation, half of surprise and half of fear, from the young man so startled her, that she let fall the light from her hand upon the floor, where it instantly went out, and the whole room was in utter darkness, save for a faint flicker from the fire in the grate before which were snugly arranged the table and chairs.

"Never mind the light, Gerty," said the man in a tremulous undertone; "come here—come towards me, give me your hand—there, so, come and look for yourself that you may tell me I am not dreaming or going out of my mind."

Groping her way to him in the obscurity, the two, clinging close together, went softly out on to the gallery by the door through which he had stepped back into the room when he made his first exclamation—an exclamation not without a touch of terror in its tone.

It was a curiously constructed building this, one of several so-called "Residential Studios," standing not a hundred miles from St. John's Wood. The main part of it consisted naturally of the painting room, a lofty and spacious apartment rising uninterruptedly from the floor above the basement to the roof, save where a gallery ran round two sides of it, which was approached by a flight of stairs in one corner of the room, and was accessible also from the door opening out of the sitting-room. This, with bed-chamber attached, extended the full length of the building, and was parallel consequently with the studio. Beneath this sitting-room were the kitchen, servants' apartments, etc., altogether a most admirably and practically designed place for its purpose, simply but artistically decorated, the utmost being made of all the beams, joists, and woodwork necessary in its construction. A picturesque projecting porch with a small ante-room led into the studio through a covered way from the main entrance-gate in the wall, which surrounded the whole block, together with a fair proportion of lawn and garden-ground.

Walter Stilwood and his young wife Gertrude were not the permanent tenants of this residence, but were only occupying it during the temporary absence of its owner, Mark Ormshed, who, it may be guessed, was, like Stilwood, an artist. He had gone to Rome for the winter, and his friend Walter, having but lately and rather suddenly rushed into the bonds of matrimony, had gleefully accepted the offer of this abode free of charge for three or four months, while he should have time to look round for a place of his own.

The happy pair had been settled in it about a fortnight when the above conversation occurred. Except for the old caretaker, referred to as Gates, who acted as major-domo and general servant to Mark Ormshed, there was no one in the place but themselves. Thus the strangeness of the noise which had so startled them became additionally impressive from the sense of loneliness by which they were surrounded. Moreover, it was deep winter-time, with a frosty fog which had settled down as night came on, making itself felt through the very walls, to say nothing of its having penetrated into the rooms through every crack and cranny, whilst it muffled all outside sounds, and created a chilly silence by no means reassuring to the nervous. Indeed, at the best of times there was no traffic passing near, for the building stood at the bottom of a road through which there was no thoroughfare for vehicles. And now at eleven o'clock on this cold foggy winter's night, not a creature was abroad, not a sound broke the deep stillness during those intervals of the talk in which the young couple were engaged when the strange noise in the adjacent studio suddenly scared them well-nigh out of their wits.

They were as comely a looking pair of newly-married people as might be seen in a day's march. He, a tall, athletic man about seven-and-twenty, with even and regular, if not exactly well-proportioned features, with intelligent brown eyes, short, crisp, curly hair, soft beard and moustache of similar tone. She was very much of the same style of face and figure—a feminine edition of the man, so much so, in fact, that they might have passed for brother and sister—like having, as it seemed, been attracted by like in this instance. Walter Stilwood had been, since he was quite a lad, the intimate friend and protégé of the elder man, Mark Ormshed, to whom the studio belonged, and who, albeit a figure-painter, had directed the studies of the younger, who followed the landscape branch of art.

Gertrude Craven had crossed the path of these two friends much about the same time, and, unknown to each other, had inspired them both with a deep affection for her. Walter Stilwood had boldly, and, as it was generally held, rashly spoken, and had at once been accepted. Mark Ormshed, more cautious, had hesitated until it was too late, and had then found, to his dismay, that his rival and the cause of his rejection was none other than his dearest friend. Generous and noble-hearted, Ormshed, although bitterly disappointed and unhappy, never for one moment allowed any rancorous jealousy to affect his friendship for Stilwood; but he felt he could not, for the present, breathe the same atmosphere with him, nor stay to witness the young landscape-painter's happiness.

"I am going away, old boy," he said; "I have long intended to spend a winter in Rome, and you can't do better than occupy my quarters meanwhile. You are not too flush of coin, and it will give you time to turn round. Although the rooms are more fit for a bachelor than a married man, still you will be able to manage, and the studio is all you can want."

So it fell out, luckily for Walter, for there was too much truth in Ormshed's reference to the condition of his friend's finances. He rather understated it when he said he was not too flush of coin, the fact being that, although the landscape-painter's prospects were good, and he promised to make a name in his art, at this period he was sorely pressed for ready money. Certain Christmas bills were likely soon to demand his attention, and the expenses incurred by his matrimonial arrangements (he had only been married three months) had run away with most of his spare cash. Moreover, like most of the brethren of the brush, he was not a good man of business, but of a nervous, sensitive, highly-strung temperament; scrupulously conscientious in his work, very diffident about his own powers, and with that deep love for his profession which makes it the paramount object of life, and places it far before and above all considerations of profit. Impulsive, too, he was, of course, and equally, too, of course, at times subject to fits of great depression, which, if they lasted long, would incapacitate him for painting for days together. Nevertheless, as I have said, his prospects were good, and there was no doubt he would do well, if he could keep his head above water during these early days of his upward struggle for fame. It would be all right, his friend said, if the steed did not starve while the grass was growing. Meanwhile, in order that he should not starve, a distinguished collector, whose attention had been called to him, gave him an important commission to execute, during the winter, from one of the batch of summer sketches he had brought home. Besides the immediate advantage of this commission the connection was likely to prove very remunerative. The gentleman in question, however, was extremely punctilious and exacting in all his dealings; and Stilwood was warned that, whatever he did, he must not fail to perform any promise he made as to the time when the picture would be finished and ready for delivery. "If you disappoint old Sir Digby," he had been told, "and don't let him have the picture on the very day he wants it and settles to have it, he very likely won't have it at all. He is a man of business, although a baronet, and he expects everyone with whom he deals to be the same."

Apart from a certain degree of nervousness which such conditions would be likely to excite in a man of Stilwood's disposition, the picture itself was causing him a great deal of anxiety, owing to the important part figures were to play in it.

The canvas was upon the easel on this particular night, and, just prior to the disturbance caused by the mysterious noise in the studio, Walter had been expressing his anxieties to his wife as they sat cosily before the fire regretting Ormshed's absence.

"If old Mark were within hail, Gertrude," he had said, "he would soon help me over the stile. You see I have never studied the figure sufficiently to be able to draw it on a large scale quite accurately, especially when only partially draped in classical robes, such as wood-nymphs are supposed to wear. If I cannot make a better hand of it than I have been doing for the last two days, I shall never get the picture finished according to my promise to Sir Digby Raikes, and then perhaps he won't have it. Certainly I can't ask the man for a cheque unless I am prepared to deliver the picture, and we shall want the money badly enough by that time; we are now within only ten days of the appointed date, and that principal figure of the wood-nymph in the foreground is as far from being finished as ever."

"Oh, have confidence in yourself, Walter, in your own powers," his wife had replied. "The spirit of Mr. Ormshed's genius ought to haunt his studio, and I am sure you ought to be imbued with it, loving him as you do, and working here under his very roof. I am sure he would gladly help you if he could transport himself hither for an hour or two, but as that is impossible, you must trust, as I say, to getting an inspiration from his spirit—in that sense I believe in spirits. What does inspiration mean, if not the influence of one spirit over another?"

"Ah, Gerty, it's all very well for you to talk, but spirits don't teach anatomy, and although I have had a model now for three days, I cannot get her pose properly, or the proportions of her figure. No! I want old Mark here just to take a piece of chalk in his hand, and show me the way the figure should come against the trunk of the tree, and her proper action and expression as she uplifts her fairy-like voice, and leads the chorus of her sisters in 'The Wood Nymph's Hymn to the Rising Sun.' Really I don't know what will become of us," the young artist had added moodily after a pause, "if I fail to complete my bargain as to time; it is becoming serious."

Then, in spite of the bright smiles, and the cheerful, coaxing, affectionate encouragement of his pretty wife, he sank into one of his fits of dejection and silence—a state from which it probably would have been difficult to arouse him for the remainder of the evening, had not the unaccountable noise in the studio done so pretty effectually a very few minutes afterwards.

Whatever might have been the duration of this dejected mood, we have seen that it vanished promptly in the excitement which the noises caused.

If the sound had been startling, still more so must have been the sight which met the eyes of husband and wife, as clinging close to each other, Walter a little in advance, they crept from the darkness of their sitting-room on to the gallery, and cautiously and nervously peered over the high balustrade down into the studio.

Instead of the impenetrable gloom with which they might reasonably have expected to have been met, the whole space was softly illuminated. The fog which pervaded the inside as much as the outside of the house, instead of adding to the obscurity, had become apparently the medium for lighting up the apartment. Dense still, it nevertheless had assumed an unexpected silvery whiteness which rendered objects visible through it, although in a soft and subdued manner. The outlines of the walls and ceiling, the trophies of armour, the draperies, the sketches and pictures, and the multifarious decorations, together with the easels and canvases upon them, were all broken and dimmed, but were still palpably recognisable for what they were.

The first impression created by this strange and unlooked-for transformation-scene must have been that the large central gas-light had been turned on and ignited, although in that case it would hardly have lighted up the mist in the higher parts of the room, owing to the strong reflectors by which on two sides it was shrouded for the purpose of casting its full rays upon any given spot.

No; the illumination was not due to any such cause, for the lantern with its reflectors was to be clearly seen hanging in its place, unlighted, and telling as a dark object in the midst of the general iridescence. What then could have caused it? Who could have produced it, and by what means?

For a while the two startled beholders stood looking through the brilliant obscurity, if I may so call it, without interchanging more than monosyllables of wonder and alarm, and without discussing whence the light proceeded. Presently, however, they simultaneously saw the space immediately in front of the picture on which Walter was working, and which was giving him so much disquiet, grow more and more brilliant, whilst at the same time there appeared gradually to emerge from the light itself the figure of a man.

Like other objects, however, and in spite of the increased illumination, the outline and substance of the form looked blurred and undefined, so that it was not possible to say how he was dressed, or what he was like. Indeed, the back of the figure was towards the awe-struck spectators, so that under no circumstances could his features have been visible to them. The whole form was so vague, in fact, and, as it were, so semi-transparent, that it did not bear the aspect of reality for one moment. It seemed to be nothing more tangible than a wreath of denser mist which had become endowed with human shape.

Not, therefore, deceived for a moment into the belief that they were gazing at a reality—at an actual human being—the young painter and his wife accepted the only alternative left, and recognised with increasing feelings of terror the fact that they were in the presence of a weird and marvellous spiritual manifestation.

The wife, whose presence of mind seemed to be steadier than her husband's, although she trembled and clung to him convulsively, whispered to him the impression which was now dawning upon her, as, intently watching, she beheld the form assume the air and action of some one at work on the picture.

"See, Walter, see! it extends its arms," she said. "One hand is moving the easel rack." And the click of the spring and bolt, plainly recognisable as the noise which had originally attracted their attention to the room, proved the truth of her words.

"And see, the other hand holds a brush—no, not a brush, it is not long enough—it is about to touch upon the canvas. Ah, but it is all so dim, so obscure one cannot discern what it does. One cannot make out even the picture sufficiently to see what part it works on."

"Great powers!" exclaimed the young man, his voice scarcely audible, although his lips were close to the woman's ear, "what can it mean? Are we both in some horrible dream? It is not a reality; it is either a trick or something supernatural."

"Yes," she replied, "it is a vision; but one with a purpose—with a meaning. Look again; now it grows plainer, and, as I live, the figure takes the semblance of Mark Ormshed! It is his spirit revealing itself to us—to you, to inspire you with courage and self-reliance. I had no belief in such things till now. It is no trick; we both see it, we cannot both be deceived. Look again!"

"Yes," answered her husband, "it appears now as it did when I first saw it, when I first looked into the room. It was the thought that it was Mark himself which so startled me then and made me cry out as I did."

The form by this time had taken on it a much more substantial shape than hitherto. Its proportions, its actions, its one extended hand particularly had become remarkably plain. The working of the fingers as they held a port-crayon was quite visible, and although the surface of the canvas was still partially obscured, by degrees this even became more visible, and the two watchers saw that it was on that critical figure of the wood-nymph that the hand was engaged.

How many minutes this phase of the mysterious manifestation lasted, neither of these two perplexed and troubled gazers were ever able to say, but it was sufficiently long for the spectacle to have been indelibly fixed in their memories, and no common-sense or sceptical argument can ever erase their belief that they actually beheld what has here been described. The young painter can point in proof of its veracity to the results—results which he maintains he never could have reached had not he and his wife seen what they did. For at last that puzzling and important feature of the picture stood out before them clearly and completely indicated by the white chalk lines. The pose and action had been roughly, but perfectly drawn, and so unmistakably designed and arranged in the right place by the implement in that spectral hand, that Walter, in an enthusiasm of excitement which for the time mastered his surprise and breathless agitation, exclaimed:

"There, there, that is what I wanted; the exact thing. That is Mark's touch and knowledge. No other man could have so readily shown me what was necessary. Oh, if those lines will but last upon the canvas and not fade with the rest of the shadows, my difficulty is over. But ah, Gerty, the light dies out; see, see, his form is melting into the thin air of which it was composed. He is gone!"

Even while these words were on the painter's lips the room had darkened, and, as the last syllable was uttered, all was once more shrouded in deep obscurity. Still trembling from head to foot, and still holding to each other, husband and wife moved away slowly towards the sitting-room, where the flickering fire, bursting at that moment into a brighter flame, brought them back into the region of realities. Then for a while, after re-kindling the lamp, they stood gazing at each other like people suddenly aroused from sleep. They rubbed their eyes, and asked had they been dreaming? Was it all a wild hallucination begotten in the darkness of the terror which the sound had caused?

"No, no, Gerty," at length went on Stilwood; "as you said, we cannot both have dreamt the same dream simultaneously, and that it was no hallucination I will prove, ay, and at once. Let me but pull myself together for a minute, and I will light the gas in the studio, and go to work at that figure now this moment. Whether the lines are on the canvas still, or not, it matters little. I see my way to it exactly; I see in my mind's eye exactly where and how the wood-nymph should come. The arrangement and the action are firmly fixed in my memory. I dare not sleep ere I fix them on the canvas."

Acting on the impulse, as was his custom, he took a candle, and full of enthusiasm he went boldly out on to the gallery, and so down into the painting-room, again followed by his wife. All nervousness had disappeared from them both, for Gertrude was always a sharer and sympathiser in her husband's moods. Curiosity to see if indeed any marks were left upon the picture dominated for a moment all other emotions as Walter held up the light close to the canvas. In justice to their common-sense I must state that in recounting their strange experience they declare that they neither of them expected to find the slightest sign of any chalk-marks. In this they were perfectly right; the unlucky figure of the wood-nymph remained in exactly the condition of unsatisfactory incompleteness in which the painter had left it when he last worked on it.

"No, of course," murmured his wife, "it was all the baseless fabric of a vision, as much as if it had been summoned up by Prospero, and the strangest part of it is that I seemed to have felt conscious of this almost from the moment we came on to the gallery. I don't pretend to understand these things, but if what we saw was but a supernatural manifestation to our eyes, the noise of the easel was equally so to our ears—the one was no more a reality, in the strict sense of the word, than the other. Ah, it was very wonderful, and I am half bewildered still—but there, try, Walter, try if you can turn it all to good account."

She had been lighting the gas and the stove while speaking, and her husband was already dexterously beginning to rearrange the composition of the wood-nymph. Then Gertrude sat down beside him after her common habit, and throughout the whole of that chill winter's night the painter laboured with more than his usual enthusiasm, until, by the time dawn had broken, he had so followed the lines indicated by the miraculous apparition of his friend, and had so fixed the design upon the canvas, that he rose, saying:

"There, Gerty, it is safe now; I have no fear of not getting it right. I only want you to sit as the model for a few hours when daylight comes, and the picture is finished—thanks to dear old Mark. Ah, I wonder where he is at this moment."

The thought appeared to revive in its full force the consciousness of the strange means by which his friend's help had been vouchsafed. During his labour the painter's mind had been so filled with the practical and technical execution of his task, and his enthusiasm for its completion had so possessed him, that he forgot all else; but now he seemed struck with a full sense of the remarkable means by which he had received the unexpected inspiration.

"Good Heavens!" he said suddenly; "I hope nothing has happened to Mark, and that this visitation does not forebode evil to him. One has heard of apparitions of absent friends appearing to those they love at critical moments in their lives—I never thought of this till now. You know he has always been a believer in what is vulgarly called spiritualism, or at least in the existence of forces which our finite senses do not enable us wholly to understand. He has often declared that he could project his mind and influence upon people whom he cared for, if he concentrated his thoughts upon them resolutely. I remember he has said that he would some day show me that he had this power, and he has now made good his words. I used to laugh at his dreamy fancies, and chaff about these 'occult forces'; I disbelieved in them, but I can do so no longer now; unless—unless we have been the dupes of some practical joke."

"That is out of the question," replied his wife, as pursuing their talk later on, the two sat at breakfast; "a coarse and vulgar practical joke would not have given you the inspiration which will enable you to keep your promise to Sir Digby Raikes; no, dismiss that idea."

The conversation was here interrupted by the entrance of old Gates, the servant, who handed Stilwood a letter, saying, "The postman, sir."

In an instant, Stilwood recognised the handwriting of Mark Ormshed.

"Stranger, and stranger," he cried to his wife; "this is the first time Mark has written since he left, and that the letter should reach us this morning of all others is more than a mere coincidence, depend upon it."

Needless to say they opened and read it together. Its contents saddened them, whilst adding more and more to the excitement under which they yet laboured.

The beginning of the letter only, and its address, were in the well-known hand; it had been ended abruptly by a stranger.

Mark had reached Rome, he said, safely; but within a week of his arrival he had been attacked by a slight fever, and was obliged to keep his bed, from which he was then writing.

"I shall be all right in a few days, I hope, old boy," he went on, "but at present I am very seedy. Never mind, this confinement to my room offers a good opportunity for sending you a few lines. But for it you might have been weeks without hearing from me, for you know I am a bad correspondent at the best of times, and amidst the allurements of this city I should have tried to forget you and the old days for a while, anxious though I am to hear how you are progressing with your commission for old Sir Digby. Indeed, I have been thinking very much about this and the consequences it may exercise over your future. I suppose it is due to my illness, but I feel depressed on your account, and am haunted by nervous fears that you will not get the picture completed in time. I am afraid the figures being so important will bother you, and I heartily wish I could be near to lend you a hand, but as—"

This was all that the artist himself had written. The stranger had then taken up the pen and thus explained the situation:

"DEAR SIR,

"You will be sorry to hear that Mr. Ormshed continues seriously ill; not, I trust, sufficiently so to give his friends any alarm for the ultimate result, but at present he is delirious, and whilst I, with another friend have been nursing him, we found the envelope in which we enclose this, together with the commencement of the letter to you, which we also send, lying by the side of his bed next the wall, where it had fallen doubtless when he found himself too ill to continue it, and where for many days it escaped our observation. You being, as is evidently the case, a dear and valued friend of Mr. Ormshed's, my venturing to forward his uncompleted letter will need, I trust, no apology, especially as your name and that of, I presume, Mrs. Stilwood, have been constantly on his lips during the wanderings of his mind. He is perpetually speaking of you, and appears to be distressed and anxious (as, indeed, he says he is in his letter) to learn how some especial picture, on which you are engaged, is progressing; it is the one subject to which his distempered brain for ever reverts. The doctors tell me that we may expect another four or five days will bring him through this stage of the fever, and they suggest that if you would write to him as soon as possible, your letter would reach him about the time we may look for a restoration of his reason, and if, happily, you should be able to give a favourable report of your progress with the picture, it might accelerate the recovery, and allay the distress of mind from which he is suffering. Meanwhile, I will keep you informed how he is going on.

"Believe me, dear Sir,
 "Yours very truly,
 "J. C. WARREN."

The date of Mark's portion of this communication was the 21st of November, whilst that of Mr. Warren's was the 30th, showing that it was during that interval that the writing had lain perdu. As Walter arrived at these facts he said slowly:

"And we are now at the 5th of December. Please God then, by this time the poor dear fellow is recovering, and last night, perhaps, he came to himself again, and caring for me and for you as he does, his spirit, annihilating all space, was enabled, as it passed from the wild dreamland of delirium to that of reality, to visit us, and, by its loving influence, to give me the much-needed aid. Any way, that which we have seen and what he has suffered are linked together by those mysterious forces in which he believed, and which defy human explanation. Dear old Mark, what a friend he is!" continued the young painter, his eyes moistening with the recollection; "to think that he should have had us so perpetually in his mind! Ah well! It is not to be wondered at, perhaps, Gerty, seeing how doubly bound he is to us—friendship and love—love and friendship hand-in-hand—what human feelings, what bonds so strong? And to these it is that we owe the help I have had. Yes, I feared all was not well with him. Oh, let us trust there will be nothing worse yet to come. I shall know no peace until I hear from this Mr. Warren again. But I will write at once as he desires, and as the doctors suggest. Although my letter will not be in time to reach him quite on the threshold of his returning reason, it will reassure him and let him know the good work his deep sympathy has wrought—the power his will has had over mine, the influence his genius has exercised upon my clumsy hand. Why, it must have been just about the time he was taken ill and when he says he was thinking so much of us that we first heard that sound in the studio," added Walter as he re-examined the letter and its dates. "Yes, the dream-spirit, not then actually released from reason, only hovered round us—it really could not, I suppose, manifest itself completely to our eyes until divorced entirely from his prostrate body. This is how he would argue and explain these revelations, I know. I have heard him talk in this fashion often and often. But let me lose no more time in speculation, let me write to him at once."

The letter was sent, and ten days later, and when the landscape-painter had the satisfaction of regarding "The Wood Nymph's Hymn to the Rising Sun" as a completed work, he had the additional delight of receiving an answer from Mark Ormshed himself. He announced his convalescence, and the gratification which his friend's account of that mysterious night in the studio with its results had given him.

"You are right in all your conclusions, Walter," continued the writer, "it was my dream-spirit you and your dear wife beheld. When the delirium of the fever overtook me my thoughts were concentrated on you; when it left me, you and yours alone possessed my mind. My first conscious ideas turned upon the aid I felt you wanted; and even during the interval preceding the recovery of my senses, my wandering words, as you have been told, were wholly of you. It would have been strange if you had not felt the influence of all this concentrated will of mine and my desire to help you. I remember vaguely that at intervals I felt I was with you; that I could read your thoughts, your hopes and fears, and that if my friendship was worth anything it would, in order to guide your brush, override distance, time, and all material obstacles. I have argued with you on these matters, you know, scores of times; you have called it rhodomontade—perhaps you will still be inclined to do so—perhaps it is; but would you have been able to have finished your picture had I not believed that I could bring the influence of my will to bear upon your hand?"

Sir Digby Raikes was a retired physician and bachelor, living in one of the semi-classic mansions which adorn the east side of Regent's Park.

His tastes were artistic, and he indulged them to the utmost. He had a small gallery full of choice examples of his favourite artists—and his favourites were not in every case to be found amongst the most fashionable painters of the day, or even the most popular ones. He had the happy faculty of unearthing all that was best and most promising amongst unknown and struggling workers, and many a young painter owed his first success to the discernment of the good-hearted baronet.

Sir Digby prided himself too on his weekly artistic reunions; his picture-gallery and pretty drawing-rooms were thrown open every Monday evening to his many friends, almost all of whom were people well-known in the world of art, literature, music, and science. He had sympathy with all—but especially with artists—landscape-painters and portrait-painters more particularly. For the delineator of allegorical or fanciful subjects, however, he had but little admiration.

Sir Digby was very matter-of-fact, and it would have been hard to find any man less open to spiritualistic influences. Indeed, he had a great objection, as a scientific man, even to the introduction as a topic of conversation, of subjects appertaining to thought-reading, mesmerism, and the like. He disbelieved in them all, and regarded the whole business as sheer nonsense. The baronet decried the supernatural in any form—no spiritual manifestations for him! A hand he could shake, a face with a pair of honest eyes to look into, and a clear ringing voice and laugh, were to him worth all the spirit-hands and ethereally lovely spirit-heads that could ever be summoned from the realms of fancy. He denounced as charlatans and cheats all professors of the occult science loudly and vehemently whenever he had an opportunity.

Only one person amongst his acquaintance was there, whose views on these points, differing from his own, had he ever listened to or tolerated.

This was Mark Ormshed. Not only was he the possessor of several more or less allegorical or fanciful subjects from this painter's hand, but he had even condescended to fall into many an argument with him as to the immaterial constituents of our being.

Sir Digby was very fond of Mark—admired his work and admired the man, and it may have been gleaned that it was on Ormshed's recommendation that the baronet had given Walter Stilwood that notable commission.

As Ormshed had many times said to his friend, the young landscape-painter, that he would some day prove to him that he could exercise his will upon those he cared for, even at a distance, so he had always wound up his arguments with Sir Digby by good-humouredly declaring that he would also convince the baronet before he died "that there is more in heaven and earth than is dreamt of in our philosophy."

Stilwood's picture had been punctually sent home on the evening of the promised day, and as punctually been acknowledged by Sir Digby, who added that he would give himself the pleasure of calling the following day on the artist, and handing him the cheque.

"The Wood Nymph's Hymn to the Rising Sun" represents the outskirts of a romantic forest, up a deep glade in which are trooping a train of Titania-like fairies, the foremost of whom have reached the fringe of antique oaks where the woodland ends, and the open country begins. The leader of the band is hailing the burst of ruddy light just suffusing the eastern sky, and tipping the uppermost boughs and branches of the trees with roseate and golden hues, and the contrast of the sombre forest with the brilliant sky was admirably managed, and formed altogether a magnificent piece of light, shade, and colour.

"A very fine picture indeed," said Sir Digby to himself the next morning, as he sat regarding it on the easel upon which all fresh acquisitions were placed, prior to their being hung up in the gallery, "very fine. The landscape and trees are particularly good, but I don't know that I quite like all the figures. Those larger ones, especially the first damsel, hardly look to me as if they were the work of the same hand that painted the rest of the picture. It is grandly conceived and executed, but somehow it does not seem to harmonise with the background. Whose work does it remind me of?"

The old gentleman had been looking at the canvas for a long while, and now rose for a closer examination. After a minute or two, he walked away to the farther end of his gallery, where hung a picture by Mark Ormshed. This he stood contemplating for a while, and then returned to the easel.

"To be sure," he went on, thinking aloud, for he was alone in his rooms, "to be sure, Ormshed—that's the man! It's as like his handling, as like can be; he has put in those figures for his young friend, or, at least, touched them up considerably—not a doubt of it! Well! it is all right, I suppose; such things are done amongst artists, I know, only I should like to have been told honestly that it was so in this case. I like people to be straightforward. I wish I had not taken Ormshead's advice, and had stuck to my original wish of having the landscape pure and simple, without giving way to his nonsensical idea of wood-nymphs emerging from the forest and hailing the rising sun—it was just like him, always harping on the supernatural; he would be a capital fellow but for that propensity. No! I was wrong to give way; and now he has been helping his friend, who is not a figure-painter at all, and not up to combining allegory with fact. Still, it is a fine picture; but I shall tell Mr. Stilwood that I have found him out. I will walk across the park, give him his cheque and a bit of my mind at the same time, good-naturedly of course; he is young and inexperienced, and is not up to my straightforward way of dealing. Let's see, where does he live?" and the baronet referred to his pocket-book. "Why, he is living with—at Ormshead's according to this. Mr. Mark never told me that when he persuaded me to give the young fellow a commission to work out one of his sketches for me; I don't believe he was living there then. By the way, I have not seen Ormshead for a long time."

With this the baronet took his hat and top-coat, and bent his steps across the park to the block of residential studios near St. John's Wood. He found the landscape-painter diligently at work, with his wife sitting beside him, having been shown straight into the studio by Gates, who knew him, at his own request.

The rather sudden entrance of the old gentleman upon their privacy somewhat disconcerted the young couple for a moment, and Mrs. Stilwood was about to run up the gallery-stairs to her sitting-room, when Sir Digby begged that he might not disturb her, and hoped that she would allow him the pleasure of bettering his acquaintance with her, as well as with her husband. They had met only once before, in the previous spring at some conversation, just before Walter was married. Sir Digby had a keen eye for beauty in any shape.

"I was not aware," he presently said, when Mrs. Stilwood had resumed her seat, "that you were already married, or that you were living at Mr. Ormshead's. This adds, however, only to the pleasure which I promised myself in personally coming to thank you for the very charming picture you have painted for me, and in handing you, as we may say, the reward of merit. Business is business, my dear sir, and I congratulate you upon your punctuality no less than your talent. But now, Mr. Stilwood," continued the baronet, as he rose and carelessly began looking at the various works of art standing about, "I want to ask you what, perhaps, would be considered an awkward question by some people not so straightforward by habit as I am. I only hope you will not feel more awkward in answering it than I do in putting it."

Walter and his wife wondered what was coming, but they both felt intuitively that it would have some reference to the figures.

"I hope I shall not be wanting in straightforwardness, Sir Digby, equal to your own," said Walter, not without a qualm. "What is it you desire to know?"

"Well, then, tell me candidly, in one word," said the baronet, "did not Mr. Ormshead help you with those figures of the nymphs in my picture?"

Walter hesitated for an instant, and then replied as he bit his lip, "Mr. Ormshead is in Rome, Sir Digby."

"By Jove! he evades my question," thought the baronet; "I don't like this." Then aloud: "In Rome, is he? How long has he been in Rome?"

"Oh, nearly six weeks now," said Walter.

"Humph! now look here, Mr. Stilwood. I have said that I like people to be straightforward; do me the favour to be so with me. Did he not put those figures, or the largest of them, in for you before he started for Rome?"

"Certainly not," was the prompt reply, "they were almost the last thing I worked on before I sent home the picture."

Walter saw he was not believed, and had never felt in such an unpleasant position before in his life. He looked at his wife and she at him, and by a common impulse, they by that look agreed that if they were to preserve the good opinion of Sir Digby Raikes, they must tell him their marvellous story, even at the risk of being still further disbelieved.

Without, therefore, much more beating about the bush, and after a few preliminary words, Walter acquainted the old baronet with the strange means by which he had been aided in his work, at the same time acknowledging that he felt reluctant to put such a story before any one, as he could hardly expect to be credited. "But here, Sir Digby," he went on, "is my young wife, who was a witness of the dream, vision, ghost, or whatever you may please to call it, and who will bear out all I have told you. She saw it as I saw it. It had been our intention to have kept the matter a profound secret, not because there was any discredit in it, but because we felt it would not be credited, and because everybody would put us down as a couple of lunatics—everybody but my dear friend Ormshead, who, of course, is aware of the way he influenced my hand. Here is his letter to me, which I should like you to read."

The old gentleman took the missive from Walter, glanced through it with a rather cynical smile, which finally subsiding left his face clouded by something like anger.

"This is not worth discussing, Mr. Stilwood," he said, "by any sane man. I am aware of your friend's peculiar views on the subject, and I can only say—well, perhaps I had better not say anything. Some day when Ormshead returns—but no! any further discussion would be vain. I must wish you good-morning."

With perfect, but distant courtesy, and in a very different key to his first salutation to the painter, Sir Digby Raikes took his leave.

On his way home, he determined that this should be the last transaction he would ever have, not only with Stilwood, but with Ormshead himself; he little guessed that as regarded the latter, he would never have another opportunity.

It is Christmas Eve—a Monday night. Although the picture-gallery and rooms in the mansion in the Regent's Park had been prepared as usual for one of its owner's art receptions, owing to the season, not half-a-dozen guests had assembled, and these are now all gone and the house is closed. Most of the habitués have been otherwise engaged, and as the clock strikes twelve old Sir Digby is alone, sitting before his fire and smoking his final cigar. Stilwood's picture remains on the easel, with its face towards the wall, for in spite of the baronet's admiration of it, his punctilious nature has been highly offended by the trick (as he considers it) which has been put upon him. He is disgusted at the apparent duplicity, not only of the younger, but of the older artist, and is deeply offended with his friend Ormshead for having turned his craze about spiritualism to account by using it as a means of taking him in.

"I did not think it of him," Sir Digby has said to himself over and over again. "If he has not gone out of his mind he is little better than a charlatan, and I doubt if he is in Rome at all; there is some hanky-panky which I can't compass."

Thus musing for the hundredth time, he rises from his chair, turns off the gas in the sun-burner, by a tap in the corner of the room, leaving nothing to illumine it save the shaded reading-lamp on the table beside his chair. But he does not go to bed as he had intended, he appears restless and uneasy, he wanders to and fro for a few minutes, and then resumes his seat, takes up a magazine and begins to read—a very unusual proceeding for him at this hour.

Equally unusual, too, is it, that he should fall asleep anywhere but in bed; yet this also occurs in a little while, and he sleeps far into the night. A restless, broken slumber, from which he finally arouses himself apparently in great distress of mind. Lamp and fire are both gone out, and darkness adds to what in a less matter-of-fact person would not be far removed from a feeling of terror. But he gropes his way at length to the door and ascends the stairs to his room, incoherently muttering to himself the words:

"Dreaming—dreaming; never had such a dream as that before; it is quite distressing."

A bright, clear, frosty morning has ushered in the day of days. The baronet is in the habit of living with his pictures, and frequently breakfasts in the gallery. He is going to do so now, and enters the apartment looking strangely worn and haggard, which his servant, whilst busying himself with preparations for the meal, observes.

"Are you not well, Sir Digby?" says the man; but disregarding the question, his master asks abruptly:

"Why have you turned that easel round, Miles?"

"Beg your pardon, sir," says the servant, "I have not touched it."

"Somebody has then," is the sharp rejoinder.

"I can hardly think so, sir, your orders are never disobeyed: nothing is ever moved in this room, except when you give permission."

The old man is looking abstractedly at Stilwood's picture (which is certainly not standing as it did when he fell asleep), to which the clear morning light gives a peculiarly beautiful tone. The upraised head of the foremost nymph has an all but transfixed look, and her train of fairy followers, grouped around, seem half endowed with motion, whilst the sun-kissed boughs of the forest trees throw a golden glow all over the picture.

The baronet passes his hand across his eyes once or twice, as if to clear his vision, and then says to himself: "Dreaming still; dreaming still!"

With difficulty he turns away from the easel, and takes his usual seat at the breakfast-table, but pays very little heed to the delicately-served repast put before him. A small cup of coffee and an atom of dry toast taken, Sir Digby again rises, and rings for Miles to bring him his hat and coat. The man is too well trained to make further remark, but he glances in quiet surprise at the untouched meal and the unopened letters and papers on the table.

"I am going out, Miles," says the baronet; "clear these things away, and see that nobody touches that easel. Let it remain where it is."

Once more Sir Digby walks across the park to Stilwood's rooms, but in a very different frame of mind to that in which he left them three or four days before. Husband and wife meet him on the threshold. They look excited and anxious, but are starting for a walk on this lovely Christmas morning. They are immensely surprised at his reappearance, having concluded from his manner on his previous visit that they had seen the last of him.

"Ah, Mr. Stilwood," he says, "I fear I have come at the wrong time. I wish very much for a quiet half-hour's talk with you and your wife. Will you grant this favour to an old man, who is much disturbed and distressed?"

"With pleasure," says Mrs. Stilwood, who sees in a moment the altered appearance of the old gentleman, and, taking his arm, turns back into the studio, which they had but just quitted. Walter follows, wondering and anxious to learn the reason of this unlooked-for visit.

Mrs. Stilwood, with a woman's tact, gently takes hat and stick from her visitor's hand, and drawing the easy-chair up to the stove, tenderly begs him to be seated, for his looks alarm her, and she sees he has something on his mind he desires to communicate.

He plunges at once into what he has to say and thus begins, in a voice less strong and steady than usual:

"I was very angry when I left you the other day. The postscript account you gave of the way Ormshod helped you enraged my common-sense. I must now apologise for having taken so stern a view of what you said, for I have gone through an experience since we met, which if not precisely similar, was sufficiently so to put my scepticism well-nigh to flight. Last night I lingered late in my gallery, fell asleep in my chair, and had—well—a dream, a vision, a ghostly visitation, a spiritual manifestation—call it what you please, I don't know what to call it; never experienced anything like it—can hardly believe that we are not all of us going out of our minds!"

"But to the point! We will say I dreamt, that is the most rational phrase—that I saw you, Mr. Stilwood, at work on my picture—on the head of the foremost nymph; that you were painting it from Mrs. Stilwood, who was sitting to you; and that standing just behind you was Mr. Ormshod himself. Every now and then he would direct your work by word of mouth—I heard him speak distinctly several times—and by gestures of his forefinger, with which he would point to the canvas. Occasionally he would demonstrate what he was saying by walking round to the model, and showing you the parts he was referring to, by touching Mrs. Stilwood's hair, shoulder, what not. This went on for a considerable time; it was the most distinct dream I ever had; it all appeared actual, lifelike. I saw the face and form grow under your hand; there was no doubt of it. Then, suddenly, Ormshod had disappeared. The vision changed; I was in a strange room, foreign-looking, and on the bed in it, lay poor Ormshod—dead. With this I woke, I suppose, and in the most uncomfortable, distressed frame of mind I have ever known. The whole thing so affected me that when I got to bed I could not sleep—have not slept a wink all night."

The old gentleman pauses, passes his handkerchief across his brow, and is about to resume, when Stilwood says:

"This is most strange and alarming, Sir Digby, for both my wife and myself dreamt last night that poor Ormshod was dead. On comparing notes this morning we both seem to have seen him lying upon his bed, as you now describe you saw him. We, too, have both been much distressed, and, like yourself, have not got over it yet."

"Well!" says Sir Digby, "they say there is no fool like an old fool; probably I am one, and would not have believed this of myself; but when I went into my gallery this morning, the picture which I could have sworn had its face to the wall, was turned round; and the unpleasant want of harmony between the figures and the landscape, which had given me the idea that Ormshod had painted them, seemed entirely to have disappeared. They were quite in keeping, and perfectly beautiful. How the picture had been turned about I cannot tell, no one dares to touch a thing in my rooms, and so I must suppose that unconsciously I did it myself, being in a state of mental exaltation or depression—I don't know which. At any rate I was so bewildered, puzzled, and distressed, that I felt I must come and tell you, and apologise for—"

At this moment there is a knock at the door, old Gates enters with a yellow envelope, which he hands to Stilwood.

"A telegram, sir!"

Walter reads it aloud, his face paling to ashen whiteness. Thus it runs:

"From Warren, Rome. To Stilwood, Residential Studios, St. John's Wood, London.

"Grieved to send dreadful news. Ormshod yesterday had a relapse, and died soon after midnight."

As a man of science, of course Sir Digby Raikes was never able to throw any light upon these strange experiences. As a sentient human being, however, he could account for them very clearly. But as any explanation from this point of view would be very difficult, and as, if it became known that he had changed his opinion on the subject, it might jeopardise his reputation, he begged, and even bound the Stilwoods to be silent about it, and to keep the mysterious story a secret at least until he should be no more.

The kindly old gentleman has lately passed away, but it was not before he had added several more specimens of Walter Stilwood's art to his collection. "The Wood Nymph's Hymn to the Rising Sun," however, was never hung up in the gallery. It had a place of honour to itself in a front room, and he would sometimes whisper to Walter when that young painter and his pretty wife attended the Monday evening reunions in the Regent's Park, and when they happened to stand near the picture:

"Mind you don't tell anybody why I keep it here—at least not till I am dead and gone; then you can do as you like."

Walter Stilwood has done as he liked, and has told me the story, which I can only call "The Ghost on the Canvas."

Miss Griffiths's Investment.

BY E. RENTOUL ESLER.

CHAPTER I.

"GOOD-BYE, Miss Griffiths, I hope you will have pleasant holidays."

At the word "holidays" Miss Griffiths's thin mouth relaxed into a smile, and, for the first time in many months, a flush of pleasure rose in her cheeks.

"Thank you, I am always glad to be free," she answered, with a momentary expansion of her narrow chest, and then she said good-bye hurriedly, and went out into the glaring heat of the burning sun, walking with an eager erectness that sat oddly on her spare frame.

Mrs. Sotheby looked after her with a smile of good-natured compassion.

"How queer she is, and how badly she dresses; worse than any of my servants," she said to herself; and then, without a thought that she was in anywise responsible for her governess's toilet, Mrs. Sotheby dismissed her from her mind.

And Miss Griffiths went down the street towards her poor lodgings, indifferent to what they thought of her in the big stuccoed house she had left. She was free now. She was her own mistress for six long weeks. She was free and independent—as independent as the fashionable ladies sweeping past her in their luxurious carriages and powdering her with the dust from their flashing wheels.

To be at rest, to have peace and immunity from toil, and freedom of thought and action for a time, why, it was happiness; it was a triumph and reward almost worth the unflagging toil of the past ten months.

Miss Griffiths had been trained in the hard school which inculcates the necessity of gratitude for very small mercies, and as she hurried eastward, the elderly, jaded governess had the thought that comes to all of us now and then, when things are at their best—that after all we have a good deal to be thankful for.

Of course, the Sotheby children were tiresome and rude, and Mrs. Sotheby was selfish and prosperous in an aggressive way; and Mrs. Daly, who presided over Miss Griffiths's lodgings, was slatternly and dispirited, and the rooms she let throughout the year were dismal and dingy; but still, when you faced things cheerfully, they weren't really so very bad. At any rate, Miss Griffiths was about to leave all unpleasantness behind for the present, and in her heart pulsating to the unfamiliar emotion of gladness, she had not room for a murmur. She was going away for the holidays; going out of the heat and noise and glare, away to the enjoyment of such sights and sounds as the rich grow weary of through repetition.

It was not often she dared permit herself to think of pleasant things, but for once desire and fruition could march hand-in-hand. She was going away out of the rush and bustle to find liberty and peace by the sea. Not the Cockney sea of Margate or Gravesend, but the vast ocean stretching away in leagues of rippling lustre north and south, and breaking in waves of snow and crystal on an empty strand. Expressed simply, Miss Griffiths had taken a lodging in a pretty cottage on the Cornish coast, and meant to spend her holidays with Mrs. Dingle and Sailor Bob, her husband; but no simple language could convey any idea of all the change signified to the plain-featured, over-worked governess. Why, the very kitchen in that cottage was a sanctuary, with its oaken furniture and gleaming pewter, and white windows standing always open to the sea. When she thought of it Miss Griffiths seemed to smell the salt breezes, to hear the voices of the sea-birds, and to see the green and purple waters. And then the clear-eyed old sailor and his silver-haired wife would defer to her, would take her little peculiarities as matters of course, and would tend her with sympathy. What if the treat were costly, it would be worth its price—it would be something to look back on through the years in which she could permit herself no similar pleasure.

It was not often Miss Griffiths could allow herself any enjoyment, indeed she had a hard struggle to make ends meet, despite the annual hundred pounds which Mrs. Sotheby paid her so grudgingly, for there was all the expense of her maintenance to be borne, and then there was the heavy premium to the insurance company, which had undertaken to render her old age independent.

Till she was sixty the governess would have no rest from the labour that she performed honestly, though without love; but after she was sixty she would have freedom bought by the insurance money.

On the whole, life was not very bad, Miss Griffiths was thinking, as she trudged home that sunny summer afternoon. If there was the daily toil, there was the quarterly recompense, and once in many years such a treat as her trip to Cornwall was possible. Involuntarily her hand closed over the cheque she held, and her chest rose with a half sigh. For once, through much re-assuring, she had convinced herself that she was happy.

Had anyone cared to investigate Miss Griffiths's habitual attitude of mind, he would unhesitatingly have pronounced her a pessimist, but then what was there in her experience to render her anything else? She was all alone in the world; no one loved her, she had no heritage but labour, and her youth was over; as a matter of fact she knew she must have been young once, but she could not remember when, for she was old ever since she had been teaching, and she was teaching at twenty. Of course that was no one's fault, no one had meant any harm, only fate had foisted a sorry portion on her as her lot in life. But she did not complain; she had never felt so little like complaining as she did now, when she entered her shabby sitting-room with the money, embodying her best imaginings, in her hand.

At first she did not notice that it was the landlady in person, and not the child servant, who was busying herself with the cracked tea-service, till Mrs. Daly accosted her grumblingly:

"Mary Ann has hurt her foot, I must wait on the lodgers myself till she is better."

"Indeed!" The governess came back with a start from the world of her imaginings.

"Yes, and the doctor says she may be laid up for a month; but troubles never come alone. I thought I'd had my share; but it seems the Lord does not think so." And here, to her lodger's astonishment, Mrs. Daly applied her black alpaca apron to her reddened eyes, and sat down to weep more at her ease.

"I hope there is nothing wrong," Miss Griffiths spoke gently, but her momentary contentment was gone. The woman's tears had thrown her back into her habitual consciousness of the universality of pain.

"Everything is wrong. Oh, how long life is when it is a burden! and I've tried so hard to do my best, but things have been too much for me since my man died. I've slaved late and early. I've wrought myself to skin and bone, and what does it come to?" looking at her lodger with fiery, rebellious eyes.

Miss Griffiths shook her head, that seeming the most comprehensive mode of offering sympathy.

"It means that my child and John Daly's child is a thief."

"Oh, Mrs. Daly!"

"You know the child; you remember the night you gave him a penny because he read so well? I have kept him at school every day. Often I have paid for him with the very price of my food, and half the time I dare say he was deceiving me, scheming and staying away to idle about the streets," rocking herself to and fro as she spoke.

"But so many children hate school and play truant," the governess ventured apologetically.

"But that is not the worst of it. Three days ago a policeman that I knew—he was from my own place in the country years ago—found him stealing, and brought him home to me. Only that he was my son he would have locked him up, he said."

"That is very bad indeed, Mrs. Daly. But this lesson may keep the child straight for the future, and after all it was only once."

"Unfortunately it wasn't only once, for I found, in the box under his bed, fruit and toys and candies, that he must either have stolen or stolen the price of. You have never missed any money, have you?" with a heartbroken sob.

"Oh no, indeed, I never have; but how dreadful for you, Mrs. Daly, and he such a bright, pretty little fellow too!"

"Yes, and so like his father, only that his father was honest. Well, Heaven knows, it's not my fault that Willie is a thief. But to think, Miss Griffiths, that only a few pounds might save him yet, and that I cannot raise the money; it is that that breaks my heart?"

"What do you mean?"

"The Prestons are going out to Canada, to farm-life there, and for twenty pounds John Preston would take Willie with him, and keep him till he found a fitting situation for him. He could not do it for less, for he is poor and has many children; but all I own in the world would not raise that sum."

"And what good would that do?"

"It would take him away from bad company—it would save him."

Jane Griffiths's thin hand closed on the cheque lying in her lap. What right had this strange woman to come to her with her personal troubles, and lay claim to her little all?

"I don't think I can help you," she said, speaking shrilly and rebelliously.

"Oh no, I never thought you could, but it eases one's heart a little to tell one's sorrows."

"I am a working woman. I have nothing but what I earn," she said argumentatively. "If I were rich I should be very happy to help you. But is there no one who knew you long ago, who would advance you this money on trust?" Miss Griffiths's tone became more cheerful as she pushed the responsibility from herself on to other imaginary shoulders.

"People love you well before they will lend you money," Mrs. Daly answered with a head-shake. "But don't you fret about it, miss, you have your own troubles, and I suppose I must have deserved this somehow, or it would not have been sent."

She rubbed her fretted eyes again with the stiff apron, and then, with pretended haste and alacrity, withdrew.

Miss Griffiths drew the shabby tea-tray towards her, and poured the black contents into her cracked tea-cup; but the decoction was bitter as gall to her tongue, and the hard bread and rancid butter stuck in her throat. Mrs. Daly needed twenty pounds, and twenty pounds was the whole of Miss Griffiths's treasure. Giving it up meant spending her holidays within Mrs. Daly's grimy walls; meant hearing the din of vehicles and breathing the dust of the streets though hot July and broiling August; meant shutting the doors of memory against that long-cherished dream of rest. Miss Griffiths dwelt on each item of her loss separately, picking them out as aggravations of her sacrifice. Mrs. Daly was nothing to her, her child she had scarcely seen, and yet for their sakes she must abandon the one piece of comfort that was about to find its way into her laborious year. Yes, she must do it, there was no question about it, indeed, it did not matter now whether or not she went to the Dingles. The whole thing was spoiled; there would be no light on the sea, no music in the waves, no sweetness in the briny breezes, if the thought of Willie Daly on the treadmill intruded on her hourly, as she knew it would. But what right had anyone to offer her this picture, what right had these people and their concerns to come between her and her well-merited rest?

She was righteously wroth as she rose from her meagre tea, and swept down the narrow dingy stairs into the dismal underground kitchen, where Mrs. Daly, by the light of the dim, grated window, was washing up the tea-cups of the other lodgers, while a small boy in an attitude of abject misery and self-abasement cowered over the handful of embers smouldering in the fire-place.

Miss Griffiths did not penetrate into the shabby interior, she stood on the threshold, holding her limp skirts in her hand.

"I came to say I can give you that money," she said, speaking in a high querulous voice. "I meant it for my holiday trip; it is all I have, but you can have it. I suppose your need is greater than mine."

She lingered just long enough to hear that Mrs. Daly was thanking her effusively, not declining her offer as she had half hoped. Then she turned impatiently, and went back hastily to the dismal solitude of her own apartment, and there her self-control gave way, and hiding her pale face in her thin hands, she wept, not for her lost holidays only, but for her lonely life, her forgotten youth, her loveless, hopeless, toil-filled maturity.

CHAPTER II.

It was Christmas. In country places he was picturesque as ever, where the fields slept under unbroken snow and yellow fires looked out brightly through wide windows beneath icicle-fringed eaves, but in towns all the beauty had been trodden out of him, and he seemed to hide his face and deny his existence in the raw, chill atmosphere of the sloppy streets.

"What odious weather!" a pale lady said with a little shiver, as she drew a woollen shawl closer around her throat and nestled more comfortably in the chintz-covered chair, that was drawn up as closely as the regulations of the establishment permitted to the fitfully blazing fire.

It was the drawing-room of a Governesses' Beneficent Home, in which twenty persons, of various ages and of the female sex, were seated on the afternoon of the Christmas Eve in question; a room supplied with all the essentials of furniture in the shape of tables, chairs, and a piano, but without a picture, an album, a scrap of needlework, or other personal belonging to individualise it.

"Have you finished with the Times now, Miss Small?" a well-grown, buxom, shabbily-clothed young woman asked of the lady by the fire. It may here be mentioned that the only portion of the paper which was really studied in the establishment was one particular column in one of the advertisement-sheets, where heads of families made known their requirements in the educational line.

"Not yet, Miss Goodson." Miss Small's hand closed determinedly on the sheet again, and her bright little eyes looked round the room with a gleam of malice in them.

"It does not seem fair for you to keep it all day," Miss Goodson rejoined, grumbling.

"There is nothing here would suit you."

"How do you know what would suit me?"

"Ladies, you would all have a much better time if you agreed not to quarrel," a rosy girl, who was writing by the table, looked up to say with good-humoured condescension.

"Quarrel! Who is quarrelling? One can't raise the caloric sufficiently for that, I assure you. How I do wish that I dared poke that big, black, smouldering mountain of coal into a roaring blaze."

"Well, do poke it; perhaps it won't be found out, and if it is we won't tell who did it," encouragingly.

"As if that mattered; why, they have eyes here in their back hair and in their heels, and in every unexpected place—at least she has."

"Oh, do not talk so much," came entreatingly from the table.

"I cannot write with so much chattering going on, and my letter is so important."

"Is it an application?"

"No, better than that, accepting a situation."

"Ladies, silence, please. Miss Snagsby is accepting her first situation. Pile on your own virtues now, Miss Snagsby, for you will never be allowed to hold them in esteem again."

"That is only the fashionable sentiment here; lots of us fare very well, and know we do, too."

"Of course, and all of us who live with titled ladies, have a little patrimony of our own, and wear an engagement-ring, ought to find ourselves very comfortable, at least I think so, Miss Shipton."

Miss Shipton smiled; she was a tall, well-grown woman of three-and-thirty, with a deep voice and a certain masculinity of aspect, that went oddly enough with her child-like candour in the matter of her own love-affair.

"An engagement-ring isn't much; you might all have one if you wished." She looked down with a smile on the little pearl ring on her finger as she spoke.

"I mightn't; I've tried it valorously during the two-and-twenty years of my life, and I've never had an offer of any consequence yet."

This from an extremely pretty girl, the only beauty in the room.

"Do tell us how you managed, Miss Shipton, and does the mode of procedure vary when you are making up to sons of the house or friends of the family?"

One or two of the listeners laughed, but she who had been seated by the window in silence hitherto, rose impatiently, and with a muttered remark regarding silly conversation, hurried out of the room and up the carpetless stairs, and into the corner of the divided chamber that she called her apartment.

"What are Miss Griffiths's matrimonial chances?" Miss Aston enquired with grave interest, whereat the first thing like a unanimous laugh echoed in the drawing-room that day.

Meantime Miss Griffiths had flung herself on her hard little bed with an unconfessed feeling of resentment against the happier women she had left behind her. How could they be so light and unconcerned when they were all hurrying towards a destiny as evil as her own? It was nearly thirty years now since she had given her cheque to Mrs. Daly, and from then till the present no solitary gleam of good fortune had ever come her way. She had spent her holidays in the dingy apartments that looked like a vulgar prison to her, and so had ruined the strength and courage needed for her winter labours. And then an unconscious air of martyrdom, dating from the hour of her grand sacrifice, had hung about her continually, offending Mrs. Sotheby, who considered it directed against herself, and so, after small misunderstandings that ran through all the winter term, Miss Griffiths and her employer agreed to part. Of course she found another situation, but more laborious and more remote, and Mrs. Sotheby found another governess, but at a higher salary, so neither profited by the exchange. And then after a time she left Mrs. Daly's apartments, not having the heart to withhold her weekly payments till the loan was made up, as had been the understanding at first. The daily governess sympathised with poverty as only the poor can, so she moved on. She had been moving on all her life, and her homelessness was pathetic had she been conscious of it.

Then after a year or two she fell ill, and employment grew more precarious, and the subscription to the insurance company lapsed, and so the hope of an independent old age—which was all the hope she had ever had—was ended. She was over sixty now, and her accomplishments were old-fashioned like herself, and her temper was soured, and the few pounds she had been able to save at intervals were spent in waiting for some one needing her services, and no one needed them. She was out of the running where the race is to the swift.

She had flung herself on her little bed, and had drawn her furlined cloak over her cold feet, and with her hands pressed on her aching eyeballs, was laboriously trying not to think.

She was as unpopular at the Home as she had been elsewhere. No one took to her, no young governess asked her advice, no older one claimed her sympathy. At night on both sides she would hear her neighbours telling their experiences, chatting to each other across their wooden partitions till the rules enjoined silence, but no remark beyond a civil good-night was ever addressed to her. She did not care for any of them, and yet she fancied sometimes, in her softer moods, that some of them would be sorry if they knew that only three pounds stood between her and destitution, that, in four more weeks, if she had not found a situation meantime, she had literally no prospect but the workhouse.

She knew there were homes for needy gentlewomen somewhere, but she also knew that they were beyond her reach, just as she had known once that there must be means of recovering the money she had paid into the insurance company, though the money was quite lost to her.

These thoughts made her colder, and she was shivering as she lay on her bed rubbing her chill hands together. She was quite aware that she was breaking a rule of the Home in retiring to the dormitory during the day, but she preferred the risk of a reprimand to the conversation going on below. Miss Griffiths had not yet reached that height of sympathy when she could take pleasure in every relaxation of her neighbours, and there never had been any period in her life when frivolous talk would have afforded her any gratification.

She took out her purse and looked into it again. There were the three sovereigns as she had seen them ten times that day; three sovereigns, that would pay for her board for three weeks, and the other necessary items of expenditure—her laundry, and the expected fee to the servants, and a cab to take her away to a situation—or to the workhouse. She thought of that home of the indigent without a smile, there was no suggestion of the ludicrous in it to her. It was the end of all her labours in spite of herself. She had striven for independence all her life, as others strive for wealth and fame, and she had been beaten. She must therefore accept the consequences of defeat. And then she fell to idly wondering how the workhouse could be reached, for she knew there were difficulties barring even those portals. She must go to the workhouse belonging to her own parish, but which was her parish? She did not know. She had been wandering all her life. She belonged to no place and to no person.

"If I could only die now, the three pounds would bury me," she thought, striving still towards independence, and then her thoughts went back tiredly to the little lodging in Putney that made all the home she had ever known, and to the old minister and his wife, who had been dust and ashes for nearly half a century; but she did not think of them with any tenderness. They had laid the burden of existence on her, that was all they had ever done for her. Were they conscious of the bitterness of that burden now in heaven, she wondered, and would they meet her with any self-reproach when she too entered the golden gates? It was hard for her to fancy herself in heaven, hard to fancy herself in any place of ease and rest; but then heaven had been promised to her, not because of any merit in her, but because she was weary and heavy laden.

"Oh, you're there, Miss Griffiths; I thought you had gone out." The rosy girl who was seeking an engagement had entered her neighbour's loose box on a promiscuous hunt for something, and had been startled almost into a shriek by the pallid face and wide-open eyes fronting her.

"No, I haven't been out to-day."

"Are you ill?"

"No, thank you," the sallow countenance was turned impatiently away, "only tired of the unending chatter downstairs."

"Chatter? I think the place as quiet as a churchyard." Miss Goodson was moved by a faint sense of affront as she withdrew into her own compartment, but being possessed of that inestimable quality for a start in life, namely, a good temper, she recovered after a moment's huffy adornment of her person.

"I suppose you know it is wiser to be in the drawing-room during office-hours?" she ventured hesitatingly.

"Why?" The interrogation came quite sharply through the wooden partition.

"In case you are wanted. You know no one is looked for elsewhere."

"I am never wanted."

"But a person of your acquirements might be."

"Then there are plenty below who have them and more. I don't suppose I was urgently demanded to-day," grimly.

"No, this was a bad day, there was no one here but a lady wanting a nursery-governess."

"And did she find one?"

"No, we are all too advanced and expensive," complacently.

"And has the lady gone?" Miss Griffiths started up so suddenly that she brought her neuralgic pain back again.

"No; but it's a nursery-governess she wants, four children to wash and dress and teach, for a salary of twenty pounds. Surely you would not think of it." Miss Goodson urged distressfully.

"I have no money. I must take what I can get," was the husky answer. She did not stop to brush her hair or smooth her rumpled collar, or change her bedroom slippers, that were among her few comforts. She was thinking eagerly, "Perhaps I am not too old-fashioned for this."

"Has the lady gone?" she stopped as she passed the drawing-room door to put this question.

"What lady?" Miss White asked with a languid lifting of her eyelids.

"The lady who wanted a nursery-governess."

"She's in the office, I think."

Miss Griffiths flew on, the desperate hope of gaining this prize—think of it, educated women of England!—having set her quivering like a young girl.

She went up to the office-door eagerly, but stopped there. Miss Worrit, the superintendent, was inside, and her thin tones were falling like ice-drops on the still air:

"I am sorry; most of our ladies at present are finishing governesses, but after the New Year we may be able to suit you."

"Thanks, I shall not trouble you, elsewhere I dare say I shall find some one not too grand for my requirements." The stranger was piqued, and spoke with an offended American accent as she came forth from the dingy office.

"I beg your pardon, but I came to say that I would not mind being a nursery-governess," Miss Griffiths broke in hurriedly. "I—I understand children, and the salary would not matter—and—and I've been a finishing governess."

There was poignant anxiety in every tone of the eager voice, in the clasp of the pale hands, in the forward curve of the long, stooping figure, but the strange lady was angry, and she only noticed the untidy hair, the old sickly face, and the obtrusive bedroom slippers.

"Oh, thank you, it is quite a common person I want," she answered with a vicious little laugh, and tossed her golden head and passed on, followed by a middle-aged gentleman, who had been silent and passive during the whole interview.

"Miss Griffiths how dare you?" Miss Worrit's vibrant voice broke in furiously.

The man started, and looked round from the doorstep, taking in at a glance the old, bent, dejected figure, the haggard, sallow face, and the drooping, hopeless attitude.

"Miss Griffiths, how dare you?" The words seemed to hiss like the lash of a whip, stinging the hearer into momentary attention.

"I wanted to see the lady. I thought——"

"What business had you to think? Why were you not in the drawing-room when the lady came? Where were you? running after the agents and such people, I know."

"No, I wasn't, I was in the bedroom."

"And why were you in the bedroom? How dare you break the rules?"

Miss Griffiths returned no answer.

"And then to disgrace the Home by appearing so, with such hair and such slippers, and such an aspect altogether. No lady would be capable of such conduct; but I always knew you were no lady." This was the deadliest stab that Miss Worrit kept in her locker, and she was wont to use it unsparingly; but for once it failed in effect. Miss Griffiths did not care what opinion Miss Worrit held of her gentility. "And I would further add," the superintendent went on, "that those who infringe the rules must give up the advantages of the establishment. You can therefore be ready to leave on Saturday."

She must leave on Saturday, and it was Thursday now; she had therefore one day in which to look out for lodgings, one day in which to find a landlady whose yawning pockets would swallow up her remaining coins and leave her penniless. She had her box to pack and a portion of her week to pay for, and all the rest of the time to look out for a new abode.

She went upstairs and changed her obnoxious slippers, and restored her hair to its usual smoothness, and bathed her hot brow and icy hands, and then she came back to the drawing-room and sat by the draughty window, looking out stonily on the muddy street. In one day she would be gone from here, would have passed out of her old life for ever. And where could she go? What could she do? What would become of her?

She fell to idly speculating on herself as if she had been another person. She was very unfortunate, she did not think she had ever known anyone quite so unfortunate. But after all, did this incident make things much worse than they had been? After all, was it necessary for her to look out another residence, since her stay in it must be so brief? Would it not be better to leave the Home and take her few possessions and go forth and sit on the pavement till a policeman took her up as a homeless person and solved her difficulty for her? She had no thought of revenge, she was too much beaten and disheartened for that; but in a vague way she thought it might benefit others if Miss Worrit's mode of procedure were examined into.

"If I am found homeless the case will come before the public, and then all who have complaints to make will take courage to say their say," she thought, "and what a blessing it will be for the old governesses if something is done!"

It was the first time in her life that the thought of becoming a public benefactress had been possible to Miss Griffiths, and for the moment it lifted her above her personal sorrows. She drew closer to the fire, and interjected a remark or two into the general conversation, and was so bright and animated that several of the governesses opined that she had got the situation, and others wondered how she could demean herself to take it. During dinner she was quite cheerful, and after dinner she volunteered a little music on the old piano, drawing more sweetness from it than any one had thought its thin strings capable of.

"The situation must be better than we thought, and she has got it," the governesses whispered to each other, but no one dared ask her, and Miss Griffiths volunteered no information. For that one evening she was allowed a spurious, feverish contentment, but in the night self-pity and despair laid hold on her again, exulting over her.

In the morning she rose, so ill and haggard that leave to rest on the hard little bed would have been a boon, but in the establishment illness was against the rules, and she was not in a position to ask or obtain a favour. She dressed herself languidly, was late for prayers, and had another reprimand, and then went back to the drawing-room and stared out with unseeing eyes at the deserted street.

It was Christmas Day, and she was wondering why she could not die, why she must drain the bitter cup of privation to its dregs, what she had ever done to deserve such special evil fortune.

"A visitor for Miss Griffiths." The porter's voice came chokily up the speaking-tube, and Miss Griffiths started with a momentary thrill of astonishment and hope. Who could care to visit her? Who thought of her in all the wide world?

She went down the stairs dazedly, and into the chill dining-room, and up towards the end window, in whose recess a man was sitting—a well-dressed, middle-aged gentleman, who rose at Miss Griffiths's approach, and held out his hand to her.

"You don't know me," he said, "I am more changed in the time than you are. I knew you at a glance yesterday."

"No, I don't know you," she said slowly, as some familiar tone awoke slumbering memories; "I suppose I taught your family some time, but I forget."

"No, you did not teach my family, but you rendered me a great service once."

"I? I think you mistake. I fear I never had it in my power to render a service to anyone."

"Oh, but you had, and you did it very generously too, and a very great service it was. I suppose you forget Willie Daly that you sent abroad?"

"And you are he?" She clasped her hands involuntarily as she looked at him.

"Yes, I am he, and I am very rich and prosperous—and honest too, and I owe it all to you."

"I am very glad—very glad." She drew a short breath as she spoke. If her life had been maimed and impotent, at least it had helped towards this man's development.

"And all these years I have remembered you," he said huskily. "Ever since I began to succeed I have laid aside a tenth of my profits as Miss Griffiths's share; it was only honest, only interest on your investment. I remembered how generously you gave, and how hard the giving was, and I have never forgotten that, under Providence, I owe it all to you."

The old governess had broken down, and was weeping bitterly. "Your mother must be proud and happy," she said with a sob.

"Mother died many, many years ago, but not before she knew I was likely to do well."

"And you knew me yesterday?" There was a sound of faint pride in her voice as she spoke.

"Oh yes, the moment I looked at you. I have been seeking you for years. I would have advertised for you long ago, but for the weak dread of telling my wife all my history. She is a Virginian, and proud and high in many ways, and I dreaded the effect of my disclosures on her. Besides, I did not know that you might not be rich and prosperous. But when I saw you, and knew how things were with you, I made up my mind to tell her the truth, and now she is as interested in you as I am. We came together to see you last night, but it was after hours, and we could not be admitted. And now we want you to come to our house this evening, and to stop with us till we decide about the future. There is an amount lodged at my banker's that will pay you three hundred a year, and it is not a tithe of all I owe you."

Miss Griffiths did not protest. She was too utterly thankful. The help was too direct and providential.

There was an excitement in the Home, such as its well-regulated interior had never known before, when a neat brougham and pair drove up for Miss Griffiths in the evening, and the golden-haired lady came to lead her off in person.

"Then you have decided on Miss Griffiths after all?" Miss Worrit asked with a gleaming smile, whereupon the stranger twisted her neck, surveyed the superintendent from head to foot, and turned her back on her without answering.

It happened that Miss Slingsby was passing through the hall at that moment, and witnessed this cut direct, the news of which crept noiselessly upstairs, and was considered better than champagne at dinner-time.

It is needless to pursue Miss Griffiths's history further. She lives now in pretty apartments in Bloomsbury, and several children who call her auntie visit her periodically, and seem to love her, and to her own astonishment Miss Griffiths finds that it is possible to regard children with affection.

Two Christmases.

BY R. STANSBY WILLIAMS.

I.

A DULL grey sea, a dull grey sky,
A wailing wind that bends and stirs
The sombre branches of the firs,
And drifts the snowflakes far and nigh.
And borne upon a stronger blast,
The distant chime of Christmas bells,
In varying cadence, sinks and swells,
And wakens memories of the past,
So fair, so full of happy days,
And promise of a brighter scene.
Till chill suspicion swept between,
And turned my feet in other ways.
I spoke no word, I made no sign,
I hardened all my heart with pride;
I put the kindlier thoughts aside,
And now the punishment is mine.
No voice makes music at my door,
No kindly glances meet my own;
The day drags slowly by—alone
I live my life for evermore.

II.

The fleecy flakes come slowly down, and slower yet, then ceasing,
Leave hidden by a snowy veil the all untrodden ways;
The dull grey clouds roll back at last, the sunny beams releasing.
Till bush and brake, and field and fen, are sparkling in the haze.
The sudden radiance flushes all around with crimson splendour,
Between the barren branches of the distant woodland aisle,
And falls upon a face that shows affection, true and tender,
And outstretched hands of welcome, and a kindly look and smile.

Last year the day dragged slowly by, in solitude and sadness,
The stubborn heart could feel its pain, yet would not end the strife;
The bitter words I uttered in that momentary madness
Might well have raised a barrier that had parted us for life.
By you—more injured of the twain—the silence first was broken,
Though in my inmost heart the fire had never ceased to burn—
By you, in winning accents first the kindly words were spoken,
That opened up to each and both a possible return.
But, hark! the chime of distant bells, in yonder steeple ringing.
Comes sweetly on the frosty air, all other sounds above;
And nearer yet, the village choir their Christmas hymns are singing,
And o'er our hearts there steals a sense of happiness and love.
We turn no longer to the past, but fix our glances rather
On where the happy future glows with hope's returning ray,
And yield in perfect thankfulness our homage to our Father,
Who gives us both His blessed gift of peace this Christmas Day.

Cured by Cupid.

A COMEDIETTA, IN ONE ACT.

BY H. CHANCE NEWTON.

Characters represented:

EDWARD SOWERLEIGH (An Independent Young Man).
JOHN (His Valet).
MR. SNIGSDEN (Landlord of a Seaside Lodging House).
CLARA FEATHERLEY (His Niece).
COOK, HOUSEMAID, PARLOURMAID, Etc.

SCENE.—Sitting-room in a Seaside Lodging House. Large Window, opening to ground, c., leading to garden. Table, R.C., armchair beside it, other chairs here and there. Books on table.

As curtain rises MR. SNIGSDEN rushes in, followed by JOHN, also by PARLOURMAID, COOK, etc., etc.

Snigsd. I declare I'm all of a tremble. I hardly know whether I'm on my head or my heels, or whether I've got any head at all. I must really insist upon this Mr. Sowerleigh seeking other lodgings. I cannot have such terrorism in this highly respectable, neatly-furnished seaside residence—a residence facing the sea, and having good table and attendance, etc., etc., as per advertisement. I will not endure it. Why, he frightens us all to death!

All. Rather!

Snigsd. Nothing suits him, nothing pleases him. Upon my word, for a young man to behave so is shocking. There's only one of us who isn't afraid of him, and that's my niece Clara. She only laughs at him, and says his bad temper will wear off one of these days.

John. Not it. His temper's laid on too thickly to wear off. You say you tremble at him. But what of me? Look what I have to put up with!

Snigsd. You know him better than we do. How do you account for his strange behaviour?

John. I don't know. I think it is because he's got too much money and don't do anything to earn it, and so he has plenty of time to grumble at everything and everybody. He seems to have taken a dislike to the world and all that's in it. And I'm sure the world and all that's in it return the compliment to him.

Snigsd. Perhaps his liver—eh?

John. I dunno.

Parlourmaid. I declare I won't stay if he remains here.

Cook. And it's more than I can stand. Why, he finds fault even with his food. The heathen!

All. He's a perfect savage!

John. Worse than Zulus and cannibals!

Snigsd. Zulus, cannibals! Why, they're all innocence and gentleness compared to him. But I'll let him see. This very day I'll—Sowerleigh (without). John, John! you skulking scoundrel, where are you? John, I say!

Snigsd. (in terror). Hark, there he is! let us fly.

John (trembling). Oh, lor, I'm in for it!

Snigsd. Away! Conceal yourselves! Anywhere—anywhere to avoid him.

Sowerleigh (without). John! John!

All. Oh, he's coming. The brute! Away! away!

[They hurry off in various directions. Sowerleigh (rushing in L. with newspaper, which he dashes down on table). John! Where is that lazy villain? All alike—all alike! (Walking restlessly up and down). My servants take my money, and then only laugh at me and defy my authority. I pay exorbitant rent here, to say nothing of "extras," and what do I get? Inefficiency and impertinence. I hurry away from that horrid haunt of rogues and lunatics—London—that senseless, noisy, dusty, dirty, disreputable city, hoping to find peace and quietness, and some little honesty here, at this small seaside place. And what do I find? I'm fleeced right and left; my host is an amiable idiot; his cook is in league with all the fiends of indigestion; his other servants are saucy; his niece, who, as her uncle is a widower, rules the house for him—his niece is a simpering coquette, like the rest of her sex, all simplicity and innocence outside, but all duplicity and heartlessness within. What a world! What a world! All misery, wickedness, and humbug! Someone lately asked "Is life worth living?" If he were to try my lot for a while I'm positive he would soon answer himself in the negative [Sits at table, scowling, and hurriedly glancing over newspaper.

CLARA enters C. with flowers; she is in walking dress.

CLARA (coming down). Good-morning, Mr. Sowerleigh. What delightful weather, is it not? (He does not answer.) Perhaps you haven't noticed the weather yet? (No answer.) Fie, fie! Mr. Sowerleigh. What a black look! That will never do. Why ever don't you try to enjoy yourself?

SOWERLEIGH (bitterly). Enjoy myself? Ha, ha! Don't be absurd.

CLARA. There, there. Is it offended then? Did the lady say something unpleasant and scold it? Never mind then.

SOWERLEIGH (rising surlily). I will not be ridiculed in this manner, Miss Featherley. I came here expecting to find peace and quietness—

CLARA. Ah, you should have brought something similar with you then. They who seek after pleasure and happiness with a grumbling, discontented spirit, never find those blessings.

SOWERLEIGH. I will not be lectured. No, not even by you, Miss Featherley. I will amuse myself in my own way.

CLARA. Which is trying to make other people miserable, I'm afraid. A nice amusement truly. (SOWERLEIGH growls.) Ha, ha, ha! Look! What a terrible visage. Just like the ogre in the fairy tale (laughing).

SOWERLEIGH (furiously). The what?

CLARA. The ogre. Don't you remember—Fee-fi-fo-fum.

[Retires up, laughing.

SOWERLEIGH (aside). I am more than ever convinced that women were sent on earth on purpose to plague and torture man. All history and experience prove it. And yet, there's something about her that—Pshaw! Don't be idiotic, Sowerleigh. They're all alike—all alike.

CLARA (coming down). You would have felt much happier, Mr. Discontent, if you'd gone out this beautiful morning. I was up and out early, across the meadows, over the cliffs, and along the beach, and oh, it was so delightful. Perhaps the bright sunshine would have thawed away your surliness! Though I doubt if even the sun would meet with your cynic-ship's approval. You would think it ought not to shine on you without your permission, I dare say.

SOWERLEIGH. Ugh! That's my business.

CLARA. Ah, when I saw the beautiful flowers raising their heads thankfully to the sun, and when I heard the birds singing away so merrily, and saw the calm blue sea glistening in the sunlight, I thought what a beautiful world this is, and how grateful we ought to be for all its loveliness!

SOWERLEIGH. Oh yes, I dare say! All that sort of stuff is very well for poets, and such like lunatics, who worship Nature, and all that sort of thing!

CLARA. Well, that's better than worshipping one's self, anyhow. (Typing up flowers at table.) Do you like flowers, Mr. Sowerleigh?

SOWERLEIGH (snappishly). No.

CLARA (sharply). Oh! (then more gently) what a pity! I was just going to offer you a few of these I gathered this morning. There, see how beautiful they are, with the tiny dew-drops glistening on them, even now. (Arranges and sorts them at table.) How do you think now the flowers would get on, if they grumbled at all the good things given to them? Suppose they obstinately shut themselves up from the dew, and the sunshine, and the showers! Why, they would be wretched, and be no pleasure either to themselves or to others. Just like some human beings are! (Laughing.) Do you like reading?

SOWERLEIGH. Reading! Bah! What is there worth reading?

CLARA. Why, there are novels—

SOWERLEIGH. Novels! Ugh! All love, courtship, and marriage, and then—naturally—elopements and divorces. A lot of twaddle bound up into three volumes, the covers of which are often the most interesting portion.

CLARA. Well, then, science? You men profess to like that.

SOWERLEIGH. Science? Stuff! a lot of something written by somebody who knows nothing, for those who care nothing for it. You take up one theory, and then find the next scientist contradicts it, and advances another theory; and so on, all the way through.

CLARA (laughing). Why not try poetry, then?

SOWERLEIGH. Here, I say, don't make a fellow shudder. Poetry! a string of childish jingles, muddled up into metre. Rubbish written in rhythm. An insane attempt to praise two things never found on this planet—the true and the beautiful.

CLARA. What a pity you don't write; there is one vocation would have suited you admirably.

SOWERLEIGH. What is that, pray?

CLARA. You would have made such a bitter reviewer.

SOWERLEIGH. Reading is all very well for women. Little things please little minds.

CLARA (coolly). It is better to have a little mind than none at all.

SOWERLEIGH. Is it your intention to insult me, Miss Featherley? Do you mean to insinuate that I have no mind?

CLARA. I beg your pardon, I'm sure, Mr. Sowerleigh. I dare say you have a mind, but it has, I fear, become crusted with the cobwebs of cavilling. Now, a good clean sweep—

SOWERLEIGH. Clean sweep! There's no such person!

CLARA. Don't try to joke, Mr. Satirist. You know what I mean. A little sympathy with others would clear your brain—say, and even your heart.

SOWERLEIGH. But I tell you I'm disgusted with the world. It's all sham and tinsel, and as for sympathy and friendship—

CLARA. Ah, you never tried to cultivate them, perhaps. You can't have the flower without planting the seed, and it is only by being friendly that one finds friends. Friendship is like a young rose-tree; it wants careful tending, and the bitter wind of suspicion doesn't improve its growth. Now, there was your great prototype, Diogenes—

SOWERLEIGH. What, the old idiot with the tub?

CLARA. Yes; and he did trundle his tub before him as he went, and you don't even take as much exercise as that. Now, you, who have an income—at least, so I've heard uncle say—and don't have to labour for a livelihood, don't you think you might show more sympathy with those who do?

SOWERLEIGH. Don't know, I'm sure.

CLARA (coming down). Oh, how nice it must be to be able to help one's struggling fellow-creatures! Why, it's only a law of Nature. The sun helps the flowers, the flowers help the bees, and man—

SOWERLEIGH. Man helps himself to someone else's goods whenever he gets a chance. Bah! people pretend to be poor just to get money out of one. I've never seen a deserving object.

CLARA. Then you've evidently never looked for one. Just fancy, never seen poor people, and you've lived in London all your life! Like Diogenes again, you see. He looked about to find an honest man—everywhere but in the right place, for he was only thinking of himself all the while. It's a pity Diogenes never fell in love!

SOWERLEIGH. And then he'd have been a bigger fool than ever. Love, indeed! Let's have no more of that rubbish! I know what love is!

CLARA. It doesn't seem like it.

SOWERLEIGH. Why not?

CLARA. Why, if you knew what love was, you would be happier; your countenance would not be so gloomy; your heart would be in its right place—that is, it would belong to someone else. Love would soothe your temper. But there, I mustn't stay here talking to you. Uncle will wonder where I am. [Exit L.

SOWERLEIGH (alone, coming down, meditatively). By Jove! I begin to think she's not far out. There may be something in life worth living for after all if one seeks for it. She certainly seems happy enough. (Walking about.) Yes, confound it! she's too happy, and only makes me think how miserable I am. Yet somehow I don't feel quite so miserable when she's here. There is an indescribable something about her manner that is positively refreshing. It acts on one like a tonic. (Looking off.) How pretty she looks this morning. I don't think she's ever looked so pretty before. (Coming down.) Oh, hang it! this won't do! I must get away from here or I shall be falling in love, and I couldn't stand that! (About to go.) And yet, why not? (Abstractedly examining flowers.) It couldn't make me more unhappy than I am, that's certain; and it might—of course I only say it might—make me happier. Who knows? Already I begin to feel drawn towards her. Yes, that's just where it is. Love is like a whirlpool, when once one gets near it it is impossible to keep out of it. . . . A fellow might do worse, though, than win a girl like that. . . . I've a good mind to try my luck. . . . No, I won't. Bah! what am I about this morning? I must be going mad, or something. As if there were any good in women! The notion's ridiculous—utterly absurd. (Flinging himself into chair.) And yet she doesn't seem to be trying to catch a husband for gain. She seems fair and square enough. But stay! (Rising.) What was that about my position? Why, yes, of course. She said, 'You have an income—at least, so I've heard uncle says.' Of course she did. Now I come to recollect, I distinctly heard her say so. Hum! that's her little game, after all, is it? She thinks I should be a good 'catch,' no doubt. . . . I've a good mind to try her just to serve her out. I'll go for a stroll, and think it over. (Going.) A capital notion! I'll pretend that something has suddenly happened to deprive me of my fortune. Then we shall see. . . . Ah, Sowerleigh, my boy, you needn't fear being caught just yet. She'll change her tone, I warrant, when she believes I'm poor. Catch women marrying for love. No, no. Cash, not Cupid, is their idol! Yes, I'll go and think it over. [Exit c. Pause.]

Re-enter CLARA R.

CLARA. Well, Mr. Sowerleigh, have you recovered yet? Oh, he's not here! Gone off grumbling, as usual, I suppose! What a strange young man to be sure! Never satisfied. Just as if discontent ever did any good! (Arranging books, etc.) It's a great pity though. I don't think he's utterly bad at heart. Ah well, no doubt he'll settle down one of these days, and make a good husband to somebody! (Stopping.) Somebody! Why, I do declare I feel half-jealous! Somebody! Why, I feel as if I had an interest in him. (Sitting.) So I have! I do believe I could even try to love him into a better mood. Poor fellow! He needs someone to love him; he is so miserable, everybody seems to dislike him. Heigho! I suppose that's why I like him—just a little bit. We girls are contrary creatures, I'm afraid. (Rising.) Poor young man! how nice it would be to be able to brighten his existence. Love would do a great deal towards that. He is a very skilful physician, especially in matters of the heart. What a pleasure it would be to tease him into kinder notions. Ah me! I'm afraid that will never be my office, for I should have to wait until he wooed me, and that doesn't seem very likely, and I couldn't woo him even though leap-year is coming. (Looking off.) Why, here he comes back again, and looking surlier than ever. What's the matter now, I wonder. [Retires up R.]

Re-enter SOWERLEIGH C.

Sowerleigh (to himself). I don't know what to think. I can't quite shake off this temporary insanity—this strange feeling that is creeping over me. I've a great mind to try that little plot, and see if she does care for me. At any rate I should see her in her true colour, which, evidently, isn't green. Ah, there she is! I'll watch her a while. [Sits gloomily at table.]

CLARA (coming down c.). Well, Mr. Solemnity, was the sun too hot, or the wind too cold, or wasn't the colour of the sea suitable to your fancy, that you are back again so soon? Good gracious, how severe you look! Is anything the matter, sir?"

Sowerleigh (aside). Sir! How formal it sounds from her.

CLARA. Aren't you well?

Sowerleigh (gloomily). No, I'm not!

CLARA (tenderly). Oh, I'm so sorry! Shall I send for a doctor? Is there anything I can get for you?

Sowerleigh (pathetically). Nothing—nothing. No one can help me now!

CLARA. Why do you talk so wildly, Mr. Sowerleigh?

Sowerleigh (rising). Miss Featherley, I am about to tell you what I wouldn't tell another living creature. (Movement of surprise by CLARA.) Miss Featherley, I am a ruined man! Don't interrupt me! I say I am ruined! I, whom you thought well-to-do—as I was—have this morning heard that the company in which my money was invested, has failed; henceforth, I am a poor man. (Aside.) That will settle her!

CLARA. Oh, Mr. Sowerleigh, I'm so very, very sorry! And this is what made you so ill-tempered this morning, and I unkindly made fun of you? Pray forgive me!

Sowerleigh (aside). She doesn't treat me coldly as yet. Sympathises. That's a dodge; sympathy is cheap; but she wouldn't hear of love now, I warrant, not she. I'll try her more plainly. (Aloud.) Yes, Miss Featherley, in future I must work for a livelihood. But all that I could bear. Alas! another matter troubles me still more deeply, Miss Featherley. I am in love. You look astonished, but it is true. I lately saw—no matter where—a lady who, I began to fondly think, might learn to love me. Could I have gained her affection, it would have changed me for the better. For her sake I have been trying to conquer my evil temper, for I know I have one.

CLARA. No—no. You have been troubled!

Sowerleigh. Ah, you say that to soothe me. But for her sake I would have endeavoured to become a better man, and I was only thinking of going to her, and throwing myself at her feet, and imploring her to bear with me. How can I now, a poor man, ask her to love me? How can I dare address her?

CLARA (aside). He tells me he loves, and loves another! How it seems to oppress me here (heart); and yet I must not let him know it. What is it to me? (Aloud, with difficulty.) But surely, sir, this lady, of whom you speak, would not refuse your love because you have met with misfortune?

Sowerleigh (bitterly). Wouldn't she?

CLARA (firmly). No! Or else love is not worth having.

Sowerleigh. Suppose you were in her place, would you accept the affection of a man, knowing him to be poor and a worker for his daily bread? Would you try to love such a man, and wait for him until he had retrieved his fortunes?

CLARA. Yes, willingly, if I loved him, and if his love were real; and so would any true woman.

Sowerleigh (doubtfully). You would?

CLARA. Yes, yes. Oh, go to her, Mr. Sowerleigh; tell her you love her, and all will be well. Believe me, she cannot, will not refuse you. [Retires up sadly to window.]

Sowerleigh (L. c.). I will act upon your advice. I will tell her I love her, as you suggest. Miss Featherley—Clara, I need not go far. 'Tis you whom I love, although a little while ago I knew it not. From you I have learnt (even by a subterfuge) that there is some truth in woman; that this world is not the hollow mockery I deemed it. I have been pampered, proud, foolish—aye, even mad. I've thought too much of myself, too little of others. You have enlightened me. You have taught me I have a heart. That heart I now willingly, freely offer you. Oh, do not turn from me! By your help I will strive to overcome my surliness, my suspicious manner. (Holding her hand.)

CLARA. Mr. Sowerleigh, I know not what to say—I—

Sowerleigh. Ah, you do refuse me, then, now I am poor.

CLARA. No, no, Mr. Sowerleigh, do not think that of me; do not think me so base, so mercenary. I always believed there was something good in you—that you did not know your better self; and—shall I confess it?—something like love for you sprang up within my heart. You seemed so lonely that I pitied you, and you know pity and love are related to each other. Mr. Sowerleigh, if you really love me, I will try, oh, so earnestly, to love you in return; yes, and will patiently wait until you get employment, and can ask me to marry you. If we love truly we can afford to wait, can we not?

Sowerleigh (embracing her). Hooray! There is some good in the sex after all. I here recant all my former libels. But, stay, dear, this is a knock-down blow to all my old theories, isn't it? Well, no matter, when theories make a man miserable it is best to get rid of them. Come to my arms, Clara dear, I am happier to-day than ever I've been in my life. (SNIGSDEN and the others here appear at various doors, and look startled.) But one thing I have to confess, darling, and that is—(Seeing SNIGSDEN, etc., watching.) Here, come forward, all of you; don't stand there looking so scared. I'm harmless now. You may approach me without fear.

Snigsdén and John (doubtfully). May we?

CLARA. Yes, uncle. Mr. Sowerleigh says I've tamed him.

All (startled). Is it possible?

JOHN. Then perhaps I shall lead a quieter life.

SNIGSDEN. And I!

Sowerleigh. You shall—everybody shall. You behold in me an altered man, Snigsdén. I love your niece, Snigsdén. Don't look startled; I'm perfectly sane—sane than I've ever been. I repeat—I love your niece; she loves me; and soon, Snigsdén, I must ask you to accompany us to the hymeneal altar, and give us your avuncular blessing.

Snigsdén (astonished). You?—she?—I? I'm so flabbergasted, I don't know what to say.

Sowerleigh. What—surely you have no objection?

Snigsdén (aside). What a question to ask! As if I dared to have! (Aloud.) Oh no, none whatever. If (looking dubiously at CLARA)—if she hasn't.

CLARA. Oh no, uncle dear, I've none. (Aside to SOWERLEIGH.) Have I?

Snigsdén (pathetically). Well, well, I shall miss her when she goes, but still, I will not be selfish; so, as the party says in the play, "Bless you, my children!"

All. Hooray!

CLARA (to SOWERLEIGH). But we cannot be married just yet, you know, dear. We must wait a while, since this great misfortune has fallen upon you. But my love shall cheer you until brighter days come again for you.

Sowerleigh. Brighter days have already come to me, darling little Clara, inasmuch as I know I am loved. As for the misfortune I mentioned, that was but a subterfuge—a ruse of mine, to try if you were of the right metal, to see if you could love me for myself alone. I was just now about to tell you. Forgive the falsehood, dear. It was wrong of me, I know, and I have behaved to you like a cad all along. But you know how sceptical and suspicious I am—at least, I was. Say you will pardon me.

CLARA. It was very, very wrong of you, sir, and I ought to be very very angry with you; but I believe you really love me too well to think me mercenary, and so I will perhaps—mind, I only say perhaps—forgive you this time. Only mind, no more surliness.

Sowerleigh. No!

CLARA. No more grumbling!

Sowerleigh. No!

Clara. No more thinking that everyone's dishonest or foolish, that women are all heartless, that the world isn't worth living in—

Sowerleigh. No, no, no!

Clara. And you will admit that there is some good in love, after all?

Sowerleigh. I will, for it has conquered even me, and that's something like a victory.

Clara. Ah, Love is a physician whose prescriptions never fail. His method is gentle, yet sure. And who can count the number of his patients? Testimonials to the efficacy of his treatment may be seen daily throughout the world. You (to SOWERLEIGH) are not the first cynic, nor will you be the last, who will confess that he has been

"CURED BY CUPID."

CURTAIN.

SERVANT. JOHN. SOWERLEIGH and CLARA. SNIGSDEN. SERVANT.
R. R. C. C. L. C. L.

Doubly Bound.

BY PAUL BLAKE.

CHAPTER I.

"You are quite sure you feel better to-day?" asked Fraser.

It was a commonplace remark, but there was a touch of earnestness in it which took it out of the category of conventional phrases.

Marion Heatherington looked up with a bright laugh.

"You couldn't have smiled yesterday," continued Fraser.

"No, I follow the example of the ocean; yesterday I was unbearable, to-day I am all smiles."

"I felt awfully sorry for you. I wish I could have done something to make it easier for you."

"Thank you very much. Was that spoken in your capacity as doctor or friend?"

"Both, perhaps," he replied.

"I think I am very fortunate," said Marion; "few invalids can manage to have their doctor on board with them when they go a voyage in search of health. It's very convenient, because you see you can't go very far away from me, and whenever I want you all I have to do is to send for you, and there is no fear of finding you out on a round of visits."

"Yes, it is very convenient," assented Fraser. "I gladly acquiesce in any arrangement which ensures my not being far from you."

Marion did not reply to this, but, shading her eyes with her hand, gazed steadily upon the water. It was a beautiful morning, made still more so by the contrast with its predecessor.

This was the third day out. The vessel was bound for Sydney. It was a sailing-vessel, so there was plenty of leisure for the passengers to fill up as best they might. Up to the present time there had been no calm weather, and, consequently, all were as great strangers to each other as when they started; but sunshine soon brought them from their cabins, and by dinner-time a good many had struck up an acquaintance with their neighbours.

However, Marion and Fraser kept themselves aloof from the others, except when civility demanded a few words of conversation. They were put down as brother and sister by most of their fellow-passengers, for it was clear they were not man and wife.

The truth was they were neither one or the other, they were friends. Fraser was a doctor in tolerable practice in Edinburgh. Marion was an orphan, who had only recently lost the aunt with whom she used to live in the same town. Fraser had attended the elder Miss Heatherington during her illness, and had necessarily seen a great deal of the niece. She herself was not well; a pulmonary complaint caught during the previous winter had developed itself somewhat rapidly, and it was considered advisable by the physician she consulted that she should take a sea-voyage to Australia or New Zealand. But this was out of the question whilst her aunt needed her care.

Fraser discovered one day that this voyage was in contemplation. He at once said that he himself was about to sail to Sydney in the course of a few weeks, and that if he could be of any service to her he should be most happy.

There was no one to put any obstacle in the way of her acceptance of his aid. Marion was of age and her own mistress; had she not accepted Fraser's offer she must have gone alone.

"Besides," she argued to herself, "it is different travelling with one's doctor to travelling with an utter outsider."

The result was that they both sailed on the same vessel. When Fraser made his offer he was undecided whether to remain in Scotland or not. He had received a promise of a lucrative partnership in Sydney from an old fellow-student, who was making the supposition that Miss Heatherington was to remain in Scotland contributed to that resolve. At any rate, when he found she was going, he determined to go as well.

In the bustle of packing and starting, and the excitements of the first two days of the voyage, he had seen but little of her, but now that good weather had set in, he allowed himself to make up for lost time.

"I wonder whether we shall have a quick passage?" said Marion when she had looked long enough across the water.

"I don't know, I'm sure," replied Fraser; "I'm in no hurry. I've had hard work for the last six years, and shall not object to a few quiet months. It's a wonderful relief to a man to let his work drop utterly."

"That is not very encouraging for me," said Marion with a smile. "I understood you were going to look after my health on the voyage."

"I don't think that will come under the category of work. Pleasure is more the word. Besides, I really don't think I shall have much to do but try and persuade you to eat more and let the sea-air do its work."

"You won't have much difficulty in making me obey you, for I have a most tremendous appetite. You don't know how different I feel already from what I did when at home."

"I'm very glad to hear it. I hope by the time you get back you will be strong enough to stand the trying winters of Edinburgh."

"I don't know if I shall return at all," replied Marion.

"Indeed?" said Fraser.

He had never questioned her as to her future intentions, though he much wanted to know them. He hoped she was now about to make a confession.

"No, I have some distant relations at Melbourne who will be quite ready to let me stay with them as long as I wish, for I shall not be any burden on them."

"I wish Sydney had been your destination; we should then have been in the same city."

"Oh," replied Marion, "I quite expect that by the time we reach Australia we shall be tired of each other, and only too glad to find our ultimate destinations are different. I've always heard that people get very bored with each other on a voyage, especially in a sailing ship."

"Let us be the exception," said Fraser.

"We might try, at all events."

"I've no fear of your success in not boring me," said he, "and you must let me know when I bore you."

"Very well, I will."

"Is that a promise?"

"Yes, if you wish," she replied with a smile.

CHAPTER II.

MARION had not redeemed her promise at the end of two months. Yet Fraser had given her every opportunity of doing so, for they spent nearly all their time in company. By this time the rest of the passengers had discovered that no relationship existed between them, and put them down as lovers.

Were they lovers? In one sense they were. Fraser had definitely come to the conclusion that he would like above all things to marry this charming orphan; Marion could not help recognising in him a man who admired her more sincerely than even his words implied.

This state of things could not last much longer. Marion, in spite of herself, could not help wondering why he did not definitely propose. Fraser evidently began to recognise the fact that he was getting himself into a very false position.

At this crisis circumstances arose which put much intercourse out of the question. The weather, which had been very favourable for many weeks, changed rather suddenly to squally. The squall soon gave place to a gale, and that to a storm, and for two days and nights the passengers were kept below deck. The only place of meeting was the dining-saloon, and that was so full of people that private conversation was impossible.

As the next day brought a comparative lull, there was every hope they might be allowed to breathe a little fresh air again, but to the annoyance of everyone, orders were given that they should still remain below.

"Must have the deck clear for repairs," said the captain soothingly; "to-morrow it will be all right, I hope."

The passengers acquiesced. Very different would have been their sensations had they heard the short conversation which he had immediately afterwards with Mr. Jones, the chief mate.

"Well, Mr. Jones, have you found the leak?"

"No, sir; the water is gaining fast; the carpenter says it must be in the hold, and that if we move the cargo to find it we shall probably only leave the hole free for the water to come in faster."

"You have slung a sail under the keel?"

"They are doing it now, sir."

"How long can we float, do you think?"

"About four days, sir."

The truth could not be hid from the passengers many hours. The incessant pumping betrayed the existence of something unusual, and on the following day the men were summoned to take their turn at the pumps with the crew.

A keen look-out for a passing vessel was kept, but nothing could be seen. And they were hundreds of miles from land!

To everyone on board was assigned a place in a boat. The vessel carried a sufficient number to accommodate both crew and passengers.

The catastrophe came earlier than was expected. Thanks, however, to the excellence of the organisation, most of the boats were launched in safety whilst the vessel began to gradually settle.

Only one boat more had to be launched. It was the one to which Fraser and Marion were allotted.

Just as it was being lowered the vessel gave a lurch. Most of the passengers had already taken their seats; in fear lest the vessel was about to sink and drag them down in the swirl, they cut themselves loose and pushed the boat from the side, leaving the captain and a dozen others still on board.

"Come back!" shouted the captain, whilst the screams of those left to perish almost drowned his voice.

But the fear of death was too great for those in safety, and they pulled rapidly off, leaving their late companions to perish.

"Cowardly hounds!" ejaculated the captain. However, he wasted no time in words, but tried to rig up a raft, which might afford temporary safety, whilst one or two leapt overboard to swim to the boat.

Fraser held Marion's hand.

"It is only a question of hours," he said. "Tell me you forgive me for having induced you to come on this ill-fated ship."

She clasped his hand with hers, and looked up at him.

"I have nothing to forgive," she said. "I am not sorry I came, even now."

What need was there for her to try and conceal her love any longer? Death stared them in the face; let them at all events speak the truth now.

"Marion," said Fraser earnestly, putting his arms around her, "we have to face death, let us face it together. I have never told you yet that I love you; you will believe it now."

"Yes, I believe it," was her reply. "I am happier now than I have ever been. But it seems cruel that I have to die so soon after life has been made worth living."

"Perhaps it is for the best," he said. "Who knows but that something might have happened to part us? Now nothing can."

He stooped and kissed her. Then he ran forward to join the captain and others who were hard at work.

The boats gradually faded from sight. The ship still slowly sank, but so slowly that few noticed any difference. The lightning of the vessel had given it a fresh lease of life, and every heavy article on board was now thrown into the sea still further to postpone the evil hour.

Then came night. No one slept; a keen watch was kept of the progress of the water, and it was resolved that when morning came the vessel should be abandoned.

But with the morning came hope. A vessel was sighted; before long it was evident she saw the signal of distress, and in a few hours those remaining on board were in safety on board her. They were still in sight of their own ship when she sank.

Two days afterwards Marion and Fraser were seated on deck together. They were lovers now, but still they were not so happy as they had been on board the doomed vessel when they thought death was inevitable.

It was clear that Fraser had something on his mind. He took this opportunity of unburdening it.

"Marion," he said, "I want to tell you something and then ask you a question. Don't judge me too quickly. A year ago I thought I was in love with a girl whom you have never seen—Florence Wray. She is in Australia. I had not seen you then. I wrote to her eleven months ago to ask her to be my wife."

Marion started and looked at him intently. She did not say a word.

"Since then I have never heard a word from her. She must have received my letter; the only inference I can draw from her silence is that she does not wish to marry me. I can see now at this distance of time that she was a coquette, and that my affection for her was not founded on real love, but I did not know it then. Even before I saw you I wished I had never written, and felt relieved when mail after mail came in without a letter. I began to hope that after all she had never received mine. However, when I fell in love with you, I did not feel free to confess it. I resolved to wait till I landed at Sydney and discovered for certain that I was at liberty. You know how it was I did not keep my resolution. I have perhaps acted dishonourably; of that you must be the judge. At all events I am bound to tell you the full truth; it is for you to forgive me if you can. I think you will."

"I forgive you," murmured Marion, without looking at him.

"Fully?"

"Yes, fully. It is not your fault, I do not want to be unjust. It is our fate. But oh, how I wish we had never been saved!"

"Don't say that," said Fraser. "There is hope yet that all may turn out right."

"You said you had a question to ask me," said Marion.

"Yes; what do you wish me to do? If you wish me to give up this girl entirely I will do so. I have excuse enough in her silence—at least I could make excuse enough."

"Don't tempt me," burst out Marion. "Do what is right, and for pity's sake don't leave the decision in my hands."

Fraser could not bear to listen further. He began to walk up and down the deck excitedly, cursing the cruel fate which had led him into so terrible a strait. Marion went to her cabin and there gave way to tears.

When they next met it was evident that a decision had been arrived at by both. They said no more to each other on the subject, but Marion felt that Fraser no longer treated her as he had done, and he was conscious that in vain would he look for that glad answering smile which used to greet his.

As day by day went by their constraint increased; they felt that they could not resume their original stand-points, they had stepped over the line which separates companionship from love, and it was impossible to step back. Every time they met was more painful than the last, till finally they almost avoided each other.

Eagerly enough they looked for land. They had been driven out of their course by the storm, and the date of their arrival would be some weeks after the one on which they were due. At last, however, land was sighted early in the morning, and everyone came on deck to see the welcome line of coast.

For some days Marion and Fraser had not met, except when others were present. It would not do, however, to part thus, and Fraser resolved to see her once more, before they quitted the vessel.

Marion, too, seemed to feel that an interview was necessary, however painful it might be.

They retreated to the stern, deserted now by the passengers, eager to see the land grow more distinct as they gazed.

"Marion," said Fraser, "I have not given up hope. You said you forgave me; that must mean that if it should prove I am free, you will still accept me."

"We must not think of it yet," she interposed; "we have no right."

"I must think of it," he said. "Directly we land I shall see you safely to your destination; then I start instantly to find Florence. If you do not hear from me within a fortnight, you must conclude that—that I am not free."

Marion could not speak; she was weeping bitterly.

They were completely hidden from sight of the others. Fraser bent down and kissed her.

"Good-bye, my darling," he whispered. "Forgive me. Whatever happens, remember I love you, and always shall, even if I never see you again."

CHAPTER III.

WHEN Fraser had fulfilled his promise and seen Marion into the hands of her relatives, it struck him that it would only be wise to see his brother before starting to find Florence Wray. He had of course written to his brother immediately on landing, but had not yet seen him. He calculated now, that supposing a letter from Florence had reached Edinburgh after his departure, there would have been ample time for it to have reached the address in Sydney to which he had given directions for all his correspondence to be forwarded. If there should be a letter there refusing his offer of marriage, it would save him a long journey to Brisbane, where Florence lived.

This determination he communicated to Marion, asking for a little more time, and promising to let her hear in any case in the course of a week.

He was heartily welcomed by his brother, but he received his welcome almost without perceiving it. He had a feverish anxiety to know if a letter had arrived for him. His anxiety was soon at rest—there was a letter, and from Florence.

It was an acceptance of his offer of marriage.

The letter fell from his hand. At last he forced himself to read it again, carefully. How stupidly it was expressed! how childish the sentiment! He had been doubtful when he wrote to her whether he was doing a wise thing; now he was sure it was a very foolish one.

The letter was dated six months ago. It had reached Scotland just after he left, and was at once sent on to his brother's, where it had awaited him ever since.

His first duty was to write to Marion. This was a hard task; he tried at first to compose a long letter, but became utterly dissatisfied with it, and tore it up, finally dispatching a broken-hearted half-dozen lines of passionate regret and farewell. He implored her not to reply.

After he had thus cut himself off from all hope of happiness, he, strange to say, began to feel less miserable. He had the satisfaction which came from doing his duty. He knew he had done what Marion wished, and that it would have been impossible to marry her with any hope of happiness unless they had been able to mutually respect each other. And how could she respect him if he broke his direct promise to another?

There was no immediate hurry now to see Florence. He wrote her a letter that evening, into which he put as much of the lover as he could, explaining how it was that her letter had not been answered, and stating that he hoped to start for Brisbane in a couple of days.

That done he gave himself up to assisting his brother, trying to forget in hard work the regrets which filled his heart.

His letter was received by Miss Wray as she was sitting in her room one afternoon. She was a most charming little blonde, with movements suggestive of the love-bird, and caressing little ways which seemed to many men the perfection of womanly attributes. They had seemed so to Fraser till he met Marion.

They had seemed so to many more since then. Eligible and charming young ladies are not so common in Brisbane as in Edinburgh, and had not Fraser's letter, offering her his hand, reached Florence just after her arrival, it is probable that he would have been too late to find her free.

As it was, she sometimes used to think she wished she had not written that unfortunate letter in which she bound herself to a doctor with a limited practice, whilst within the first month after writing it she had received two highly eligible offers, one from a retired sheep-farmer, the other from a rising engineer.

She had delayed answering Fraser's offer for some time, unable to make up her mind. She had received his letter unduly late, owing to her absence on a visit to a friend inland, where postmen are unknown. Still, allowing for delays of this kind, she began to feel that her lover was strangely negligent in not replying at once to her letter, and as day by day went by, and there was still no sign, she began to feel angry, and almost determined that Dick Alport, the engineer, who was the favourite, should be allowed to take the place of the too-apatetic Fraser.

Dick had long ago been told the whole story, and waited with a lover's anxiety to hear of Fraser's arrival. He scanned the lists of passengers with a great deal more interest than did Florence, for he was deeply smitten, and hoped that somehow things would yet turn out right.

Judge, then, his feelings when he one day brought to her the account of the abandonment of Fraser's vessel, with his name amongst the missing.

"I say, Florrie," he began, for he was on very familiar terms with her, "I've got bad news for you."

"You don't look very sad," she replied; "you ought to show some sympathy."

"Perhaps it isn't bad news for me," he said, half-ashamed that he could not pretend to be sorry. "Read this."

He gave her the paper containing the account of the shipwreck, supplied by a passenger on board one of the boats which had been picked up by a mail-vessel, and landed at Sydney nearly a fortnight before the arrival of the sailing-vessel which had rescued Marion and Fraser.

Florrie became very serious. She could not help feeling a sort of relief; but, to do her justice, she was ashamed of the sensation.

"You must go, Dick," she said decisively.

"But, Florrie, can't you say—"

"No, not a word to-night. Don't come near me for two days. I will think it over before then."

When he came back at the appointed time he found Florrie in light mourning, sitting at her work—a rather unusual occupation for her. Dick felt awkward; he did not know if it would be proper for him to broach the subject of his affection so soon after the loss of her accepted lover, though she had hinted to him more than once that it would not break her heart if she never saw Fraser again.

However, he was saved the trouble of deciding what to do. Florrie took it for granted that he was come to renew his proposal, and informed him that he must not do so.

"Perhaps," she said, "Alan is not drowned, he may have been picked up. At any rate, I will not give up all thought of him for a month more, though he has treated me so coldly and cruelly, and never written a word to say whether he has ever received my letter or not. He ought to have written to tell me what vessel he was coming out by; it was disgraceful. But there, I mustn't speak ill of the dead, though he may not be dead for all we know yet."

There was an inconsistency in all this that struck Dick rather forcibly.

"What do you propose?" he asked.

"Yes, I mean to do all the proposing at present," she said with a light laugh, which showed that the news had not taken away her gaiety. "I don't really think there is any chance of ever seeing Alan again, and even if there were he would have to explain his mysterious silence; but yet I am not going to accept you till I have either seen or have heard from him or have heard of his death decisively, or till two months more have passed without hearing. I'm not going to be engaged to two men at once for anyone. So, Dick dear, you must wait, if you think me worth waiting for."

"I'll wait," replied Dick, "though it's very hard lines for a fellow. But you will let me come and see you?"

"Oh yes, as often as you like."

"And you will look upon me as a lover?"

"Well, I can't exactly just yet, you see. But I don't think it will make much difference. We can be friends for a couple of months more."

Dick was obliged to acquiesce, though he managed to reduce the time of probation to six weeks.

This, then, was the state of affairs when Fraser's letter arrived. By this time Florrie had given up all expectation of ever hearing of him again, and had, in spite of her resolution, begun to treat Dick almost as her accepted lover.

Now, however, that the news had come, that he had written as if there were no doubt whatever that they were engaged, she found herself in a painful position.

There was no real doubt in her mind as to what she must do. Dick must be dismissed, and Fraser accepted as her future husband.

The struggle was not a very hard one. She liked Dick more than she did Fraser; but she did not love him with sufficient intensity to make the parting from him wreck her happiness. She was incapable of such strength of affection. She was sorry for him; but, as far as she was concerned, she thought she could be very happy with Fraser, if not so happy as with Dick, who was ready to do anything for her.

Poor Dick did not take his dismissal kindly. He showed more spirit than Florrie had given him credit for, and she wept copiously at seeing his genuine distress. But he was an honourable fellow, and could not deny that Florrie's acceptance of Fraser's offer left her no choice.

"I must see you once more, Florrie," he said as he bade her good-bye. "I can't go away without one more look at you."

"Are you going away?" she asked.

"Yes, I have a chance of an appointment inland. I shall go to-day to see about it, and come back on Saturday to pack up my traps. I can't live here with you in the town."

"But I shall be going away soon."

"Not soon enough for me," said Dick.

CHAPTER IV.

THE meeting between Fraser and Florrie was a strange one. She had of course put away her mourning, and she strove now to put away with it all recollections of the episode with Dick.

Fraser, for his part, tried his best to act as a lover should, but with ill-success. At all events, he failed to please Florrie, and both of them felt that their courtship was not likely to prove a very happy one.

Yet neither would acknowledge as much. Each had made a sacrifice, and that was enough to keep them to their duty. It would have been cowardly to retreat. In this way two or three days passed, till Fraser, in desperation, determined to hurry on the marriage as much as possible, knowing that he would be more able then to accept his fate with equanimity.

With Saturday, Dick came to say good-bye. Fraser was not with Florrie when he arrived, but he entered the room during their interview, and was surprised to find her in tears. She made no effort to conceal them, and when Dick went away she followed him out of the room, coming back a few minutes afterwards with defiance on her features.

"I know what you are going to say," she began, as she entered; "you want to know who that is, and why I was crying. But it's no good your asking, for I sha'n't tell you."

Fraser looked up astonished.

"I was certainly going to ask the cause of your distress," he replied, "but it was only with the intention of alleviating it if I could, not of prying into your private affairs."

This gave a fresh turn to her thoughts.

"Do you mean to say," she exclaimed, "that you don't mind who comes to see me?"

"Of course I am interested in all your friends," was Fraser's reply. He feared he had shown too great indifference.

"Then I will tell you about him, just to show you what I've given up for you. That is Mr. Richard Alport, who is in love with me, and I promised I would marry him after a few months, because everyone supposed you were dead, and now I've had to send him away, and he says he'll die."

A hope sprang up in Fraser's heart. Would it be possible to induce Florrie to act as if he had never come to life again?

"Florrie," he said, "do you love him better than me?"

"I don't know, I'm sure," she replied. "It seems very odd to be talking about it. Do you know, when I thought you were drowned, I thought I liked you best."

"And now that I've come to life, you are not quite sure?"

"I'm quite sure of one thing," said Florrie vehemently: "I should never have told you anything about it if I hadn't thought you would be more thankful for what I've given up for you."

"The chance is lost," thought Fraser. What was he to do now but try to soothe her hurt feelings as much as he could, and assure her he was deeply grateful?

But Florrie did not seem to thaw under his caresses. Suddenly she swung herself free from his hold, and stood poised on one foot before him.

"Alan, tell me one thing—truly, mind. Do you want to marry me or not?"

"Why, Florrie—"

"Yes or no," she demanded impetuously, stamping her foot on the floor. "Never mind, there is no need to answer, I can tell you all about it. You have fallen in love with another woman; if I'm not right never believe a woman again."

Fraser no longer attempted to hide the truth. He told the whole story, excusing his conduct as well as he could.

"Quick!" said Florrie; "run to Mason's Hotel, and tell Dick to come back. He was to start in an hour."

Fraser obeyed, and in a quarter of an hour brought him back puzzled enough at the turn affairs had taken.

Fraser found that whilst he was absent Florrie had had time to write a letter, which she had enclosed in a blank envelope.

"Put her address on that," she said to Fraser, "and post it to-night."

"I think I had better give it her myself," said Fraser; "I'm afraid I am interrupting you here."

"Oh, never mind about that," she said, laughing, "Dick won't be jealous of you now. Dick," she continued, turning to him, "this is the man who was going to make himself miserable by marrying me when he was in love with someone else. That would have been delightful for me, wouldn't it?"

Needless to say, Fraser was in Melbourne again as soon as he could be carried there. He sent a note to Marion, telling her that he would call in an hour, leaving her to draw her own conclusions.

"My darling," he said to her when at last he clasped her in his arms, "I can ask you now to be my wife."

He knew what her answer would be. The love that had been brought to light in the face of death had survived the bitter trial of parting, and now was born anew with tenfold strength.

Florrie's letter was produced in due time, and was couched in terms effectually preventing any possibility of jealousy. She asked Marion's forgiveness for having unintentionally been the means of separating Fraser from some one so much more worthy of him, and expressed a hope that before long she might have the pleasure of seeing them both in Brisbane.

Marion's health became completely re-established in the course of a few months. If it had not, it certainly would not have been the fault of her medical adviser, who was so assiduous in his attentions that he was nearly always in her company, and at last persuaded her to share his home, that he might have her under his immediate care.

At the Sign of The Golden Bulrush.

ONE autumn morning at some two hundred doors in and about the good old town of Northport, were delivered as many quaintly folded and directed envelopes, each stamped with a golden bulrush. The two hundred doors included those of all the nobility, gentry, and leaders of society known to Northport, and the contents of the envelopes afforded matter for much conversation.

It was only a milliner's circular, after all, though Mistress Ellenore Vance had caused it to be printed in antique type, on rough paper, with uncut margins, and with a Shakesperian motto at the top:

"This dothe fyttte ye tyme."

We are writing of the dark days before anybody's house or garments wanted to be mediæval, or Tudor, or Queen Anne, or anything but nineteenth-century English. The cult of the sunflower was undeveloped. Bulrushes and peacock's-feathers could be had for the picking up, and "Patience" was not yet in rehearsal.

The æsthetic revival had certainly commenced, and rumours thereof had penetrated to Northport, the city of full purses and fair women, that prides itself on being a good six months ahead of most of creation, and Mistress Ellenore's quaint notice was studied, wondered at, doubtfully admired, but read—a result foreseen by the knowing little woman, hitherto known as Madame Hélène, of Upper Street, Islington.

She had carefully reconnoitred Northport, noted her most formidable rival's gorgeous establishment with its plate-glass frontage, "Modes de Paris," and gold-lettered announcements in the choicest milliner's French, and had justly decided that her only hope lay in a line of her own. She would have issued her circular in Japanese had any Northport printer been able to do it for her, for she had inlaid cabinets, dragon china, and Nankin blue, ivory fans, and embroidered crapes and silk to dispose of as well as art-millinery.

Failing this, she fell back on old English, as best suiting her Chippendale chairs, and old Liverpool teapots, and other treasures which had come to her with the dingy old house in Great Clive Street, where her venture was to be made.

"At the Sign of the Golden Bulrush, No. 29? Why, that was one of old Jacob Steffox's houses, was it not?" people observed. "Who came in for the property? Does anybody know?"

Mistress Ellenore Vance knew quite well. The great red-brick corner house, stuffed full of odds and ends of furniture of the fashion of a generation long past, had fallen to her lot as the only surviving child of old Jacob's niece, Prudence Borth, with two thousand pounds, free of legacy duty—a godsend indeed to the poor, hard-working little woman, fighting the world desperately for bread-and-cheese, clothes and schooling, for her six little children, and hampered by handsome, useless Tom Vance, who was always getting fitted out, and started in life, expensively, somewhere or other, and coming back—first-class, and smoking a ninepenny havannah—utterly destitute, through no fault of his own, to live on the profits of his wife's poor little shop till another opening could be found for him.

He was now in a diplomatic appointment; i.e. second clerk in the British consulate at Santa Fé, Republic of Rio Palmas, and having prospered exceedingly by his own account for at least two months, his return, according to all previous experience, would soon fall due.

Hence Mrs. Vance felt there was little time to be lost in investing her windfall. She arrived in Northport at five o'clock one morning, had knocked up the house-agent and ransacked the place from garret to cellar by breakfast-time; interviewed builders, decorators, a marine-store dealer, and her late uncle's solicitor before dinner; designed her circulars in an interval of repose, walked "down town" with them to the printers, looking about her, and taking the measure of the place, her possible rivals, and her future customers, with considerable exactness. The marine-store dealer's cart was at the door by her return. Rubbish was sorted out, paid for, and carted off with a smartness that took away the breath of the caretaker she had installed.

Stacks of genuine Chippendale furniture, hoards of old cut-glass and china, and treasures of brass work, were put in safe keeping, and the whole place left clear for the operations of the workmen next morning, before the energetic little lady, with a satisfied mind and aching bones, took her place in the corner of the third-class carriage in which she designed to spend the night, as well to save hotel bills as to be on the spot to set the apprentices to work by six o'clock next morning.

She rolled herself up snugly in her wraps, and resolved to sleep, but in vain. The details of her arrangements persisted in repeating themselves to her, over and over, till she grew sick of them. Then all sorts of possible calamities took it in turn to suggest themselves. Even some mistrust about the reality of her own legacy arose to vex her, though that was safe and sure as Messrs. Faucit and Fulwort, the great Northport solicitors, could make it.

She had been honoured by the personal attention of the senior partner to her enquiries that very morning. He had been her great-uncle's friend through life, and in his hands was left the management of the great Stelfox property. Old Jacob had died rich—rich beyond even Northport imaginings; the executors had no light task before them. Money had rolled in upon the old man all the years of his life, he hardly knew how. Northport stories of his luck, his obstinacy, his penuriousness, his dogged, unforgiving nature, were endless, and as true as popular legends generally are. He was hardly to be called a miser, for though his personal needs were small, he gave handsomely to the principal local charities, and dying, had left the bulk of his property to carry out a well-devised scheme for the benefit of the seafaring population of his native town. His oddities were many, but only the natural results of living all to himself, out beyond his own generation, far into the next one. He had made equitable distribution of part of his wealth amongst his own and his late wife's kinsfolk, with strict regard to nearness of relationship. The house, Mr. Faucit explained, had been left to Mrs. Vance as actually his nearest-of-kin, not, as she had fancied, from some old partiality for her mother.

"Not at all, my dear madam," the courteous old lawyer had declared; "had there been ten descendants with the same claim, each of the ten would have been as liberally dealt with—of course at the expense of the Merchant Seamen's Home Fund."

Mrs. Vance became suddenly depressed in spirits by this assurance, and still more so by Mr. Faucit's last words.

"It was a curious fancy of my late lamented friend and client, though he never entered into any personal communication that he could help with his relations, to keep a close watch on them all. He used to surprise me, I assure you, by his intimate knowledge of their modes of life, private affairs, and little peculiarities. I never discovered how it was acquired. He had his ways and means."

The thought of the unseen watch which had been kept over her for years past, gave the poor lady a creepy feeling, which stuck to her all day and night. In every disturbed snatch of slumber, the figure of old Jacob Stelfox, in his snuff-coloured suit, with brass buttons and gaiters, seemed to peep and pry at her from dark corners of the carriage, pointing at her with his great gold-headed Malacca cane, or now and then resting the point of a shrivelled forefinger inquisitively on her breast, where it left a load that grew heavier and heavier, till she woke in the struggles of nightmare.

All these evil forebodings fled with the dawn, and for the next few weeks affairs went prosperously. A good purchaser was found for the Islington business. The children and apprentices were disposed of till all was ready for their reception in Northport, and Mrs. Vance and Nessie got off at last with their big cases the very day before the opening of The Golden Bulrush was to take place.

"Nessie" was—it is difficult to define what—not an apprentice, for Mrs. Vance received no money with her; not a servant, for she certainly received none from Mrs. Vance; still, an important member of the Vance household.

All that was generally known was that a little, lean, dark-eyed slip of a girl was one day introduced to the Vance family some years ago; that she fed at the mistress's table, but scrubbed and slaved, and ran errands, and minded the baby like any other maid-of-all-work; that in time she developed into "Miss Halliday," a tall, graceful young lass, with a bright decided manner, and a face, complexion, and general air of distinction that made her a show-room treasure.

Madame never had ill-treated her at the worst of times; if Nessie worked hard, she herself worked harder. Of all the small indulgences that she ever permitted herself, a bountiful share was accorded to Nessie. No one was ever permitted to treat her with disrespect, nor was she ever allowed to go out with the perambulator or sit in the kitchen. Now and then came days of plenty. A good wedding or death—the latter by preference—amongst the clients of the little shop, and madame would signalise the windfall by buying Nessie a gown or taking her to the theatre; for all of which Nessie adored her, waited on her and the children hand and foot, and worked her hardest in the house and the shop, of which last, indeed, her bright wits and quick fingers were the mainstay, and believed in "Aunt Elly's" goodness with all her might. She almost shrieked with delight when the railway omnibus deposited them at the door of their new home.

Great Clive Street was once the most aristocratic quarter of Northport, but its day is gone, and its merchant princes fled, to villa residences up the river-side, or mansions in the great parks without the city. One end still maintains its dignity. Carriages may yet there be seen, congregating before the door of a fashionable physician or a popular dentist, but the exclusiveness of the other end has totally departed. Trade has crept in, be leases never so stringent. A well-known pastrycook evasively displays his brass plate on an inner green-baize door and lets a monster wedding-cake appear between the dining-room window-curtains; and some art metal-workers have made their balconies and area-railings as flagrant an advertisement as they dared, but Mistress Ellenore's audacity went far beyond all this.

Her bricks were newly-pointed and blushing their ruddiest; big windows with latticed panes and stained glass had been broken out on the ground and first floors, and the great stucco portico had somehow given place to a timbered erection with a red and blue legend running around it, and a golden bulrush suspended above. The legacy had been deeply dipped into, but Nessie declared the result to be worth its cost many times told.

The lower rooms were to be work-rooms, with an office for Mrs. Vance, the first-floor show-rooms, and the floors above living rooms. There was a generous amount of space in the great corner house; wide staircases, and spacious landings, airy garrets for children and apprentices, and vast unfathomed vaults of kitchen and cellars.

Nessie danced all over it, exclaiming, approving, and suggesting, till she stopped, fairly transfixed at the sight of the little room destined for herself—the only one on which paint and decoration, not actually necessary, had been expended.

It was an ideal girl's chamber, all white and soft green. Daisies on the chintz, lace curtains, white wood furniture, a big toilet-glass, and a pretty book-shelf.

"Auntie darling! you must have been mad to do it," she gasped at last.

"I knew extra furniture would be wanted, and I decided it should be for your room," Mrs. Vance answered in a dry repressed tone. "You must not have the children at night any more now; I can take both little ones now that I have room."

"That you don't," Nessie declared. "If I sleep here, so shall Toosy, that's decided."

Mrs. Vance looked wistfully at the girl for a moment.

"I have always done my best for you, haven't I, Nessie? If—if this house were yours—your own——"

She faltered.

"I should go and clear those workmen out of the show-room at once," Nessie ended promptly. "It will never be scoured down in time if we don't."

Trampling of feet and tapping of hammers were still audible, though, according to agreement, the last man should have been off the premises two days ago.

"I can't help it," the foreman declared; "I never see such a job. Seems as if we was overlooked, it do," and he spat softly to avert the omen. "Half-a-dozen of paper short at the last moment, and no matching it, and Bill Handyside, our best hand, tumbles off a ladder and puts his shoulder out, besides knocking up a can of linseed-oil slap up against that dado; and paste don't seem to hold, nor colour to set, nor even nails to be druv', as one had a right to expect them to. Seems like as it were a bewitched job, it do," grumbled the injured tradesman.

Mrs. Vance made short work of him, and cleared him and his men out, and had the charwomen in in no time, while she and Nessie unpacked, and dusted, and arranged, not only all day, but all night as well, till by ten o'clock on the fateful morning, all was in review order, and The Golden Bulrush open to the public.

Nessie, tired as she was, had revelled in her work, laying down the Persian rugs in the long show-room, draping its artistic tapestries, disposing the quaint old cabinets and tall chairs, the carved chests and china vases, to the best advantage. One huge recess at the end was fitted with a great gilded console-table, and a mirror above reaching to the ceiling.

"I know that's an abomination in your sight, Nessie," Mistress Ellenore said, laughing; "you'd like to smother it with little shelves across it, and blue teacups. I can't understand the artistic objection to a decent reflection of oneself. It's far more interesting to a woman than all the china that ever was baked."

So Nessie had to content herself with screening the obnoxious sheet of quicksilver as she best could with tall jars and gold-tipped bulrushes, and veiling its gilded abortion of a leg with the gorgeous folds of a Delhi scarf.

"Any woman might enjoy seeing herself with such a background," she pronounced, studying the carefully-chosen tints of the walls approvingly, "and any gown will look right seen against it."

But, in truth, Mrs. Vance's wares could stand on their own merits.

Nessie was clad in softly-draped sad-coloured stuff, with some telling points of dead-gold here and there.

"I don't want you to be a mere black silk lay-figure," Mrs. Vance had said. "I want you to show how any colour can be worn becomingly."

She herself was gorgeous in lustrous satin, combining the very latest fashion with some quaint suggestion of coif and kirtle, and the two made a very pretty picture in the mirror when she came softly behind and kissed Nessie's pretty ear.

"And any room or gown would look right with someone I know in it, and I only hope some of these fine young merchant-princes may come along and see it for himself, and give me the chance, for once in my life, of making a perfect wedding-dress, and — who knows? — perhaps a Court dress to follow."

"Oh, auntie!" Nessie was laughingly protesting, when she stopped amazed.

Mrs. Vance's jaw had fallen, her eyes stared wildly, she clutched Nessie's shoulder with a trembling hand, pointing with the other to the mirror.

"Who passed there just now?" she asked at last under her breath.

"Nobody, dear. You are dizzy with over-work. Let me get you some wine."

"No, no!" Mrs. Vance shook her head, rubbed her eyes, and looked furtively around. "The shadows — that glass — distorted reflections, I think," she murmured confusedly; and just then all colloquy was stopped, for the little boy in flat cap and stamped leather jerkin, who waited in the hall, flung the door open magnificently wide and ushered in the first customers.

No merchant-prince came along that day; nevertheless, it was exceptionally prosperous. The "Stelfox luck" seemed to cling about the place still. It was the dull season just before the beginning of the winter festivities, and the Northport ladies, dowered as a rule with much spare cash and more spare time, were ready to receive any novelty graciously. Mistress Ellenoure was amusing, insinuating, and fair dealing, and Nessie the most charming lay-figure for the exhibition of new and dainty devices. When evening came it was with a triumphant heart that Nessie cleared the rooms, looked half-appalled at the order-book, wrote a telegram to bring down apprentices and assistants by the first train, and then betook herself to the office to count the money, while Mrs. Vance tossed up something hot for supper in the kitchen, having dismissed the charwoman for the night.

"We must look out for extra hands if this goes on, auntie. You'll make your fortune in six months at this rate."

"Our fortune," corrected Mrs. Vance. "Yours as well as mine, I hope."

"What pretty women they have here," Nessie went on enthusiastically, "it's a pleasure to work for them; but oh, auntie, what a millennium it would be if, instead of being dressed by the dozen, all more or less alike, each woman would earnestly study and work out, once for all, her own fashion of dress, made in the richest, most lasting stuff she can rightly afford, and only modified by the season or advancing years."

"Supposing she hadn't brains enough?" objected Mistress Ellenoure.

"Then let her pay me, or some other discreet and worthy artist, to do it for her."

"Then think how bad for trade; nothing would be discarded before it was worn out."

"Think of the women who would go through life trying in vain to discover what their style really was. There'd be change enough in the world, Aunt Elly."

Here a terrific yawn interrupted the discussion, and by mutual consent both moved off to bed, early as it was. Nessie found herself too over-tired and excited to think of sleep when she got upstairs. She was still brushing out her dark curly locks, at her pretty dressing-table, when she heard a voice calling below, "Nessie! Nessie!" in suppressed tones of fear. She ran down to the first landing, where stood Mrs. Vance in her dressing-gown, lamp in hand, listening at the show-room door.

"Nessie, didn't you make all safe here?"

Nessie nodded. "Fastened the windows, barred the shutters, put out the gas, locked the door, and gave the key to you," she replied promptly.

"There's someone in there now," Mrs. Vance whispered impressively; "someone walking up and down with an irregular, limping step. I heard it, and the tap of a stick on the floor. It stopped when you came."

"Thieves! And we are all alone in the house!"

"Of course it is. That seed-pearl embroidery is worth fifty guineas, and that Point de Venise flounce five times as much. I'm not afraid. We must catch them. Run and find the key. It's hanging up in the pocket of my gown."

Nessie obeyed softly, and returned to find her aunt still on the watch, armed with the largest carver and the dinner-bell.

"There, Nessie, stand at the landing-window, and when I give the signal you rouse the neighbourhood. Don't be too precipitate, though, it may be cats."

Nessie inclined to that opinion, but wasted no time in discussion. She posted herself as desired, bell in hand, while Mrs. Vance, turning the key gently, suddenly flung open the door and marched to the attack, lamp in one hand, bare blade in the other. There was an awful portentous silence after she disappeared. Nessie waited breathless, all ears for the signal, in vain.

"N—N—Nessie, hel—l—p!" came a faint strangled cry in her aunt's voice, that sounded as if shaken out of her.

Nessie flew to the rescue.

On an ottoman in front of the big mirror sat Mrs. Vance, all limp and dishevelled, her eyes fixed blankly on its dusky depths, her lamp toppling over on a neighbouring chair, and the carving-knife dangling feebly from her nerveless clasp.

Nessie rushed at her and caught the lamp, then gazed all around in consternation.

The empty blocks and wire-frames had the room to themselves apparently. She peered cautiously round the tall cabinets, behind the curtains, and under the tables. Nothing, nobody there. Then, bolder grown, she struck a match and set all the lights of the old-fashioned gaseliers ablazing. The large doors between that room and the next were securely fastened inside. Nessie tried all the windows, looked in all the ottomans, and returned to her aunt fairly bewildered.

"Did you see anything? Why did you call 'help'?" she asked at last.

Mrs. Vance only moaned.

"I feel as if I were pinched black and blue," she complained presently; "look at my shoulders."

Nessie did look, but seeing no trace of ill-usage, wrapped her up warmly again, and suggested that they should go to bed.

"Over-work, poor dear thing," was the girl's mental conclusion as Mrs. Vance staggered to her feet, and holding very tight to her, made her shaky way back to her room.

She refused Nessie's offer of companionship for the night, and with a hurried farewell, locked and bolted herself in.

Nessie tossed and tumbled under her lace-trimmed counterpane for a little, wondering what she should do if Aunt Elly's wits really were to give way, but weariness soon got the better of her anxieties, and she woke next morning to find Mistress Ellenoure fresh, brisk, and business-like as ever. A new servant was coming in, and the apprentices, under charge of her old forewoman, would be down by noon, and must be set to work at once.

"How did you sleep?" she found time to ask Nessie.

"Very well, indeed, till morning, when I was horribly bothered by a dream visitor."

"What? The merchant-prince?"

"I'm sure I hope not. He was a grey, wizened, ever-so-old, little man in a snuff-coloured suit with bright buttons, and a huge bandage of a white-silk neckcloth, who came limping in, leaning on a gold-knobbed cane."

"How alarming!" said Mrs. Vance with a forced little laugh.

"Not at all. He smiled most benignantly on me, only persisted in urging me to get up and come away with him, which I felt cruel on his part, when I was so dead sleepy. He was becoming very imperative, indeed, when I suddenly awoke. He was just what I always fancied old Mr. Stelfox to be. Was he anything like him?"

"No. Oh dear no! Why, Uncle Jacob was quite another sort of man; with a grey beard and a fine white head, you know;" and Mistress Ellenoure hastily measured and snipped off some Turkish embroidery, three-quarters of a yard too short, and hurried away.

The red gown that Nessie donned for business hours was a novelty in those days, cruelly trying to any but the possessor of her lily and rose tints, but admirably chosen to show off Mrs. Vance's last consignments of Spanish laces. She had Algerine embroideries, too, and soft creamy Indian silks, and Nessie was kept exhibiting mantles, and flounces, and all the rest of it, till she almost grew sick of her own pretty reflection in the big mirror.

Mrs. Vance kept persistently away from that end of the room, only coming near her three times, and each time making some unwonted and astonishing blunder. She declared herself sold out of hand-painted satins, with a boxful at her elbow; and when Mrs. Towerdale, the great leader of Northport taste, was in the very middle of an order, actually turned off and hurried away, knocking down and treading on the precious pearl embroidery, to attend to a perfectly insignificant new comer.

The great lady stared in some surprise, but her friend, whom Nessie was serving, turned vivaciously from the glass to her:

"Oh, do look! Who was that who passed just now?"

"I saw nobody," said Mrs. Towerdale icily, while Nessie, in despair at her aunt's blunder, hurriedly brought forth the great treasure of the house—a portfolio, with sketches of costume by a distinguished R.A., obtained Mrs. Vance only knew how, and with a dexterous show of semi-confidence, exhibited one or two.

"I could have sworn to him," the lady declared, "just the old, bandy, snuff-coloured legs and gaiters, and his queer little monkey-face looking over that great poultice of a white bandanna round his throat. Where can he have gone?"

Nessie nearly let fall the drawing which Mrs. Towerdale was graciously levelling her eye-glass at, in her amaze at hearing her last night's visitor described so exactly.

"You mean old Jacob Stelfox?" asked a third lady, joining the group. "I was thinking of him just now. I used to come here with my husband very often once. Dear me! it almost made me shiver to fancy I heard the tapping of his big cane, and his halting footstep! He lived in these rooms, you know, at last, and all the exercise he took was to hop up and down, and in and out."

"Of course, the idea must be carefully carried out in the other details of the costume," Mrs. Towerdale was prosing on impressively, and Nessie could listen no more to the other conversation.

Her poor little head felt utterly dazed with all she had to speculate on. How could she have come to dream of old Jacob, and why should Mrs. Vance have tried to deceive her?

The day drew to its close, again a prosperous one; so prosperous that Nessie could hardly marvel at Mistress Ellenore's unusual high spirits and talkativeness.

They sat down to supper, a well-served meal this night, with actually a bottle of champagne between them, of which all but Nessie's one modest glass fell to Mrs. Vance's share. She grew extravagantly affectionate and laudatory, predicted the advent of the merchant-prince more confidently than ever, drew fantastic pictures of their future prosperity, and ended by sending Nessie to bed early, and declaring her intention of sitting up all night, if need be, preparing work for the next day.

Nessie departed, not unwillingly, but before half her night's rest was over, started up, as she fancied, broad awake. The light of a street-lamp shone on her white blind, and dark against it was the outline of a man's figure, an old man, bent and halting, who with raised forefinger beckoned impatiently to her.

She rose, or thought she did, and reluctantly followed as he slowly limped before her out of the room, and down the staircase to the next landing. It was brilliantly lighted, and crouching all scared and white at the closed door of the show-room was Aunt Elly, clutching fast the key.

The old man made a stern gesture of command that she should open it forthwith. She hesitated with imploring looks and words that Nessie could not hear. The old man's brows knit ominously, he made one angry stride forward, his heavy stick raised to strike, when Nessie, flinging herself desperately between them, was grasped and held fast in Mrs. Vance's arms—and woke.

"My dear! What have you been dreaming of? I heard you stirring, and ran downstairs just in time to turn up the gas and catch you."

"Was I walking in my sleep?" asked Nessie confusedly. "Where's the old man? Did he hurt you?"

Mrs. Vance grew white to the lips, and glanced furtively around with terrified eyes.

"Don't, dear. Don't think any more of it. There, come upstairs again, and I'll lie down beside you."

Nessie followed her, half ashamed, and the rest of the night passed quietly.

Next day brought business brisk enough to wipe out the memory of the night's scare from the mind of one of the women at least. A great fancy ball was in contemplation, and the Northport mind was greatly exercised on the question of costume. Mistress Ellenore threw herself into the subject con amore, and surpassed herself in fertility of suggestion and boldness of artistic design.

Nessie wondered and admired, and wondered more when now and then she caught her sunk in fits of gloomy brooding or listened to some miserable nervous outbreak most unlike Mrs. Vance's usual happy, well-controlled temper. It suddenly occurred to her that the Rio Palmas mail might have come in and brought the usual tidings of invincible bad fortune and demand for supplies. Still, orders were pouring in, the great half-furnished resonant rooms above were buzzing like a hive with the whirr of sewing-machines, the click of scissors, and the rustle of endless yards of costly fabrics; sales, and for ready cash, had been going on all day long, and, if the worst came to the worst, The Golden Bulrush might afford Mr. Tom Vance another start in life. Nessie tried to hint as much that same evening, but her aunt almost repulsed her.

"You don't know what you are talking about. Tom would never be so mean as to take our earnings from us. It would be robbery. Do you really think he might come home and take all this?" with a sudden look of terror; "it is mine, you know, not his at all. What will become of us if he does?"

"Auntie dearest, you are simply killing yourself with anxieties. Don't invent a new one. You haven't had a decent night's rest since we came here either. It is your turn to sleep to-night. I don't mean to close an eye till those rosebuds are on Mrs. Towerdale's train, so I shall sit by you to-night."

Half ungraciously Mrs. Vance let herself be led away, suffering the girl's tender service and caresses with a sullen stupefied air. Her eyes closed as her head touched the pillow, and she fell sound asleep holding Nessie's hand. When her clasp relaxed, Nessie softly unfolded her work, and by the light of her carefully-shaded candle began to adjust her rose-sprays on her velvet, a difficult and dainty piece of work which absorbed her entirely for some hours.

Suddenly she lifted her head. The house had been profoundly still, only Mrs. Vance's regular breathing breaking the silence. Now in the distance she heard a soft but distinct and measured sound, growing nearer and nearer—a halting footstep on the stairs. She listened breathlessly as it came closer step by step. She knew when it reached the landing and paused, as an old man would to rest, then came steadily onward till it stopped at the bedroom-door. The handle turned softly but decidedly, and the door moved inwards till it disclosed the figure that Nessie knew must be there—the little, bent, snuff-brown form of old Jacob Stelfox. His eyebrows were knit as he gazed in on them, and he raised a hand in menace.

Mrs. Vance tossed, and moaned, and started up, and Nessie, flinging a protecting arm round her shoulders, and feeling braver than she imagined possible, gazed firmly on the wizened old face that advanced out of the darkness till it glared over the foot of the bed on them. He beckoned as he had done before and turned away, while Mrs. Vance struggled away from Nessie, and attempted to get out of bed. There was something in her face that made Nessie dread either to wake or to try to stop her. So she slipped on her shoes and rolled a shawl round her. Then, one waking, one sleeping, the two women followed step by step the shadowy, limping figure that led them down the great staircase to the door at its foot. It was open. A cold, unearthly, greenish light seemed to emanate from the mirror, rendering visible the table in front, and dimly the surrounding objects. If grew stronger and clearer as the old man approached, and seemed to concentrate itself on him as he turned and faced them with bright, angry eyes.

Mrs. Vance slipped suddenly from Nessie's supporting clasp, stumbling blindly forward with outstretched arms till she fell on her knees at his feet. Again he raised his hand solemnly, his frown grew deeper, rays of fierce light seemed to dart from his eyes and transfix the kneeling suppliant before him. She writhed in dumb appeal, and at last broke forth in strangled sobbing tones:

"What have I done? What harm to you or her? Nessie! Save me! save me from him!"

But Nessie stood powerless, spell-bound.

"Why do you torment me? Did I ever ask for your house or money? Haven't I been an honest, hard-working woman all my life, and as good to Nessie as if she had been my own child? Don't! don't! Your eyes scorch me! Go away! go away!" she moaned, grovelling at the spectre's feet. "What if Nessie was your nearest-of-kin? How did I know you ever cared to hear of her? You all disowned and cast off her mother when she ran away with young Ned Halliday (I was the only one to stand up for poor Aunt Hester then), and you never cared to enquire what became of them. How could I risk a quarrel with you? I had the children to think of. If I have done wrong, it was for them. Take your money away again, ruin us if you will, but leave me."

Still the grim old face scowled menacingly down on the poor terrified creature; but as Nessie listened a flood of generous wrath seemed to rise hot and strong in her heart. With a desperate effort she burst from the spell that held her, and rushed forward.

"You wicked old man!" she cried, transported with indignation. "You mean, wrong-headed old spectre! Go away at once to your grave, or wherever you came from! What business have you here at all? This isn't your house now. It belongs to someone who will make a better use of it than you ever did. And frighten her out of it you shall not!"

Nessie spoke in a perfect torrent of wrath, that swept away all terror of the apparition, who seemed to listen with a ghastly sneer in his cold gleaming eyes.

"So you threw off my mother? Left her and me to Aunt Elly's charity, and now you want to put things straight again, as you fancy. What do you mean to do? What do all you ghosts expect to do? You can haunt the house and drive Aunt Ellenore out of it, but you can't put anyone else in."

The phantom still listened with a sideway turn of the head, and a malicious smile wreathing his sunken lips. He laid his hand impressively on the marble table, and nodded meaningly.

Nessie defiantly swept up to him and examined the spot from which he withdrew his hand, above and below. She had dusted it often enough to know it well—the gilded garland of a frame, the impossible lion's leg beneath. The slab was marble, the garland wood and plaster, the leg wood and iron, just like a hundred others of the period.

Still, urged by that mocking smile, she tried again. Resting on the edge, she felt the slab move slightly. She pressed a little, and the whole slab slid back into some recess of the wall, leaving the frame exposed, and in the frame a secret receptacle.

Three or four dusty blue envelopes lay in it. The top one was closed and sealed. She lifted it gingerly with her finger-tips, and blowing the dust away from its address, read by the light of that weird unnatural radiance that flashed up as if in triumph:

"This codicil to my will of 1866 is to be delivered, after my death, to Messrs. Faucit and Fulworth.

"(Signed) JACOB STELFOX."

Nessie tore it open, in obedience to a gesture of the apparition's. The long-folded blue paper crackled apart reluctantly. The writing inside was fair and plain. The meaning of all the dry lengthy phrases seemed to start out clear before her in sudden vividness.

It was in the hand of old Jacob himself, in as spiteful terms as were consistent with perfect legality, and to the following purport:

That his niece, Ellenore Vance, having for purposes of her own concealed from him the existence of a daughter of his youngest sister, Hester, and Edward Halliday, to mark his disapproval of her unworthy conduct, he proceeded to cancel all previous bequests in her favour, and to bequeath all that he had originally bequeathed to her to the aforesaid daughter, etc., etc.

Nessie read, and turned a gaze of scorn on the mocking phantom. "So that was to be Aunt Elly's reward for loving and caring for me! Why didn't you do it yourself, instead of hoarding up spite against her all these years? I suppose this thing is legal," examining the document with utter repulsion, "and no lawyer can upset it." Old Jacob grinned confidently. "Then I can!" and the paper was contemptuously scattered at his feet in a dozen fragments. "As if flesh and blood could not get the better of any ghost that ever walked!"

The little grey ghost's hands were raised in trembling horror, and his chin sank suddenly forward on his white neckcloth. Nessie pursued her advantage mercilessly.

"Oh, I've no doubt you are hugging to yourself the thought of what a good exemplary benefactor to mankind you are; of all you have done for your family, and the blessing you are going to be to your native town. You foolish old man! It isn't your money now that is doing anything. No one owes you a grateful thought for it. It isn't the people you benefit when you are dead that are taken into account; it is those you did no good to when you were alive that are counted up against you."

The poor old figure seemed to shrink under her bright indignant gaze and fade fainter and fainter.

Nessie felt quite mollified towards it.

"I'll try and think as kindly as I can of you, but you must see how Aunt Elly's living love and care have been more to me than all you could ever do for me. You had better go. You have no part in our lives, and you can but trouble them. You can do no good in the world any more. Good-bye—good-bye."

There was but a little cloud of snuff-coloured mist left by this time. The weird cold light in the mirror was waxing low. On the floor lay Mrs. Vance, a motionless heap of white drapery.

A chill crept to the marrow of Nessie's bones as for one instant a cold trembling hand seemed to be laid on her downbent head, and an icy sigh, like a breath from a snow-cloud, breathed over her "Farewell," and all was darkness.

Mrs. Vance woke next morning to find herself snug in bed, after a long dreamless night. There was a smell of smouldering paper and a little pile of blackened fragments in the grate, a candle guttered to its death in a smoky socket, and in her chair beside the table slept Nessie, quietly and peacefully as a child, the last rosebud hanging by the last needleful of silver thread to the blue velvet train in her lap.

Her pretty lips parted with a smile, her long curly lashes quivered asunder.

"Something has happened," she cried, starting up broad awake. "What is it?"

Mistress Ellenore knit her brows distressfully.

"I can't recall it, Nessie. Have we both been dreaming?"

"I don't know."

"I don't know."

"Then nobody knows, unless perhaps old Jacob Stelfox."

Then with a kiss and a laugh they forgot the subject.

Nessie has never found her merchant-prince, which is the less to be regretted in that she infinitely prefers the handsome junior partner in the art metal-works opposite. She is as happy a wife as Mrs. Vance a widow, fascinating Tom Vance having ended his days characteristically in the last revolution in Rio Palmas six months before the marriage.

Having, with his usual frank affability, promised the support of the British Government unreservedly to both parties, he was incontinently shot in the market-place of Santa Fé by the first which found him out.

Mrs. Vance mourned him as a martyred patriot, but, relieved from the burden of his existence, prospers exceedingly in a gorgeous plate-glass emporium of her own nowadays.

"My dear," she said to Nessie on her wedding-day, "never despise riches. They have brought me a clear conscience at last. I dared not give up my rightful inheritance before, though I always felt it should have been yours. Now, dearest, take it with my love as your wedding-present."

She laid a mighty bundle in Nessie's hands as she spoke—the title-deeds of The Golden Bulrush.

There is music of children's voices, and patter of tiny feet up and down the solemn old dwelling, and Nessie's bright presence makes sunshine there all day long.

The dim old mirror still holds its place, but no one guesses how, when the evening shadows fall, a grey wistful face peers from out its misty depths, and a yearning sigh for life and opportunity long gone by floats sadly echoing through the deserted rooms.

HOUSEHOLD WORDS,

EDITED BY CHARLES DICKENS,

Is Published Every Wednesday, Price ONE PENNY; also in Monthly Parts, Price SIXPENCE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY,

BY THE AUTHOR OF "FRAGOLETTA," "DAME DURDEN," Etc.,

WILL BE COMMENCED EARLY IN JANUARY, 1884.

THE FIFTH VOLUME of HOUSEHOLD WORDS, containing Nos. 106 to 131, bound in Cloth, and uniform with Vols. I., II., III., and IV., is now ready, price 4s. 6d. Also Binding Cases (including Title and Index), price 1s. 6d. Title and Index may be obtained separately, price 1d.

All back Numbers, Parts, Quarterly Divisions, and Volumes, also the Extra Numbers, are in print, and may be had by ordering from any Bookseller, Newsagent, or Railway Bookstall.

All applications for Advertisements to be addressed to Mr. J. SMITH, 24, Great New Street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

JUN 24 1940

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY LIBRARIES

0315318532

"Any woman might enjoy seeing herself with such a background," she pronounced, studying the carefully-chosen tints of the walls approvingly, "and any gown will look right seen against it."

But, in truth, Mrs. Vance's wares could stand on their own merits.

Nessie was clad in softly-draped sad-coloured stuff, with some telling points of dead-gold here and there.

"I don't want you to be a mere black silk lay-figure," Mrs. Vance had said. "I want you to show how any colour can be worn becomingly."

She herself was gorgeous in lustrous satin, combining the very latest fashion with some quaint suggestion of coif and kirtle, and the two made a very pretty picture in the mirror when she came softly behind and kissed Nessie's pretty ear.

"And any room or gown would look right with someone I know in it, and I only hope some of these fine young merchant-princes may come along and see it for himself, and give me the chance, for once in my life, of making a perfect wedding-dress, and—who knows?—perhaps a Court dress to follow."

"Oh, auntie!" Nessie was laughingly protesting, when she stopped amazed.

Mrs. Vance's jaw had fallen, her eyes stared wildly, she clutched Nessie's shoulder with a trembling hand, pointing with the other to the mirror.

"Who passed there just now?" she asked at last under her breath.

"Nobody, dear. You are dizzy with over-work. Let me get you some wine."

"No, no!" Mrs. Vance shook her head, rubbed her eyes, and looked furtively around. "The shadows—that glass—distorted reflections, I think," she murmured confusedly; and just then all colloquy was stopped, for the little boy in flat cap and stamped leather jerkin, who waited in the hall, flung the door open magnificently wide and ushered in the first customers.

No merchant-prince came along that day; nevertheless, it was exceptionally prosperous. The "Stelfox luck" seemed to cling about the place still. It was the dull season just before the beginning of the winter festivities, and the Northport ladies, dowered as a rule with much spare cash and more spare time, were ready to receive any novelty graciously. Mistress Ellenoure was amusing, insinuating, and fair dealing, and Nessie the most charming lay-figure for the exhibition of new and dainty devices. When evening came it was with a triumphant heart that Nessie cleared the rooms, looked half-appalled at the order-book, wrote a telegram to bring down apprentices and assistants by the first train, and then betook herself to the office to count the money, while Mrs. Vance tossed up something hot for supper in the kitchen, having dismissed the charwoman for the night.

"We must look out for extra hands if this goes on, auntie. You'll make your fortune in six months at this rate."

"Our fortune," corrected Mrs. Vance. "Yours as well as mine, I hope."

"What pretty women they have here," Nessie went on enthusiastically, "it's a pleasure to work for them; but oh, auntie, what a millennium it would be if, instead of being dressed by the dozen, all more or less alike, each woman would earnestly study and work out, once for all, her own fashion of dress, made in the richest, most lasting stuff she can rightly afford, and only modified by the season or advancing years."

"Supposing she hadn't brains enough?" objected Mistress Ellenoure.

"Then let her pay me, or some other discreet and worthy artist, to do it for her."

"Then think how bad for trade; nothing would be discarded before it was worn out."

"Think of the women who would go through life trying in vain to discover what their style really was. There'd be change enough in the world, Aunt Elly."

Here a terrific yawn interrupted the discussion, and by mutual consent both moved off to bed, early as it was. Nessie found herself too over-tired and excited to think of sleep when she got upstairs. She was still brushing out her dark curly locks, at her pretty dressing-table, when she heard a voice calling below, "Nessie! Nessie!" in suppressed tones of fear. She ran down to the first landing, where stood Mrs. Vance in her dressing-gown, lamp in hand, listening at the show-room door.

"Nessie, didn't you make all safe here?"

Nessie nodded. "Fastened the windows, barred the shutters, put out the gas, locked the door, and gave the key to you," she replied promptly.

"There's someone in there now," Mrs. Vance whispered impressively; "someone walking up and down with an irregular, limping step. I heard it, and the tap of a stick on the floor. It stopped when you came."

"Thieves! And we are all alone in the house!"

"Of course it is. That seed-pearl embroidery is worth fifty guineas, and that Point de Venise dounce five times as much. I'm not afraid. We must catch them. Run and find the key. It's hanging up in the pocket of my gown."

Nessie obeyed softly, and returned to find her aunt still on the watch, armed with the largest carver and the dinner-bell.

"There, Nessie, stand at the lauding-window, and when I give the signal you rouse the neighbourhood. Don't be too precipitate, though, it may be cats."

Nessie inclined to that opinion, but wasted no time in discussion. She posted herself as desired, bell in hand, while Mrs. Vance, turning the key gently, suddenly flung open the door and marched to the attack, lamp in one hand, bare blade in the other. There was an awful portentous silence after she disappeared. Nessie waited breathless, all ears for the signal, in vain.

"N—N—Nessie, hel—l—p!" came a faint strangled cry in her aunt's voice, that sounded as if shaken out of her.

Nessie flew to the rescue.

On an ottoman in front of the big mirror sat Mrs. Vance, all limp and dishevelled, her eyes fixed blankly on its dusky depths, her lamp toppling over on a neighbouring chair, and the carving-knife dangling feebly from her nerveless clasp.

Nessie rushed at her and caught the lamp, then gazed all around in consternation.

The empty blocks and wire-frames had the room to themselves apparently. She peered cautiously round the tall cabinets, behind the curtains, and under the tables. Nothing, nobody there. Then, bolder grown, she struck a match and set all the lights of the old-fashioned gaseliers ablazing. The large doors between that room and the next were securely fastened inside. Nessie tried all the windows, looked in all the ottomans, and returned to her aunt fairly bewildered.

"Did you see anything? Why did you call 'help'?" she asked at last.

Mrs. Vance only moaned.

"I feel as if I were pinched black and blue," she complained presently; "look at my shoulders."

Nessie did look, but seeing no trace of ill-usage, wrapped her up warmly again, and suggested that they should go to bed.

"Over-work, poor dear thing," was the girl's mental conclusion as Mrs. Vance staggered to her feet, and holding very tight to her, made her shaky way back to her room.

She refused Nessie's offer of companionship for the night, and with a hurried farewell, locked and bolted herself in.

Nessie tossed and tumbled under her lace-trimmed counterpane for a little, wondering what she should do if Aunt Elly's wits really were to give way, but weariness soon got the better of her anxieties, and she woke next morning to find Mistress Ellenoure fresh, brisk, and business-like as ever. A new servant was coming in, and the apprentices, under charge of her old forewoman, would be down by noon, and must be set to work at once.

"How did you sleep?" she found time to ask Nessie.

"Very well, indeed, till morning, when I was horribly bothered by a dream visitor."

"What? The merchant-prince?"

"I'm sure I hope not. He was a grey, wizened, ever-so-old, little man in a snuff-coloured suit with bright buttons, and a huge bandage of a white-silk neckcloth, who came limping in, leaning on a gold-knobbed cane."

"How alarming!" said Mrs. Vance with a forced little laugh.

"Not at all. He smiled most benignantly on me, only persisted in urging me to get up and come away with him, which I felt cruel on his part, when I was so dead sleepy. He was becoming very imperative, indeed, when I suddenly awoke. He was just what I always fancied old Mr. Stelfox to be. Was he anything like him?"

"No. Oh dear no! Why, Uncle Jacob was quite another sort of man; with a grey beard and a fine white head, you know;" and Mistress Ellenoure hastily measured and snipped off some Turkish embroidery, three-quarters of a yard too short, and hurried away.

The red gown that Nessie donned for business hours was a novelty in those days, cruelly trying to any but the possessor of her lily and rose tints, but admirably chosen to show off Mrs. Vance's last consignments of Spanish laces. She had Algerine embroideries, too, and soft creamy Indian silks, and Nessie was kept exhibiting mantles, and flounces, and all the rest of it, till she almost grew sick of her own pretty reflection in the big mirror.

Mrs. Vance kept persistently away from that end of the room, only coming near her three times, and each time making some unwonted and astonishing blunder. She declared herself sold out of hand-painted satins, with a boxful at her elbow; and when Mrs. Towerdale, the great leader of Northport taste, was in the very middle of an order, actually turned off and hurried away, knocking down and treading on the precious pearl embroidery, to attend to a perfectly insignificant new comer.

The great lady stared in some surprise, but her friend, whom Nessie was serving, turned vivaciously from the glass to her:

"Oh, do look! Who was that who passed just now?"

"I saw nobody," said Mrs. Towerdale icily, while Nessie, in despair at her aunt's blunder, hurriedly brought forth the great treasure of the house—a portfolio, with sketches of costume by a distinguished R.A., obtained Mrs. Vance only knew how, and with a dexterous show of semi-confidence, exhibited one or two.

"I could have sworn to him," the lady declared, "just the old, bandy, snuff-coloured legs and gaiters, and his queer little monkey-face looking over that great poultice of a white bandanna round his throat. Where can he have gone?"

Nessie nearly let fall the drawing which Mrs. Towerdale was graciously levelling her eye-glass at, in her amaze at hearing her last night's visitor described so exactly.

"You mean old Jacob Stelfox?" asked a third lady, joining the group. "I was thinking of him just now. I used to come here with my husband very often once. Dear me! it almost made me shiver to fancy I heard the tapping of his big cane, and his halting footstep! He lived in these rooms, you know, at last, and all the exercise he took was to hop up and down, and in and out."

"Of course, the idea must be carefully carried out in the other details of the costume," Mrs. Towerdale was prosing on impressively, and Nessie could listen no more to the other conversation.

Her poor little head felt utterly dazed with all she had to speculate on. How could she have come to dream of old Jacob, and why should Mrs. Vance have tried to deceive her?

The day drew to its close, again a prosperous one; so prosperous that Nessie could hardly marvel at Mistress Ellenore's unusual high spirits and talkativeness.

They sat down to supper, a well-served meal this night, with actually a bottle of champagne between them, of which all but Nessie's one modest glass fell to Mrs. Vance's share. She grew extravagantly affectionate and laudatory, predicted the advent of the merchant-prince more confidently than ever, drew fantastic pictures of their future prosperity, and ended by sending Nessie to bed early, and declaring her intention of sitting up all night, if need be, preparing work for the next day.

Nessie departed, not unwillingly, but before half her night's rest was over, started up, as she fancied, broad awake. The light of a street-lamp shone on her white blind, and dark against it was the outline of a man's figure, an old man, bent and halting, who with raised forefinger beckoned impatiently to her.

She rose, or thought she did, and reluctantly followed as he slowly limped before her out of the room, and down the staircase to the next landing. It was brilliantly lighted, and crouching all scared and white at the closed door of the show-room was Aunt Elly, clutching fast the key.

The old man made a stern gesture of command that she should open it forthwith. She hesitated with imploring looks and words that Nessie could not hear. The old man's brows knit ominously, he made one angry stride forward, his heavy stick raised to strike, when Nessie, flinging herself desperately between them, was grasped and held fast in Mrs. Vance's arms—and woke.

"My dear! What have you been dreaming of? I heard you stirring, and ran downstairs just in time to turn up the gas and catch you."

"Was I walking in my sleep?" asked Nessie confusedly. "Where's the old man? Did he hurt you?"

Mrs. Vance grew white to the lips, and glanced furtively around with terrified eyes.

"Don't, dear. Don't think any more of it. There, come upstairs again, and I'll lie down beside you."

Nessie followed her, half ashamed, and the rest of the night passed quietly.

Next day brought business brisk enough to wipe out the memory of the night's scare from the mind of one of the women at least. A great fancy ball was in contemplation, and the Northport mind was greatly exercised on the question of costume. Mistress Ellenore threw herself into the subject con amore, and surpassed herself in fertility of suggestion and boldness of artistic design.

Nessie wondered and admired, and wondered more when now and then she caught her sunk in fits of gloomy brooding or listened to some miserable nervous outbreak most unlike Mrs. Vance's usual happy, well-controlled temper. It suddenly occurred to her that the Rio Palmas mail might have come in and brought the usual tidings of invincible bad fortune and demand for supplies. Still, orders were pouring in, the great half-furnished resonant rooms above were buzzing like a hive with the whirr of sewing-machines, the click of scissors, and the rustle of endless yards of costly fabrics; sales, and for ready cash, had been going on all day long, and, if the worst came to the worst, The Golden Bulrush might afford Mr. Tom Vance another start in life. Nessie tried to hint as much that same evening, but her aunt almost repulsed her.

"You don't know what you are talking about. Tom would never be so mean as to take our earnings from us. It would be robbery. Do you really think he might come home and take all this?" with a sudden look of terror; "it is mine, you know, not his at all. What will become of us if he does?"

"Auntie dearest, you are simply killing yourself with anxieties. Don't invent a new one. You haven't had a decent night's rest since we came here either. It is your turn to sleep to-night. I don't mean to close an eye till those rosebuds are on Mrs. Towerdale's train, so I shall sit by you to-night."

Half ungraciously Mrs. Vance let herself be led away, suffering the girl's tender service and caresses with a sullen stupefied air. Her eyes closed as her head touched the pillow, and she fell sound asleep holding Nessie's hand. When her clasp relaxed, Nessie softly unfolded her work, and by the light of her carefully-shaded candle began to adjust her rose-sprays on her velvet, a difficult and dainty piece of work which absorbed her entirely for some hours.

Suddenly she lifted her head. The house had been profoundly still, only Mrs. Vance's regular breathing breaking the silence. Now in the distance she heard a soft but distinct and measured sound, growing nearer and nearer—a halting footstep on the stairs. She listened breathlessly as it came closer step by step. She knew when it reached the landing and paused, as an old man would to rest, then came steadily onward till it stopped at the bedroom-door. The handle turned softly but decidedly, and the door moved inwards till it disclosed the figure that Nessie knew must be there—the little, bent, snuff-brown form of old Jacob Stelfox. His eyebrows were knit as he gazed in on them, and he raised a hand in menace.

Mrs. Vance tossed, and moaned, and started up, and Nessie, flinging a protecting arm round her shoulders, and feeling braver than she imagined possible, gazed firmly on the wizened old face that advanced out of the darkness till it glared over the foot of the bed on them. He beckoned as he had done before and turned away, while Mrs. Vance struggled away from Nessie, and attempted to get out of bed. There was something in her face that made Nessie dread either to wake or to try to stop her. So she slipped on her shoes and rolled a shawl round her. Then, one waking, one sleeping, the two women followed step by step the shadowy, limping figure that led them down the great staircase to the door at its foot. It was open. A cold, unearthly, greenish light seemed to emanate from the mirror, rendering visible the table in front, and dimly the surrounding objects. If grew stronger and clearer as the old man approached, and seemed to concentrate itself on him as he turned and faced them with bright, angry eyes.

Mrs. Vance slipped suddenly from Nessie's supporting clasp, stumbling blindly forward with outstretched arms till she fell on her knees at his feet. Again he raised his hand solemnly, his frown grew deeper, rays of fierce light seemed to dart from his eyes and transfix the kneeling suppliant before him. She writhed in dumb appeal, and at last broke forth in strangled sobbing tones:

"What have I done? What harm to you or her? Nessie! Save me! save me from him!"

But Nessie stood powerless, spell-bound.

"Why do you torment me? Did I ever ask for your house or money? Haven't I been an honest, hard-working woman all my life, and as good to Nessie as if she had been my own child? Don't! don't! Your eyes scorch me! Go away! go away!" she moaned, grovelling at the spectre's feet. "What if Nessie was your nearest-of-kin? How did I know you ever cared to hear of her? You all disowned and cast off her mother when she ran away with young Ned Halliday (I was the only one to stand up for poor Aunt Hester then), and you never cared to enquire what became of them. How could I risk a quarrel with you? I had the children to think of. If I have done wrong, it was for them. Take your money away again, ruin us if you will, but leave me."

Still the grim old face scowled menacingly down on the poor terrified creature; but as Nessie listened a flood of generous wrath seemed to rise hot and strong in her heart. With a desperate effort she burst from the spell that held her, and rushed forward.

"You wicked old man!" she cried, transported with indignation. "You mean, wrong-headed old spectre! Go away at once to your grave, or wherever you came from! What business have you here at all? This isn't your house now. It belongs to someone who will make a better use of it than you ever did. And frighten her out of it you shall not!"

Nessie spoke in a perfect torrent of wrath, that swept away all terror of the apparition, who seemed to listen with a ghastly sneer in his cold gleaming eyes.

"So you threw off my mother? Left her and me to Aunt Elly's charity, and now you want to put things straight again, as you fancy. What do you mean to do? What do all you ghosts expect to do? You can haunt the house and drive Aunt Ellenore out of it, but you can't put anyone else in."

The phantom still listened with a sideway turn of the head, and a malicious smile wreathing his sunken lips. He laid his hand impressively on the marble table, and nodded meaningly.

Nessie defiantly swept up to him and examined the spot from which he withdrew his hand, above and below. She had dusted it often enough to know it well—the gilded garland of a frame, the impossible lion's leg beneath. The slab was marble, the garland wood and plaster, the leg wood and iron, just like a hundred others of the period.

Still, urged by that mocking smile, she tried again. Resting on the edge, she felt the slab move slightly. She pressed a little, and the whole slab slid back into some recess of the wall, leaving the frame exposed, and in the frame a secret receptacle.

Three or four dusty blue envelopes lay in it. The top one was closed and sealed. She lifted it gingerly with her finger-tips, and blowing the dust away from its address, read by the light of that weird unnatural radiance that flashed up as if in triumph:

"This codicil to my will of 1866 is to be delivered, after my death, to Messrs. Faucit and Fulwort.

"(Signed) JACOB STELFOX."

Nessie tore it open, in obedience to a gesture of the apparition's. The long-folded blue paper crackled apart reluctantly. The writing inside was fair and plain. The meaning of all the dry lengthy phrases seemed to start out clear before her in sudden vividness.

It was in the hand of old Jacob himself, in as spiteful terms as were consistent with perfect legality, and to the following purport:

That his niece, Ellenore Vance, having for purposes of her own concealed from him the existence of a daughter of his youngest sister, Hester, and Edward Halliday, to mark his disapproval of her unworthy conduct, he proceeded to cancel all previous bequests in her favour, and to bequeath all that he had originally bequeathed to her to the aforesaid daughter, etc., etc.

Nessie read, and turned a gaze of scorn on the mocking phantom. "So that was to be Aunt Elly's reward for loving and caring for me! Why didn't you do it yourself, instead of hoarding up spite against her all these years? I suppose this thing is legal," examining the document with utter repulsion, "and no lawyer can upset it." Old Jacob grinned confidently. "Then I can!" and the paper was contemptuously scattered at his feet in a dozen fragments. "As if flesh and blood could not get the better of any ghost that ever walked!"

The little grey ghost's hands were raised in trembling horror, and his chin sank suddenly forward on his white neckcloth. Nessie pursued her advantage mercilessly.

"Oh, I've no doubt you are hugging to yourself the thought of what a good exemplary benefactor to mankind you are; of all you have done for your family, and the blessing you are going to be to your native town. You foolish old man! It isn't your money now that is doing anything. No one owes you a grateful thought for it. It isn't the people you benefit when you are dead that are taken into account; it is those you did no good to when you were alive that are counted up against you."

The poor old figure seemed to shrink under her bright indignant gaze and fade fainter and fainter.

Nessie felt quite mollified towards it.

"I'll try and think as kindly as I can of you, but you must see how Aunt Elly's living love and care have been more to me than all you could ever do for me. You had better go. You have no part in our lives, and you can but trouble them. You can do no good in the world any more. Good-bye—good-bye."

There was but a little cloud of snuff-coloured mist left by this time. The weird cold light in the mirror was waxing low. On the floor lay Mrs. Vance, a motionless heap of white drapery.

A chill crept to the marrow of Nessie's bones as for one instant a cold trembling hand seemed to be laid on her downbent head, and an icy sigh, like a breath from a snow-cloud, breathed over her "Farewell," and all was darkness.

Mrs. Vance woke next morning to find herself snug in bed, after a long dreamless night. There was a smell of smouldering paper and a little pile of blackened fragments in the grate, a candle guttered to its death in a smoky socket, and in her chair beside the table slept Nessie, quietly and peacefully as a child, the last rosebud hanging by the last needleful of silver thread to the blue velvet train in her lap.

Her pretty lips parted with a smile, her long curly lashes quivered asunder.

"Something has happened," she cried, starting up broad awake. "What is it?"

Mistress Ellenore knit her brows distressfully.

"I can't recall it, Nessie. Have we both been dreaming?"

"I don't know."

"I don't know."

"Then nobody knows, unless perhaps old Jacob Stelfox."

Then with a kiss and a laugh they forgot the subject.

Nessie has never found her merchant-prince, which is the less to be regretted in that she infinitely prefers the handsome junior partner in the art metal-works opposite. She is as happy a wife as Mrs. Vance a widow, fascinating Tom Vance having ended his days characteristically in the last revolution in Rio Palmas six months before the marriage.

Having, with his usual frank affability, promised the support of the British Government unreservedly to both parties, he was incontinently shot in the market-place of Santa Fé by the first which found him out.

Mrs. Vance mourned him as a martyred patriot, but, relieved from the burden of his existence, prospered exceedingly in a gorgeous plate-glass emporium of her own nowadays.

"My dear," she said to Nessie on her wedding-day, "never despise riches. They have brought me a clear conscience at last. I dared not give up my rightful inheritance before, though I always felt it should have been yours. Now, dearest, take it with my love as your wedding-present."

She laid a mighty bundle in Nessie's hands as she spoke—the title-deeds of The Golden Bulrush.

There is music of children's voices, and patter of tiny feet up and down the solemn old dwelling, and Nessie's bright presence makes sunshine there all day long.

The dim old mirror still holds its place, but no one guesses how, when the evening shadows fall, a grey wistful face peers from out its misty depths, and a yearning sigh for life and opportunity long gone by floats sadly echoing through the deserted rooms.

HOUSEHOLD WORDS,

EDITED BY CHARLES DICKENS,

Is Published Every Wednesday, Price ONE PENNY; also in Monthly Parts, Price SIXPENCE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY,

BY THE AUTHOR OF "FRAGOLETTA," "DAME DURDEN," Etc.,

WILL BE COMMENCED EARLY IN JANUARY, 1884.

THE FIFTH VOLUME of HOUSEHOLD WORDS, containing Nos. 106 to 131, bound in Cloth, and uniform with Vols. I., II., III., and IV., is now ready, price 4s. 6d. Also Binding Cases (including Title and Index), price 1s. 6d. Title and Index may be obtained separately, price 1d.

All back Numbers, Parts, Quarterly Divisions, and Volumes, also the Extra Numbers, are in print, and may be had by ordering from any Bookseller, Newsagent, or Railway Bookstall.

All applications for Advertisements to be addressed to Mr. J. SMITH, 24, Great New Street, E.C.